Mahomet deliuered of the great feare he had before conceived of the generall preparation of the Christian princes against him; determined now to worke his will vpon such as were nearest vnto him, and afterward not to forget them that were farther off. The proceeding of Scanderbeg, with the late ouerthrow of S E R R E S with his armie in E P I R V S, stucke in his stomacke: in reuenge whereof, he now sent one Balabanus Badera, a most valiant capitaine, with fiftene thousand horsemen, and three thousand foot, to inuade E P I R V S. This Balabanus was an Epriot borde, a chorles sonne of that countrey: and being of a boy taken captiue of the Turkes, as hee was keeping of his fathers cattell, and of long time brought vp in seruitude amongst them, framing himselfe both to their religion and manners; after long seruice, got the credit of a good common souldiour. But when as at the taking of C O N S T A N T I N O P L E, it was his fortune to bee the first man of the Turkes armie that gained the top of the wals, and entered the citie; hee was for that peece of seruice, euer afterwards of Mahomet greatly esteemed: and beside his other great preferments, now sent Generall of his armie into E P I R V S. Who as soone as hee was come to A L C H R I A (a citie vpon the frontiers of that countrey) sent manie rich presents to Scanderbeg, making shew as if hee had bene desirous peaceably to lie vpon the borders committed to his charge, without farther purpose to trouble his countrey: yet in deed waiting nothing more than some notable opportunitie, suddenly to doe him the greatest mischief he could. But Scanderbeg well seeing into the malice of the man, rejected his fained friendship and giftes, and in derision sent him a spade, a mattocke, a flail, with other such instruments belonging vnto husbandrie: willing him to take in hand those tooles, and to follow his fathers trade of life, and to leaue the conducting of armies vnto men of greater skill and better place. Which disgrace Balabanus tooke in exceeding euill part; purposing in himselfe, if euer it lay in his power, to be thereof reuenged. Wherefore knowing that Scanderbeg with a small power lay not farre off vpon the frontiers of his kingdome, he determined suddenly in the night to set vpon him before hee were aware of his comming, and so if it were possible to ouerthrow him: but Scanderbeg hauing knowledge thereof by his scouts, set forward in good order to haue met him. When Balabanus perceiuing that hee was discouered, staid vpon the way, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbeg: who had then in his armie but foure thousand horsemen, and one thousand and fife hundred foote, but all choise men and most expert souldiours: and then lay in a large pleasant valley called V A L C H A L. At the farther end whereof Balabanus lay also encamped, neere vnto a rough and wooddie hill which enclosed that part of the valley. Whilist both armies thus lay within view one of another, Scanderbeg well considering the ground the enemy had taken, and that it was like he would offer him battell, with cheerefull speeches encouraged his souldiours: straidly charging them vpon paine of his displeasure, that if the enemy vpon the fortune of the battell, should chance to flie or to retire, they should not in anie case pursue them farther than the straits of the hill where-by the enemy lay: guessing too truly, that hee would in so conuenient a place leaue part of his armie in ambush, as a sure refuge to trust vnto whatsoever should befall. When he had thus encouraged and instructed his souldiours, he rise with his armie, and in good order retired vnto the rising of an hill, which was a good way behind the place where he before lay; of purpose to haue the aduantage of the ground, if the enemy should follow to giue him battell. Balabanus seeing him retire, and the small number of his armie, thought verily that he had fled for feare: and therefore to itay him who ment nothing lesse than to flie, set forward in great hast. The Turkes thinking vpon so great aduantage to haue found no great resistance, followed after Scanderbeg as if they had had him in chase: and by that time they were come to the place where hee staid, were by their hast greatly disordered and out of aray. Scanderbeg his old trustie souldiours ours nothing dismayed with the hastie coming & hidious clamour of the Turks, received them with great courage: so that there began a fierce battell, with much slaughter on both sides, which for a great while stood doubtfull. Yet such was the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg his resolute souldiours, that the Turkes (who as then fought in great disorder) were at last put to flight: and with much slaughter chased vnto the straits of the mountaine, where Scanderbeg had before commanded his men to stay. But certaine of his best and principall captaines forgetting what he had said vnto them; and led on (whether with the heat and furie of the battell, or rather with inuitable desire hard to stay) vnaduisedly pursued the enemy into those straits, whereof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they should not enter: where they were on euery side beset with their enemies, arising out of ambush: and after they had a long time desperately fought as wild beasts enclosed with hunters, at last oppressed with multitude, were there together taken and brought to Balabanus; by whom they were forthwith sent to Mahomet to CONSTANTINOPLE. Who as soone as hee heard of their taking, is reported with great reioycing to haue said: Now am I sure that the strength of Scanderbeg is broken. The names of the principall men which were there taken, was Moses Golemus of DIERA, the greatest captaine of EPHRS next vnto Scanderbeg himselfe; Giuriza Vladerius, Scanderbeg his kinsman; Musachius, Scanderbeg his nephew by his sister Angelina; Ginius Musachius; Ioannes Perlatus, who valiantly defended SEFETIGRABE against Amurath; Nicholaus Eerisus; Georgius Chucca; and Ginius Manesius: whereof euery one of them was able to haue conducted a great armie, and might worthely haue bene accounted amongst the greatest captaines of that age. The taking of these worthie men brought such a generall sorrow and heavinesse vpon EPHRS, that the victorie was nothing accounted of, euery man lamenting the losse of such notable leaders. Scanderbeg carefull of their deliuerance, presently sent an embassadour to Mahomet, requesting that hee might redeeme his prisoners: either by exchanging of others for them, or else for such raunsome as it should please him to set downe. But hee knowing them to be Scanderbeg his best captaines, would neither exchange them for others, nor grant that they should be raunfomed for anie gold: but after hee had vsed them with all the despite he could deuise, caused them all by little and little, to be slaine quicke: in which miserable torment they liued fifteene daies, and so died. Scanderbeg hearing thereof, was therewith rather encouraged than discouraged: and in reuenge thereof, with fire and sword entered into the Turkes dominion, sparing nothing that hee could either burne, or possibly by anie other meanes destroye.

Mahomet glad of the taking of these notable men (although they were bought with the liues of manie of his people) commended Balabanus highly, as the onely man that knew how to fight against Scanderbeg: and in reward of his good seruice, sent him diuers rich giftes, with commaundement to repaire againe his armie, and to proceed in his warres so happily begun. Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet trusting more vnto his pollicie, than his strength: lying at ALCHRIA, sent againe diuers rich presents to Scanderbeg, as desirous to liue in peace by him: but seeking indeed to bring him into securitie, and so suddenly (if it were possible) to entrap him. Which thing Scanderbeg well perceiuing, rejected his fained friendship together with his presents, as sent from a base peisant: Whereupon Balabanus entered into a new deuise, and by secret meanes, with great rewards corrupted Scanderbeg his scouts, whereof some were Balabanus his kinsmen, though it were to Scanderbeg vnknowne. By which practise, he had vpon the sudden in the night oppressed Scanderbeg, lying encamped in ORONCHEVA, if Scanderbeg himselfe (who commonly spent most part of the night in careful watch) going about the campe, had not in the silence of the night a farre off perceiued the coming of the enemy by the noise of his horses: and thereupon with wonderfull celeritie putting his armie in such order as he best could, was readie to receiue him; and at last after a great fight, put him to flight: and hauing him in chase, slew most part of his armie, Balabanus himselfe with a small remnant hardly escaping.

Now when Mahomet vnderstood that Balabanus was ouerthrowne, and his armie lost, hee was in doubt, whether to send another Generall, or else againe to prooue the fortune of the old. But after hee had well considered, that Balabanus was a right valiant captaine, and one that well knew the countrey of EPHRS, and withall a mortall enemy to Scanderbeg: he resolved to staie vpon him, and not to send anie other. So committing to his charge fourteene thousand thousand horsemen and three thousand foot, sent him againe to inuade EPHRS: and the more to encourage him, promised to make him king of that countrey, if he could subdue Scanderbeg. Balabanus with this armie coming to ALCHRIA, and still in vaine plotting how hee might circumuent his warie enemy, after his wonted manner sent diuers presents to Scanderbeg; which he still scornfully refused. Three moneths he lay still at ALCHRIA, with nothing more troubled than with his owne thoughts: but finding nothing that pleased himselfe, hee determined to aduenture by plaine force to subdue him. And vpon that resolution marched with all his armie into the great plaine neere vnto SEFETIGRABE, whither Scanderbeg came with his armie also; which then consisted of eight thousand horsemen and fifteene hundred foot: with which small power hee refused not to ioine battaile with Balabanus; being in number two to one. But after they were come to handie blowes, to haue seene Scanderbeg his men fight; a man would haue said them to haue bene rather raging Lyons than men, they so furiously assailed their enemies; without regard of perill or danger, as men nothing affraid to die. Scanderbeg with great skill gouerned that battaile, carefully providing for euery danger; himselfe valiantly fighting in the head of his battaile, but not without care of the rest, still sending speedie reliefe where most need was; and bringing in fresh supplies in stead of them that were wounded or slaine, performed all the parts of a most worthie cheefestaine and valiant souldior: where most perill was, there was hee straight, and at his presence danger fled, as if victorie had attended vpon him. But whilest he thus fought in the midst of his enemies, his horse fortun'd to be slaine vnder him, and falling downe with him, fore brused one of his armes, whereof he complained long time after. The Turkes seeing him downe, pressed on fiercely to haue slaine him: but hee was quickly rescued by his owne souldiours, and remounted. And forthwith encountering with one Suliman, a great commander in the Turkes armie, slew him in fight hand to hand: whereupon such a terrour fell vpon the Turkes, that they began to retire, and after a while to betake themselves to plaine flight; Scanderbeg pursuing them with such execution, that of that great armie few escaped with Balabanus to carrie newes home.

Balabanus now thrice vanquished by Scanderbeg, and in the last battaile hauing lost what hee could loose, except he should haue lost himselfe, returned to Mahomet at CONSTANTINOPLE, of whom he was sharply rebuked for the great ouerthrowes he had so often receiued. At which time Balabanus at first gaue place to the kings furie: but afterwards when the heat was ouer, hee with a large discourse cunningly excused himselfe, imputing all those his mishaps vnto the appointment of God, and the fortune of warre: and in the end told Mahomet plainly, That it was but in vaine to send such small armies into EPHRS. But if it would please him at once to send two valiant captaines with a puissant and strong armie, who deuiding the same betwixt them, and entering at one time into diuers parts of EPHRS, might spoile the countrey before them, and enclose Scanderbeg betwixt them, if he should aduenture to giue either of them battaile, being before resolved neither of them to offer him battaile, or yet to accept of the same being by him offered, except the other were also at hand: and so by mutuall consent to vndertake him, but neuer single. By which course hee promised vnto him an easie and assured victorie: for as much as it were impossible for any man so beset, and as it were on euery side coupt vp with his enemies, either to escape or yet to make any great resistance. This perswasion of Balabanus so well fitted the tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himselfe to be the man to put his own deuise in execution: giuing him commission to leue such an armie as he should thinke sufficient for the performance of that seruice: and withall to associate vnto himselfe for his companion which soeuer of his captaines as he pleased. Balabanus according to his commission, tooke musters of the men of warre, and made choice of fortie thousand good souldiours, and chose one Iacup Arnauth, (otherwise called James the Epirot, because he was also borne in EPHRS, a valiant captain) to be his companion: whom he sent with sixteene thousand souldiours by the way of THASSALIA and GRECIA into EPHRS, commaunding him in no case to ioine battaile with Scanderbeg, vntill he himselfe were also come into the countrey with the other part of the armie. And so setting both forward, Balabanus taking the nearer way, through THRACIA and MACEDONIA, came first into EPHRS with twentie thousand horsemen and foure thousand foot, and encamped in the valley of VALCHALI. Scanderbeg both by his espials and letters from his secret friends in the Turkes court, hauing certaine intelligence of all Balabanus his intent and purpose, had in readinesse against his coming a strong armie of eight thousand horsemen and foure thousand foot, all choise souldiours. And now hearing that he was come into EPIRVS, and encamped in VALCAA, sent out three espials to discouer in what order he lay: one of which spies was Balabanus his kinsman (but not so knowne to Scanderbeg) by whose perswasion the other two when they had taken full view of Balabanus his army, and should haue returned to Scanderbeg to haue giuen intelligence of that they had seene, like false traitors went ouer to Balabanus, and discouered vnto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg: hoping therefore to receiue some great reward, as their fellow had before borne them in hand. Scanderbeg maueing that his espials returned, not againe as they were appointed, and doubting that they had been by the enemy intercepted, and vsing many times in matters of such importance to trust himselfe best, presently went out with five lustie souldiours, and rid forth to discouer the manner of the enemies lying. Balabanus like a craftie fox, mistrusting that Scanderbeg decciued of his first espials would for like purpose send forth others, laied certain horsemens in secret ambush in diuers places, to intercept them if it were possible. These horsemens lay not so couert, but that they were in good time descried by Scanderbeg and his followers (who with Argus eyes, pried into euerie bush and thicker as they went) before he was altogether fallen within their danger: and yet but so that he came to handle strokes, where Scanderbeg and his followers oppressed with multitude, were glad to flie as fast as they could into the next wood, the Turkes horsemens following them at the heeles. It fortuned that as they were flying, a great old tree was fallen crosse the way, which Scanderbeg putting spurs to his horse, leapt ouer, with one of his men after him; the other foure not able to get ouer, turned backe vpon the Turkes, and there fighting were slaine. One of the Turkes which so hardly pursued Scanderbeg being well mounted, forced his horse to leape the tree, and still followed after Scanderbeg: who looking backe and seeing but one, turned vpon him and slew him: the other Turkes hauing slaine foure of Scanderbeg his men which could not get ouer the tree, returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his followers, came backe againe to his campe; and there with all speed put his army in readinesse to go against Balabanus before the coming of his companion, with the other part of his army. Vpon which resolution, after he had with cheerefull perswasions encouraged his souldiours, and filled their minds with hope of victorie, he set forward, and came with great speed into the valley of VALCHA where Balabanus lay. Scanderbeg had deuided his army into foure squadrons, whereof Tanusius had the leading of one, Zacharias Groppa of another, the third was committed to Petrus Emanuel, and Scanderbeg himselfe conducted the fourth. So setting forward, he sent before certaine companies of harquebusiers, and archers, to prouoke the enemy and to draw him forth vnto battell. Balabanus also shewed himselfe with his army in seemly order before his tents, but there stood fast and would not stirre, expecting continually the coming of his fellow. Which Scanderbeg perceiving, and that he sought but to dallie out the time, and as one vnwilling to fight had againe retired his army into the safetie of his trenches; drew neerer and neerer vnto him; continually skirmishing with such as he sent out, daring him into the field, and brauing him vnto his trenches, in such sort as if hee would haue forced the same, and by strong hand haue fet him out thence. Whereat the Turkes fretted and chafed exceedingly: insomuch, that they were ready to rise against their Generall, because he would not lead them forth to battell, but suffer them to be so disgraced. Balabanus mindfull of that he had promised vnto Mahomet his great lord and master, did what he might to haue deferred time: but when he saw that his fellow came not, and that he could no longer delay the matter; being so continually assailed and braued by Scanderbeg his souldiours, that his Turkes therewith prouoked, were ready oftentimes to haue issued out without his direction, and now no remedie but that he must needs fight; placed his men in good order, and so went out of his trenches to giue battell, himselfe leading the left wing thereof: where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce fight, many falling on both sides. But Scanderbeg strengthened with the old garrison of CROIA, and the most expert souldiours of DIBRA, prevailed vpon the Turkes and forced them to giue ground, yet still keeping their order: The fight was so great in this part of the battell, that in other places they stood almost still as lookers on, expecting the doubtful fortune of their Generals: Which thing Scanderbeg perceiving, drew certain troupes out of the right wing, where as he saw was least danger, which speedily fetching a compass about, charged the side of the enemies army; and againe withdrawing themselves, and with wonderfull celeritie wheeling about, set vpon the backe of them that fought in the left wing: so that the Turkes there fiercely charged both before and behind, by the most valiant souldiours of Scanderbeg his army, fell in other places with a great slaughter. Balabanus with exceeding courage gainstood his enemies, so long as there was any hope left: but when he saw the fortune of Scanderbeg to preuaile, and all about him to become desperat, he made shift for himselfe, and fled out of the battell as fast as he could. The rest of the army, being in other places before troubled and disordered, fled also, some one way, some another, euery man as his fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus escaped: the rest were for most part either slaine or taken prisoners.

Scanderbeg had scarcely well breathed himselfe after this victorie, and deuided the spoile amongst his souldiours; but that newes was brought to him in post from the lady Mamiza his sister, then lying at PETRELLA, that Iacuppe, Arnauth was by the way of BELGRADE come into EPIRVS with an army of sixteene thousand horsemens, burning and destroying the country before him; and then lay encamped in the plaines of TIRANNA the lesse. When Scanderbeg to proue the minds of his souldiours, had cheerefully imparted vnto them such newes, as was like to be the beginning of new labour and perill; they were therewith nothing dismayed, but ready to follow him with such cheerefulness of countenance & mind, as if they should haue gone to some great feast or banquet: reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a discomfited army. This cheerefulness of his souldiours, Scanderbeg tooke as an assured token of his good success; and hauing all things in readinesse, presently set forward, and in short time came to the place where the enemy lay. Iacuppe hearing of his coming, remoued his campe into a corner of the plaines of TIRANNA, neere vnto a little hill, as a place of more safetie for his army to lie in. Scanderbeg taking the plaines, encamped his army in the same place from whence Iacuppe was but a little before departed, where he rested one whole day. The next morning to vex his enemies (who as yet had not heard of the ouerthrow of Balabanus) he caused diuers of the Turkes heads which were slaine in the late battell (which he had brought for that purpose) to be cast before the trenches of the enemy, and withall, diuers of them which were taken prisoners to be shewne: Which Iacuppe beholding, in great dispaire said, I see the euill hap. of Mahomet. Immediately after, Scanderbeg sent forth 500 horsemens to skirmish with the Turkes, commanding them so soone as they were charged by the enemy to retire, if happily they might so be drawne into battell: which fell out accordingly. For Iacuppe now seeing his fellow was not to be looked for, and willing also without farther delay to trie his fortune, came readily into the field, and began a fierce battell: which endured not long, for Scanderbeg perceiving in what part of the army Iacuppe was, bent his greatest force that way, and singling him out, with his owne hand slew him. Where with the Turkes being discouraged, forthwith betooke themselves to flight, and in flying, were for most part slaine or taken. Those which escaped the present furie of the sword, stragling through the country by thicke woods and blind waies, were by the country people either slaine or taken prisoners. In these two battells were slaine of the Turkes foure and twentie thousand, and six thousand taken. And of Scanderbeg his men, were lost about a thousand. Scanderbeg and his souldiours were so wearie of the slaughter of the Turkes, that when it was told him the next day, that Balabanus was fled but with one cornet of horsemens, and might easily be surprised, if he were well pursued: he said, O let some of our enemies liue to report their owne slaughter and our victorie. After that Scanderbeg had in this sort vanquished these great captains, he presently entered into the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, and roaming vp and downe at his pleasure without resistance, made haucke of all that came in his way. And after returning to CROIA with victorie, brake vp his army, and gaue his souldiours leaue to depart, euery man to his owne dwelling.

Whilest these things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turkes to undertake to kill Scanderbeg. These traitors came vnto Scanderbeg as fugitiues, making such shew of the detestation both of Mahomet his tyrannicall government, and vaine superstition, that they were both of Scanderbeg and others reputed to be in deed the men they desired to be accounted: and so after they had learned the principles of the Christian religion, were by their owne desire baptised. But treason against princes whom God hath in his most mightie protection, cannot be long couered; much lesse without his great sufferance performed. So fortuned it, that these two false dissembling traitors, expecting nothing but opportunitie to performe their diuillish deuilie, vpon some occasion fell at variance betwixt themselves, and in their heat, let some such words fall, as being taken vp by some there present, drew them both into suspicion: and therupon being straitly examined, it was at last by them confessed, that they were sent by Mahomet of purpose to haue slaine Scanderbeg: for which their treason they were both presently executed, as they had right well deserved. When Mahomet vnderstood that Balabanus was out come, Iacup slaine, and both their armies almost quite destroyed, he after his impatient manner fell into a great rage, and became as a man almost frantick: and afterwards calling together his great Bassaes, resolved by their aduise, not to send any mo generals against Scanderbeg, but to go himselfe in person with such an armie as should at once make an end of his warres in Epirus for euer. Hereupon commissions were directed through all his kingdome, and an armie raised of two hundred thousand men: whereof Scanderbeg hauing certaine aduertisement, fortified all his cities and strong holds, especially the citie of Croia, vpon the fortune whereof, depended the whole state of his kingdome. Into this citie he put a strong garrison of his most valiant and faithfull souldiours; and thoroughly furnished the same with all things necessarie for the enduring of a long siege: and left one Balthasar Perduci (a graue and worthy captain) gouernour thereof. With like care he provided for the safetie of his other cities, and tooke order that the country people were either receiued into the strong townes, or else conuayed into other places of refuge: and left nothing abroad in the country for the Turkes to prey vpon, as he had in like case done long before, at the coming of old Amurath to the siege of Croia, as is before in his life declared.

Mahomet cometh to the siege of Croia.

By that time that Scanderbeg had set all things in order, his old friend Balabanus with eight thousand horsemen (the fore-runners of Mahomet his armie) were entered into Epirus, and ranging ouer the country two daies, came and sat downe before Croia: Vpon whom the gouernour at his first coming, made many brauesallies. In few daies after came Mahomet with his huge armie, and there encamped also. Who at his first coming summoned the citie, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him, vpon such vnreasonable conditions as it pleased himselfe (as the manner of the Turke is:) whereunto the worthy gouernour returned him no other answer, than by continuall thundring shot into his campe. Whereupon Mahomet caused such ordinance as he had, to be planted for batterie; and commanded other new to be cast, of such mettall as he had for that purpose brought in masse: all which he did rather to strike a terror into the minds of the defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the citie by force; knowing by his owne experience, that it was a place almost impregnable. Whilest Mahomet was thus busied and little or nothing preuailed, Scanderbeg lying abroad in the woods and mountaines with a small army of most valiant and couragious souldiours, continually cut off the forragers of Mahomet's armie, and such as brought in victuall or necessities for his campe: and many times in the night, suddenly brake into one quarter or other of the Turkes great camp with great slaughter, and with continuall alarmes neuer suffered them to rest in quiet. Mahomet seeing his army to decrease daily, and no hope of winning the citie but by famine, which would require a long siege, and fearing also to make that same place again famous by some notable mischance, which might happen vnto himselfe vnder the wals of Croia, as had before vnto his father Amurath; determined to returne himselfe to Constantinople, and to leaue Balabanus with a great part of his armie to continue the siege. Vpon which determination he committed the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the siege to Balabanus, joyning vnto him eight of his most expert captaines; yet so, as that they should be all at Balabanus his commaund. And so leauing with him three and twentie thousand of his best souldiours, and with euery one of the other eight captaines seuen thousand moe, departed himselfe with the rest of his armie from Croia towards Constantinople. But by the way as he went he tooke from Scanderbeg certaine small forts, and with faire promises corrupting the Gouernour of a place called Chirina, wherein eight thousand of Scanderbeg his souldiours lay, had the same deliuered into his power, vpon his faith before giuen, That all the souldiours with the rest of the people should in safetie depart thence. But after the tyrant had them in his power, without regard of faith or promise, hee caused them all most cruelly to be cut in peeces, sparing neither man, woman, nor child, to the great grieue and weakening of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before receiued so great a losse. And after hee had so ragged, hee in great melancholic returned vnto Constantinople.

Scanderbeg disdaining to haue his cheefe citie besieged by Balabanus, sometime one of the basest of his fathers subjects: and yet finding himselfe vnable to releue the same, for as much as his souldiours were with continuall warres fore wasted, and his warie enemies lay so encamped, as that they were not but by a strong armie to be removed, sent vnto the Venetians and other the confederat princes of Albania, Illyria, and Dalmatia, praying of them aid now at his need against that enemy, which preuailling against him, would forthwith set vpon them. All which princes promised forthwith to send their succours. At the same time also hee passed ouer into Italia secretly, and disguised in simple attire, came to Rome, to craue aid of Paulus the second of that name, then great Bishop: by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing of that he came for; so cold was his holy deuotion: onely at his departure hee gaua vnto Iunetrio, Scanderbeg his treasurer, a poore almes of three thousand duckats.

Scanderbeg returning into Epirus, found all such aid readie as was promised from the confederat princes, but especially from the Venetians, which was for most part drawne out of their garrisons of Scutari, Drivasto, Alyssa, and Dirrachium: so that hee had in few daies in his armie thirteene thousand foure hundred choice souldiours. With this strength he marched towards Croia: but vnderstanding by the way, that Ionima was within a daies journey coming with a new supplie to his brother Balabanus, hee drew out certaine troupes of his best horsemen: and coasting ouer the country in the night, suddainly came vpon the Turkes, and put them to flight; where amongst others, Ionima himselfe, with his sonne Hedar, were taken prisoners, whom he shewed the next day in bonds to Balabanus. This exploit so happily performed, he with all speed returned to his armie: and so marching to Croia, by plaine force driue the Turkes from the mountain Crivina, their greatest strength, and nearest to the citie of Croia. Which thing when Balabanus saw, he with certaine troupes of horsemen rid euen to the gates of the citie, perswading the defendants to yeeld the citie, making them in the name of his master such offers and promises as he thought might most moue them. But they nothing regarding his words, but rather incensed with his presumption, sallied out vpon him, and enforced him to retire: but he therewith enraged, and halfe mad for anger, came vpon them with a fresh charge, thinking by plaine force to haue driuen them backe into the citie. In which skirmish he was by one Georgius Alexius with a bullet shot quite through the throat; and feeling himselfe mortally wounded, setting spurs to his horse, ran as fast as he could to his campe, where he presently fell down from his horse and died. The Turkes discouraged with the death of their Generall, and the coming of Scanderbeg, rise the same night, and with great silence retired themselues vnto the plain of Tirana, about eight miles from Croia. Scanderbeg the next morning entering the forsaken tents of the Turkes, found therein great store of corne and other victuals, which he caused to be forthwith conueyed into the citie, and in great triumph followed after himselfe, to the great joy and comfort of his late besieged subjects: whom he highly commended for their fidelitie, and bountiully rewarded according to their deserts. The same day he sent certaine companies of souldiours to take the strait passages whereby the Turkes must needs passe in their returne out of Epirus; which when the Turkes vnderstood, they sent two messengers vnto Scanderbeg (who seemed to be men of good account in the armie) offering in the name of the rest of the captaines and commanders, to deliuer vnto him their horses and armes, so that they might in safetie depart with their liues. Which their request Scanderbeg propounding vnto his counsellors & captaines, was by them diuersly disgested. In conclusion, they receiued this answer from Scanderbeg himselfe, That as they came into his country without his commandement, so should they not by his leaue depart thence. The Turkes receiuing this short answer by their messengers, and considering that they must needs in that bare countrey in short time perish, either with famine or with the sword; the very same night departed from Tirana, and in the dead time of the night entering the aforesaid straits, by plaine force desperately brake through and escaped, but not without their great losse: for whose escape the common souldiours murmured greuously against Scanderbeg, and were not without much ado appeased. In short time after, Scanderbeg recovered all such places as Mahomet had before taken from him, and put to sword the souldiours he had left for the keeping of the same: which done, he brake vp his armie, retaining only two thousand horsemen and a thousand foot for the defence of his frontiers.

The Turkish tyrant hearing of the euill successe of his affaires in Epirus, as that his Generall was slaine, Croia releued, his armie discomfited, and all that he had done, brought to nought; fretted thereat exceedingly, and was therewith so much greued, that hee could not for a season eat or drinke or take rest, his discontented thoughts so much troubled him. In the end, to reme-die the matter, he resolved the next Spring to goe againe in person himselfe with a most puissant armie into EPIRVS, and so if it were possible, to make a full conquest thereof: of which his purpose Scanderbeg vnderstanding, prouided for his comming, as he had in former time. The Spring being come, Mahomet according to his former resolution, with a mightie armie entred into EPIRVS, and there with exceeding labour and charge first repaired or rather reedified the old ruines of the citie of VALMES, wherein he left a strong garison, of purpose to trouble that part of the countrey. From thence he marched to DIRRACHIVM (now called DVRAZZO, but of old time EPIDAMNVM) a citie vpon the sea coast, then in the possession of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Romane empire, but especially for the flight of the Romane Senate thither, and their entertainment there in the time of the ciuile wars betwixt Caesar and Pompeius. This citie Mahomet thought to haue taken vnprouided, and so vpon the suddaine to haue carried it; but was therein much deceiued, finding it strongly fortified and manned both by the Venetians and Scanderbeg. Where when he had there spent some time, and to his great losse in vaine attempted the citie, hee rose vpon the suddaine: and retiring into EPIRVS, came and sat downe againe before CROIA, of purpose by his suddaine comming to haue terrified the citizens: and vainely perswaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in DIRRACHIVM, for that in the assailing thereof he had discovered many of Scanderbeg his men, and thereby supposed him to haue bene there also; the greatest cause why he so suddenly rose and came to CROIA. At his first comming he offered great rewards and large priuiledges vnto the citizens, if they would forthwith yeeld vp their citie; otherwise he threatened vnto them all the calamities of warre, vowing neuer to depart thence before he had it: whereunto he received no other answer out of the citie than was sent him by the mouth of the Cannon, or brought him by many most braue sallies. Scanderbeg in the meane while continually molesting his campe, and euery night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what small purpose it would bee for him to lie there long, rose with his armie, & marched againe to the sea side to a place now called the head of REDON vpon the gulfes of VENICE, not farre from DIRRACHIVM, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new citie called CHIVRILL, not yet finished: which Mahomet in despite of the man, rased downe to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirors were retired into the mountaines, hee went to seeke them out, and was with great losse by those mountaine people repulled: Scanderbeg still following him at the heeles, and awaiting all oportunities, daily cut off part of his armie. So that at last the tyrant despairing of any good to bee done in that expedition, was glad to depart out of EPIRVS, hauing atcheued nothing worth his comming, and so full of discontentment and melancholie returned to CONSTANTINOPLE.

After all these great troubles, Scanderbeg rid ouer most part of EPIRVS, to view the state of his kingdome, and so at last came to LYSSA (a citie of the Venetians, which he had alwaies specially liked) there to conferre with the Venetian legate and other the confederate princes, of matters concerning their state in generall, as his manner was: but more particularly how they might take the citie of VALMES, which Mahomet had the last yeare built in the siegnorie of Aramites Comynat, and much troubled that part of EPIRVS. But whilest he lay there, he fell sicke of a feauer, which daily so encreased vpon him, that he became sicke euen vnto death: and now perceiving his end to draw nigh, sent for his wife and sonne, with the princes and lords his confederates, and the embassadours of the Venetians, into his bed chamber. Where after he had at large with greater paine notably discoursed of his troublesome life led amongst them, than he had before passed the same, and carefully forewarned them of the dangers like to ensue; he earnestly exhorted them to continue in vnitie and concord, and valiantly to stand in defence of their religion, countrey, and libertie. And afterwards turning his speech to his wife and his sonne, commended them both with his kingdome to the tuition of the Venetians: who by the articles of the consideration betwixt him and them, were in honour bound to protect his sonne and kingdome, during the time of his minoritie, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the same. In fine, he willed his wife after his death to passe ouer with her sonne into APLIA, where they might in safe and quiet liue vpon such possessions as he there held by the gift of king Ferdinand. And so after he had with most feruent prayer commended his soule into the hands of Almighty God, departed in peace the seuenteenth day of Ianuarie, in the yeare of our Lord 1466, when hee had liued about 53 yeares, and thereof reigned about 24. His death was worthily lamented of all Christian princes, but especially of the Venetians and princes of ALBANIA, who had now lost their most carefull watchman and inuincible champion: the sorrow of his subjects is not to bee expressed, euery man bewayling him, as the onely stay of the commonweale; and as if with him they had lost all their hope. His dead bodie was with the generall lamentation of all men royally buried in the cathedrall church of S. Nicholas at LYSSA: where it rested in peace, vntill that about nine yeares after, the Turkes comming to the siege of SCODRA, by the way tooke the citie of LYSSA, and there with great deuotion digged vp his bones, reckoning it in some part of their happinesse, if they might but see or touch the same: and such as could get any part thereof, were it neuer so little, caused the same to be set, some in siluer, some in gold, to hang about their neckes, or weare vpon their bodies; perswading themselves by the wearing thereof to be partakers of such good fortune and hap as had Scanderbeg himselfe whilest he liued: which is not vnaptly by Gabriell Fairnus of CREMONA, thus in verse expressed.

The bloudie bane of faithlesse Turkes, and terrour of their name, EPIRVS strong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame:
Within that tombe wherein long since, Great Castriotus lay;
But now those limbs and tombe defac'd, are carried quite away;
The remnants of that worthy wight out of his graue were torne:
And being dead could find no rest, but were for jewels worne.
For after he farre spent with age, gaue place to fatall doome,
And left his fathers kingdome got, and kept with great renoume:
Forthwith the cruell Turkes preuaile, and all things there possesse.
Who worshipping his stately tombe, and place of quiet rest, Dig'd vp his bones, and brake the tombe wherein he did remaine:
And glad was he that could thereof, some little part obtaine.
As if in them some martiall force, or vertue great had beene:
Or fortune rare, such as before in him was liuing scene.
So vertue which to others giues, a sepulture and graue, Bereft it him, yet forst his foe in honour it to haue.

Most part of the time of these warres betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by sea and the Hungarians by land, kept the Turkes throughly busied. Mathias Corvinus king of HUNGARIE (according to his promise made vnto the Venetians) entred into the kingdome of BOSNIA, where by force he ouerthrew the strong forts which the Turkes had built for the defence of their frontiers, and manfully draue them out before him vntill he came to IAZIGA (off some called IATZB) the chiefe citie of BOSNIA, which he at length tooke: and following the course of his victorie, scarcely suffered the Turkes to breath, vntill he had by force wrested all that kingdome out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieved, in great furie came with a strong armie into BOSNIA; and laid hard siege to IAZIGA, which was by the Christians right valiantly defended: vntill Mathias with a puissant armie came to the reliefe thereof, who so troubled the Turkes campe with continuall skirmishes on the one side, and they of the towne with desperat sallies on the other; that at length the prowde Turke was driuen to such extremitie, that he was glad secretly to steale away by night with all his army into SERVIA; and for halfe a leaue behind him both his tents and great ordinance, which (the Turkes histories report) he caused to be cast into the riuer, because it should not come into the hands of the Christians. Mathias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his enemies and relieved his citie, followed the Turkes into SARVIA, and tooke part of that countrey also, which together with BOSNIA he vniuered to the kingdome of HUNGARIE. In these warres, Mahomet had such prooffe of the force and power of Mathias and the Hungarians; that for a good while after he had no great stomache to prouoke them farther: for why, the name of Mathias was now become vnto the Turkes no lesse dreadful, than was sometime the name of his father the valiant Huniades.

The Venetians at the same time also with their gallies scoured the seas, and landing their men sometime in one place, sometime in another, did great harme in manie places of the Turkes dominion neere vnto the sea coast. Amongst other their generals at diuers times sent from that state, one Nicholas Canalis succeeding Lauretanus (whom we haue before spoken of) as soone as he had receiued his charge, came with his fleet into the bay of SALONICHI, and landing his men, burnt diuers townes and villages alongst the sea side. Afterwards returning into PLOfirst Emperour of the Turks.

PONESVS, he fortified the towne of LIGOSTICVM in the gulf of PATRAS, which worke the Turkes with their often skirmishes laboured to haue hindred, but in despite of all they could doe it was brought to perfection, and a strong garrison therein left for the defence thereof, which done, he returned againe to EVBEEA. Shordly after, he with the same fleet put to sea againe; and sayling alongst the coast of MACEDONIA and THRACIA, surpris'd the citie of ZENUS which standeth vpon the mouth of the riuer Meritza, called in auncient time Hebrus, vpon which riuer the famous cities ANDRINOPLE and PHILIPPOPOLIS are also situate. Canalis after he had taken the spoyle of the citie returned to his gallies, carrying away with him two thousand captiues into EVBEEA. At the same time also, the Venetians giuing aid vnto Nicholas Duchaine against his brother Alexius, then at variance for the principalltie of ZADRIMA, neere vnto the riuer of DRINO in EPIRVS, gaue a great ouerthrow to the Turkes which came in the quarrell of Alexius.

Mahomet not a little offended with the harmes done vnto him by the Venetians, and perceiving that the island of EVBEEA (now called NIGROPONTE) was for the commodious situation and strength thereof, the chiefe place from whence they wrought him all these wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired againe, as vnto a most sure place of refuge; determined with himselfe at once to be euen with them for all, and to imploy his whole forces both by sea and land, for the gaining of that place. This island of EVBEEA is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth ouer against that part of GRACIA which was of old called BAEOTIA, from whence it is separated with a narrow strait of the sea: it aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, fruit, and wood fit for shipping. The chiefe citie thereof, was in auncient time called CHALCIDE, and of later time NIGROPONTE, by which name also the whole island was knowne: albeit the Turkes now call it EGORIOS: a populous, rich, and strong cittie; so fortified with wals and bulwarks, that (in most mens iudgement) it seemed a place impregnable. Vnto this strong citie Mahomet resolved to lay siege, knowing well that vpon the fortune thereof depended the state of the whole island. Wherefore he assembled a mightie army, and made great preparation both by sea and land: and when all things were in readinesse, sent Mahomet (the great Bassa of the court) with a fleet of three hundred gallies, and certaine other small vessels well furnished with souldiours, mariners, and all things necessarie, by sea into EVBEEA: and with a great armie marched himselfe by land through ACHATA, vntill he came ouer against the citie of CHALCIS. The Venetian Admirall hearing of the comming of the Turkes fleet, set forward to haue met them neere vnto the straits of HELLESPOINTVS: but after he had by his espials descried the great number of the enemies fleet, finding himselfe too weake, shaped his course to the island of SCYROS. The Bassa comming out of the straits of HELLESPOINTVS, couered the sea with his fleet, and holding on his intended course, without let came to EVBEEA: where at his first landing, he tooke STORA and BASILICON, two small townes, which he rased to the ground, and from thence went directly to CHALCIS. As soone as this great fleet was there arriued, Mahomet caused a bridge to be made of his smaller vessels ouer the strait betwixt ACHATA and EVBEEA, whereby he passed all his armie, and so belaid the citie round both by sea and land. And after he had planted his batterie, began most furiously to shake the wals: wherein he had in short time made faire breaches, and the sooner for that one Thomas of LIBURNIA (chiefe canonier of the citie) before corrupted by the Turkes, by signes agreed vpon, gaue them certaine knowledge in what places the wals were weakest: whereby they so aptly planted their batterie, as if they had taken view on the inside of the wals. Which foule treason was at length perceiued, and the traitor therefore worthily executed. Yet little preuaile the tyrant thereby, for such was the industrie of the defenders, that whatsoeuer he had by the furie of his great ordinance beaten downe by day, that they with restlesse labour repaired againe by night. Thus was the siege continued thirtie daies, in which space many a sharpe assault was giuen by the Turkes, to their great losse; and the citie still valiantly defended by the Christians. At length the Venetian Admirall (to the great comfort of the besieged) came with his fleet within view of the cittie, making semblant as if he would haue giuen the Turkes battell. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to haue raised his siege, and haue got himselfe ouer into the maine, for feare the Venetians should with their gallies haue broken the bridge, and so haue shut him vp into that island: Which thing it was thought the admirall might haue done to his great praise, if he would as a courageous chieftaine haue aduentured the matter; as he was earnestly requested by the captaines of euerie priuat gally; who who generally grieved to see him so great a commander, to let slip so faire an opportunity. But he fearing to come any nearer, came to an anchor and shewed not, neither gaue any signe of comfort or reliefe to the besieged. Which thing the Turkish king quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged: hauing now in diuers places beaten downe the wals, and made them faultable; brought on his men to the breaches, promising them the spoile of the citie, with many other great rewards and hie preferments according to their particular desert, whereof he said he would himselfe be an eye-witnesse. Hereupon the Turkes gaue a most fierce and furious assault, which the defendants with inuincible courage receiued, and made such slaughter of them, that the ditches were filled, and the breaches made vp with the bodies of the dead Turkes. But such was the number of that populous armie (the greatest strength of the Turkes) that the living little felt the losse of the dead: Mahomet continually sending in new supplies of fresh men, in steed of them that were slaine or wounded: So that one could no sooner fall, but two or three step vp in his roome, and so successiue, as if new men had sprong out of the bodies of the dead. Twice they had euen woon the breaches, and were both times with wonderfull slaughter beaten out againe. This deadly and dreadfull assault, was maintained a whole day and a night without intermission. At length the defendants being for the most part slaine or wounded, and the rest wearied with long fight, and vnable to defend the towne now assaulted almost round, retired from the breaches into the market place, and there like resolute men, sold their liues at a deere price vnto the Turkes. Amongst the slaine Christians, were found the dead bodies of many notable women, who seeing the ruine of the citie, chose rather to die with their friends in defence thereof, than aliue to fall into the hands of their barbarous enemies.

the Turkes.

Mahomet being now become lord of the citie, and hauing lost fortie thousand of his Turkes in that siege, in reuenge thereof caused all the men that were found in the citie aliue, to be put to most cruell death, especially the Italians, vpon whom he shewed his tyrannie with most exquisite and horrible torments. Paulus Ericus gouernour of the citie, with a few others, who with him were fled into the castle, without resistance deliuered the same vnto him, vpon his faithfull promise, that they might in safetie depart: but after that he had got them into his power, the perfidious tyrant without regard, commaunded them all to be cruelly murdered. The gouernours daughter a maiden of incomparable beautie, was amongst the rest taken prisoner, and for her rare perfection, by them that tooke her presented to Mahomet, as the mirour of beautie. The barbarous tyrant greedie of so faire a prey, fought first by flattering words and faire persuasion, to induce her to consent to his desire: but when hee could not so preuaile, he fell into another vaine, and began to shew himselfe in his owne nature, threatening her with death, torture, and force, worse than death it selfe; if shee would not otherwise yeeld vnto his appetite. Whereunto the constant virgin (worthie eternall fame) answered so resolutely, and so contrarie to the tyrants expectation, that hee being therewith enraged, commaunded her to be presently slaine. The horrible and monstrous crueltie, with the filthy outrages by that beastly and barbarous people committed, at the taking of that citie, passeth all credit. CHALCIS thus woon, the rest of that fruitfull island without farther resistance yeelded vnto the Turkish slaue, vnder which it yet groaneth. This calamitie happened to the Venetian state, or rather (to say truly) to the generall hurt of the Christian common-weale, in the yeare of our redemption 1470.

The fruitfull island of Rhodus

Turkes.

Canalis the Venetian Admirall, who all the time of the siege, had in the sight of the citie lien at anchor as a looker on; fearing now that the citie was lost, to bee set vpon by the Turkes fleet, hoised saile, and laded with dishonour returned in hast vnto VENICE, where hee was by the commaundement of the Senat committed to prison, and afterward with all his family exiled to VINVM.

Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his armie out of EVBOA, and his fleet returned to CONSTANTINOPLE: the Venetians with their gallies, attempted to haue vpon the sudden surprised the citie, a little before lost. But Mahomet had therein left so strong a garrison, that when the Venetians had landed their men, they were againe enforced to retire to their gallies, and to forsake their island.

CHALCIS thus lost with all the island of EVBOA, the Venetians chose Petrus Mocenig, a valiant and discrete gentleman, Admirall of their fleet, in stead of Canalis: and by their embassadours solicited Sixtus the fourth of that name, then bishop of ROME, and Ferdinand king of NAPLES, with Lewis king of CYPRUS, and the grand master of the RHODES, to ioine their forces together with theirs against the great and common enemy: which thing all the aforesaid Christian princes promised them to doe. And the more to entangle the Turke, they at the same time sent Caterinus Zenus their embassadour with rich presents vnto Alymbicus Vsun-Cassanes, the great king of PERSIA, to incite him on that side against the Turke: in which negotiation Zenus so well behaved himselfe, that the next yeare following that great king tooke vp armes against Mahomet, and had with him mortall warres, as shall be in convenient place hereafter declared. Mahomet not ignorant of these proceedings of the Venetians, and that they did what they might to stirre vp as many enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were possible) into hatred with the whole world: and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the Christian princes with the crueltie he had of late vsed against them of CHALCIS, thought it not best as then further to prouoke them, and so happily to bring all at once about his eares, but for a season to lie still at CONSTANTINOPLE, as if he had bene desirous now to liue in peace, not meaning further harme: hoping thereby, that although he concluded no peace with any of them (which indeed he was not desirous of) yet that tract of time might mitigate the hainousnesse of the fact, and coole the heat of their displeasure: whereby it came to passe as hee wished, that nothing worth the speaking of was that yeare attempted against him. And because the Persian king was the man of whom he stood most in doubt, hee fought by his embassadours to pacifie him, and to withdraw him from the league of the Christians: requesting him, if it were for nothing els but for the communitie of the Mahometane religion, wherein they well agreed, and were thereby the professed enemies of the Christians, to withdraw his hand, and in their cause to cease to take vp armes: vrging now (for that it so stood with his purpose) the zeale of religion, whereas otherwise he regarded (as was thought) no religion at all. But Zenus the Venetian embassadour lying continually in the Persian court, so wrought the matter with Vsun-Cassanes, that hee told the Turkes embassadours plainly, That he could not nor would not longer endure the manifest iniurie and wrong done vnto him by the Turkish king: and farther, that hee had made a faithfull league with the Christian princes, and therefore would to the vttermost of his power make it knowne vnto the world, that he would effectuallie performe what thing soeuer he had promised: and so dismissed them, now no lesse discontented than were before the Persian embassadours: at such time as they returned from the Turkes court, hauing obtained nothing they then requested concerning the emperour of TRAPEZOND.

The yeare following, Mocenig the Venetian Admirall with his fleet arriued in the Isle of 1472 LESBOS, where he did great harme. From thence hee passed the bay of ADRAMITTIVM into the lesser ASIA, and sore spoiled the countrey about PERGAMVS. After that hee landed againe at CNIDVS vpon the coast of CARIA, where he tooke a great bootie: and so hauing done the Turkes exceeding much harme in ASIA all along the sea coast opposit to GRÆCIA, he returned laden with spoile towards PELOPONNESVS. In his returne, about the promontorie of MALEA, vpon the coast of PELOPONNESVS, he met with Richienfis comming vnto him with seuentene gallies from king Ferdinand: by whom hee was certified, that the great Bishops fleet was readie to come forth also. After mutuall gratulation, as the manner at sea is, the Admirals joining in their fleets in one, landed at METHONE, now called MODON, then a citie of the Venetians in PELOPONNESVS: where after they had well refreshed their souldiours, and taken in fresh victuals, they put to sea againe: and sailing through the Islands, landed in ASIA, where they were at their first landing encountered by the countrey Turkes, whom at last they put to flight, and by the space of foure daies tooke what pillage they could in the countrey: where the souldiours found great store of rich bootie, especially of Turkie carpets, which are there made in great abundance. From thence they sayled to HALICARNASSVS, which is a part of CARIA (where sometime stood the starily tombe which queene Artemesia built for her husband Mausolus, accounted amongst the wonders of the world) where they tooke a wonderfull spoile. There came vnto them Nicholas Bishop of MODRVS, with twentie gallies sent from the great Bishop: whom the other two Generals welcommed with great joy. At the same time also came thither two gallies from the great master of the RHODES. With this fleet of 85 gallies, they sailed to the Isle of SAMOS ouer against EPHESVS (sometime a place of great fame, but then altogether desolate and vnpeopled) there to consult for their further proceeding in those warres. Loosing from SAMOS, they tooke their course along the coast of ASIA, and landed at ATTALIA, the cheefe citie of

of PAMPHILIA, a place of great trafficke: where they found in the suburbs of the citie great store of many rich commodities, brought thither out of EGYPT and SYRIA; whereof they tooke what pleased them, and burnt the rest, together with the suburbs. Vnto the citie it selfe they began to lay siege, but perceiuing that it was not without great losse of their men to be taken, they departed thence: and running all alongst the coast of PAMPHILIA, burnt and destroyed what came in their way, and so returned backe againe to the RHODES: where they met an embassadour from Vsun-Cassanes the Persian king, to the bishop and the Venetians, for great ordinance: whereof that so mightie a prince was altogether vnfurnished. Of this embassadour they vnderstood, that Vsun-Cassanes was entered into league with the Christian princes, and now busie in making preparation against the Turke. At which time Mahomet requited the Venetians with no lesse harme in EPHROS and DALMATIA, than they had done to him in ASIA: for now that Scanderbeg was dead, the Turkes mightely preuailed vpon the weake princes of EPHROS and ALBANIA, with the countries adioyning. The Christian fleet departing from the RHODES, landed in the countrey of the Myndians, a part of CARIA, and with great spoile returned to the Island of NAXOS, one of the CYCLADES: from whence king Ferdinand his gallies returned home, laded with much rich spoile; for now the yeare was farre spent. Yet after the departure of the kings gallies, Mocenicus with the Legate returned backe againe into ASIA, and there landing their men, tooke the famous citie of SMYRNA in IONIA, and when they had taken the spoile thereof, set it on fire. At which time also they did great harme about CLAZOMENE, not far from SMYRNA. So Winter drawing now fast on, they returned laded with the rich spoiles of ASIA, the Legate into ITALIE, and Mocenicus to METHONE.

The insatiable desire of soueraigntie, whereunto the Turkish king was naturally endined, had continually armed him, not onely against the Christian princes, but against others also euen of his owne superstition: making no great difference betwixt the one & the other, if so he might extend his dominion. He had long before vnder the pretence of a friendly parley craftely circumuented the king of MYSIA, a countrey in ASIA, and hauing got him within his danger, cruelly put him to death, and by force subduing his kingdom, left not one of the kings blood aliue. After that he inuaded CILICIA, which the Turkes call CARAMANIA, where the two young brethren, Pyramet and Cassambet reigned, and draue them both out of CILICIA: of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to Vsun-Cassanes; Cassambet the younger, assisted by his old friends, sought by force of armes to recouer againe his inheritance wrongfully by the Turkes possessed, and was besieging certaine townes vpon the sea coast, which being taken from the Turkes would easily draw all the rest of the kingdom after them. Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall being now with the first of the Spring come vpon the coast of CILICIA, at the request of Cassambet landed certaine companies of his men vnder the leading of Nictor Superantius, and certaine peeces of great artillerie, wherewith he so battered the wals of SICHINVM, that hee enforced the Turkes therein to yeeld vp the citie: which he deliuered to Cassambet. In like manner he tooke the citie of CORYCVS, which he also restored to Cassambet. At last hee laid siege to SILEVCIA, which standeth vpon the riuer ORONTS, and was built by king Seleucus, one of the successors of Alexander the Great, distant from the sea about fise miles: the Governour of this citie discouraged with the sight of the great artillerie, deliuered the citie to the Venetian captain, who by the appointment of the Admirall restored the same to Cassambet. Who by this means brought againe into his kingdom, gaue great thanks vnto the Admirall, promising both for himselfe and for his brother to be alwayes friends vnto the Venetians. Mocenicus departing from CILICIA, landed his men in LYCIA, and harried that countrey all alongst the sea coast: After this Mocenicus sailed into CYPRVS, to appease a great insurrection there raised against the queene, who was by her husband at his death left to the protection of the Venetians: which rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadanus Gritius, was by the decree of the Senate appointed Admirall, and already come into PLOPONISVS, he with as much speed as he could hastened thither, to giue vp his charge, and so to returne home againe to VENICE.

About this time the great Persian king Vsun-Cassanes began to make warre vpon the Turkish emperor Mahomet, for the better vnderstanding whereof, it shall not be from our purpose briefly to shew by what meanes this Vsun-Cassanes, of a small prince aspired to the kingdom of PERSIA, and so in short time grew to that greatnesse, that he was iustly accounted amongst the greatest monarchs of the world then liuing; as appeareth by these warres betwixt him and the great Turkish

Turkish emperor Mahomet. This Vsun-Cassanes of whom we now speake, was the sonne of that Tachretin, who with other poor princes was driuen into exile by the violence of Baiazet the first, great grandfather to this Mahomet the great emperor of the Turks; and was againe restored by the great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Baiazet. By the death of Tachretin, his sonne Vsun-Cassanes (of some called also Asymbeius) obtained that small territorie which his father had in ARMENIA: nothing answering vnto the greatnesse of his conceits. *W*herefore not contented with such possessions as was from his father descended vnto him, he began to shoulder for more roome, with such weake princes his neighbours as he thought he might best deale withall; wringing one province from this prince, another from that, and thrusting some others quite out of all that they had: And in short time so enlarged his dominion, that he had got into his hands a great part of ARMENIA, and was reputed both for a mightie and fortunat prince. Infomuch, that Calo Ioannes then emperor of TRAPEZONDE (whose power altogether answered not to the greatnesse of his stile, being for most part shut vp within the bounds of PONTVS; and fearing the greatnesse of the Turkish emperor Mahomet, whose name began then to grow dreadfull vnto his neighbour princes) gaue to him his onely daughter Despina in marriage: by such aliance to strengthen himselfe against the Turkish tyrant, if need should require. At which marriage it was agreed, that Vsun-Cassanes should in the right of his wife enjoy all the kingdom of PONTVS, after the death of Calo Ioannes her father, and of Dauid his brother: and that Despina should so long as she liued haue the free exercise of her Christian religion. By this woman, Vsun-Cassanes had a daughter called Martha, whom I willingly remember, for that she was the mother of Hyfmael, afterwarwards the great king of PERSIA, commonly called Hyfmael the Sophi: of whom more shall be said hereafter in the life of Selymus. Vsun-Cassanes honoured with this great marriage, and strengthened with this new alliance, ceased not after his wonted manner daily to encroch vpon his neighbour princes: and proceeded so farre, that at length he began to lay hand vpon a part of ARMENIA, which was then part of the dominion of the Persian king. Zenza (whom some call Trokies, which was indeede the name of his father) reigning then in PERSIA, by his embassadours admonished and in fort commaunded Vsun-Cassanes to hold himselfe content with his owne, or at least with that he had already wrongfully taken from others, and not to presume to come within the bounds of his dominion, threatening otherwise to take him as an enemie to his state, and to turne his forces vpon him. *W*ith which embassage Vsun-Cassanes being much offended, gaue the embassadours no entertainment, but commanded them with speed to get them out of his kingdom, and to tell their master, That he would shortly himselfe in person come and debate the matter with him face to face. *W*ith which proud answer from so meane a prince, the Persian king moued, leuied such an armie for the inuading of him, as was thought to haue bene sufficient to haue subdued a farre greater prince: and so appointed, set forward toward ARMENIA. Vsun-Cassanes much inferiour to this great king in wealth and number of men, but not in haughtinesse of mind and valiantnesse of courage, staied not to expect the comming of so puissant an enemie, but full of hope set forward to meet him, & by great Iournies sought to come vpon him before he could haue any knowledge of his comming: yet had he then in his armie scarcely one man to ten, but all armed with courageous hearts, and conducted by a most fortunat chieftaine which feared nothing. So holding on his way, at length he met with the great armie of the Persians, with whom he presently joyned battell; and after a long and cruell fight, ouerthrew them in the plaine field, with such a slaughter, as might well haue weakned the forces of a right great kingdom. The great king more enraged than discouraged with this ouerthrow, raised a farre greater armie than before, the verie strength of his kingdom: resolving now not to send anie more his lieutenants, but to goe in person himselfe against so desperat an enemie. All things being in readinesse, hee set forward, and at length met with the Armenian prince, whom he found as readie to giue battell as he was at the first. So being both desirous to trie their fortune, they joyned battell; wherein the Persians were againe discomfited and put to flight, and mo of them slaine in that battell, than were brought into the field in the first armie. Zenza the Persian king was there slaine with Vsun-Cassanes his owne hand, and Cariaphus his sonne taken prisoner: whom the Armenian prince vsed with the greatest honour could be deuised, giuing vnto him the honour and title due vnto the Persian king, taking vnto himselfe the bare name of the protectour of the Persian state. *W*hich he did onely to please the Persians, and to keepe them quiet vntill he had got some more assured possession session of that kingdome. But after hee had in the two former battels broken their great strength, and then vnder the colour of a peaceable gouernour got into his power the regall cite of TAVRIS, with the rest of the cities and strong places of that great kingdome, and that all men had him now in great reuerence and admiration for his great vertues: hee secretly dispatched out of the way the poore titular king his prisoner (the last of the posteritie of the mightie Tamerlane) and tooke vpon himselfe the highest place, which admitteth no partner. Whilst this restlesse prince was thus tumbling in the world, and not yet well settled in his new gotten kingdome, Mahomet the Turkish emperour no lesse ambitious than himselfe, had scornfully rejected the embassadours and presents which Vsun-Cassanes had sent: and hauing shamefully put to death Dauid the emperour of TRAPEZONDE his aliance, had conuerted all the kingdome of PONTVS (which Vsun-Cassanes of right claimed, as his wiues dowrie) into the forme of a province, and so vnitid it vnto the Turkish empire. Which so manifest a wrong, Vsun-Cassanes in the newnesse of his so late atchieued greatnesse, durst not aduenture to redresse: but after that he was surely feared, and had with the course of time ouercome all dangers at home, being daily prickt forward with the remembrance of the former injuries (still suggested by the importunite of his wife Despina) and the solicitation of the Venetians, to whom he had by solempne promise bound himselfe; he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to trie his forces vpon his proud enemy the Turkish emperour. Hereupon he raised a great armie, and being well appointed of all things necessarie, passing through ARMENIA toward PONTVS, neere vnto the river EUPHRATES, was encountred by Mustapha (Mahomet his eldest sonne, a young prince of great hope) and Amurath the great Bassa of ROMANIA, whom Mahomet (fearing such a matter) had sent before with a strong armie out of EVROPE to joyne with such forces as Mustapha had already raised in ASIA, so to withstand the inuasion of the Persian. These two great commaunders Mustapha and Amurath joyning battell with Vsun-Cassanes, were by him in the plaine field overthrowne; where Amurath the great Bassa himselfe with thirrie thousand Turkes were slaine: Mustapha with the rest of the armie, by shamefull flight sauing themselves.

Two huge armies of the Turkes and Persians in fight together.

Now when Mahomet vnderstood that Amurath was slaine and his armie discomfited, he was therewith exceedingly troubled. But purposing to be thereof reuenged, gaue order into all parts of his dominions for the leuying of new forces: so that at the time by him appointed, was assembled a great and mightie armie of three hundred and twentie thousand men. Vsun-Cassanes in like manner was in the field with an armie, nothing in number inferiour vnto his enemy. These two Mahometane kings, drawing after them their huge armies, met together neere the mountaintaines of ARMENIA: where, at the first encounter, one of the Turkes greatest Bassas was slaine with fortie thousand Turkes. With which hard beginning the proud tyrant was so daunted, that he could hardly be perswaded to proue his fortune anie farther, but contenting himselfe with that losse, was about to haue retired: and had vndoubtedly so done, if some of his most expert and valiant captaines which might be bold with him, had not sharply reprovied him, that hauing so populous an armie as scarcely felt that small losse, he should once thinke of returning without victorie. With which their comfortable perswasions, he was againe encouraged to giue battell. Yet for his more safetie, he withdrew his armie into a strait betwixt two mountaines, and with his cariages fortified the front thereof, as with a trench: behind which cariages, he placed his great ordinance, and on either side his archers. The Persians, as men of great valour, and thereto encouraged with their former victories, came on as men fearing no perill, to haue charged the Turkes euen in their strength; presenting their whole armie before they were aware, to the mouth of the Turkes artillerie: which suddenly discharged amongst the thickest of them, brake their rankes, and tooke away a number of them. Besides that, the Persian hostes terrified with the vnacquainted and thundring report of the great ordinance, were not to be ruled by their riders, but starting backe, ran some one way, some another, as if they had felt neither bit nor rider. Which their confusion Mahomet perceiuing, presently tooke hold of the occasion offered, and with his horsemen fiercely charged them, being now by themselves entangled and out of order. Neuerthelesse the Persians made great resistance, and slew manie of the Turkes: but still fighting confusedly and out of order, they were at the last enforced to flie. In which fight a great number of them were slaine, and their tents also taken. Zeinal Vsun-Cassanes his eldest sonne, labouring to stay the flight of the Persians, was slaine with a small shot. So the honour of the day remained with the Turkes: yet had they no great cause to brag of their winnings, hauing lost in that battaile fortie thousand souldiours: whereas of the Persians fell not aboue ten thousand. Mahomet contenting himselfe with this deere bought victorie, returned homewards. And Vsun-Cassanes leauing another of his sonnes with his armie for the defence of ARMENIA, returned likewise to TAVRIS. But whilst the Christian princes were in their greatest expectation what might bee the euent of these warres betwixt these two mightie Mahometane kings; they vpon the suddaine concluded a peace, and confirmed the same with new affinitie, excluding the Christians quite out of the same. This last battell betwixt Mahomet & Vsun-Cassanes, was fought in the yeare of our Lord 1474, about foure yeares before the death of Vsun-Cassanes; who died the fifth of Ianuarie, in the yeare 1478.

In the time of these warres died the noble Mustapha, Mahomet his eldest sonne, at ICONIUM, hauing spent himselfe with reuelling amongst his paragons: or as some write, commanded to die by his father vpon this occasion. This youthfull prince vpon a time coming to the court to see his father (or as they teame it, to kisse his hand) became amorous of the wife of Achmetes Bassa (a ladie of incomparable beautie) and daughter to Isaack Bassa, the chiefe men in the Turkish empire, next vnto Mahomet himselfe: but finding no meanes how to compasse her in whom his soule liued, he awaited a time, when as shee (after the manner of the Turkes) went to bathe her selfe: and there as he found her all discoabed, shamefully forced her, without regard either of his owne honour or of hers. Of this so foule an outrage, Achmetes her husband, with his clothes and hat all rent for madnesse, came and greiuously complained to Mahomet, craving vengeance for the same: vnto whom Mahomet againe replied: Art not thou thy selfe my slaue? and if my sonne Mustapha haue knowen thy wife, is shee not my bondslaue hee hath had to doe withall? cease therefore thus to complaine, and hold thy selfe therewith content: Neuerthelesse, hee in secret sharply reprovied his sonne for so hainous and dishonourable a fact by him committed, and commanded him out of his sight: and as hee was of a seuerer nature, caused him within a few dayes after to be secretly strangled. Neuerthelesse, the wrong done vnto the Bassa, sunke so deep into his haughtie mind, as that he would neuer admit excuse therefore, but put away his wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him and the great Bassa Isaack, his father in law: and in fine, the very cause of his vtter destruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Baiazer.

Mahomet deliuered of his greatest feare, by the peace he had lately concluded with Vsun-Cassanes the Persian king, was now at good leisure to employ all his forces against the Christians. And bearing a deadly hatred against the princes of EPIRVS and ALBANIA, with a wonderfull desire to extend his empire vnto the Ionian and Adriaticke, that he might from thence but looke toward ITALIE, which he began now to long after: he determined with himselfe first to subdue those countries, as standing in his way, both for the inuasion of ITALIE, and of the territories of the Venetians. And for as much as the strong cittie of SCODRA (otherwise called SCYTARIA) then in the possession of the Venetians, for the commodious situation thereof seemed to giue him the best entrance into the countries of ALBANIA, EPIRVS, DALMATIA, and to such cities as the Venetians held alongst the sea coast, he resolved there to begin his wars.

This citie was of great strength, as well for the naturall situation thereof, as for the strong fortifications therein made by the hand of man, which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of: but presuming of his owne strength and power, vainely perswaded himselfe, that no place was now able long to hold out gainst him. Wherefore hauing prepared all things fit for the besieging thereof, he sent Solyman Bassa, an Eunuch (whom hee had made his lieutenant Generall in EVROPE, in the place of Amurath Bassa, before slaine by Vsun-Cassanes) with eightie thousand souldiours to besiege SCODRA. This great Bassa according to his charge came, and with great pompe encamped round about the citie, the five and twentieth of May. Shortly after hauing planted his batterie, hee began most furiously to shake the wals, and ceased not by all meanes hee could deuise to trouble the defendants: and when he had by force of the cannon done what hee could, gaue diuers sharpe assaults vnto the citie, but was still with great losse valiantly repulsed by them of the citie. Long it were to declare, how often and in what terrible manner that warlike Bassa, Mahomet his chiefe captain, attempted to haue woon the citie: as also to shew how they of SCODRA directed by their worthie Gouernour Antonius Lauretanus, valiantly defended themselves and their citie: nothing was omitted, that the enemy could doe or deuise for the gaining thereof; but all his deuises and attempts were so met withall by the defendants, that they serued him to no other purpose but to the destruction of his people. With the Bassa thus lay at the siege of SCODRA

Solyman Bassa besiegeth Scodra with an armie of eightie thousand men.

DRA, Mocenius hauing receiued such commaundement from the Senate, came and joynd him selfe to Gritius the new Admirall, who then lay with his fleet in the mouth of BOLYANA, a great riuer running out of the lake whereupon the citie of SCODRA standeth. These two great commaunders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderfull consent did what they might for the furtherance of the common good, a thing not common: first they put strong garrisons, with all things necessarie, into CHOLCHINVM, LYSSA, DIRRACHIVM, and other cities of their signorie vpon the sea coast. After that they went vp the riuer BOLYANA with certaine gallies, and came within sight of SCODRA, and there by fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the defendants as with an assured promise of reliefe: which thing it greened the Turkes to behold, who therefore went about to haue shut in those same gallies with a great chaine drawne crosse the riuer, where it was narrowest betwixt them and the sea: but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their gallies slew five hundred of the Turkes, and wounded diuers others, and so returned againe to sea. It was afterward attempted by the aforesaid Admirals, if a new supplie might haue bene put into the citie: but the enimie had so beset the same, that it was not possible to be done. In the meane time, Mathias king of HUNGARIE (receiuing a great yearly portion of the Venetians for the defence of their countries against the Turke) hearing that SCODRA was besieged, began to make such spoile in the Turkes dominions bordering vpon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Bassa from the siege of SCODRA, to defend his owne frontiers. So the Bassa after he had lien three months with his great armie at the siege, and lost foureteene thousand of his men, whereof the greatest part died of sicknesse taken by long lying in the rotten moorish ground neere vnto the riuer, by commaundement from his master tie with his armie and departed. The Venetians also, which lay all that while thereabout in their gallies, were toucht with the same contagion: Triadanus Gritius died thereof, and Mocenius, the other Admirall fell thereof dangerously sicke; but being somewhat recovered, returned home, and was shortly after for his good seruice chosen duke of VENICE, Marcellus the old duke being then dead. With this dishonour taken at SCODRA, Mahomet was so discontented, that he appointed a yearly fee vnto one, to put him in mind dayly of the siege of SCODRA.

The same yeare that this great Bassa Solyman had in vaine besieged SCODRA, hee was afterward sent with a great armie into VALACHIA, where he was so entangled in the woods and fens by Stephanus the Vayuod, that hee lost all his armie, and with much adoe escaped himselfe by the wonderfull swiftnesse of a mare whereon he rid.

The yeare following, which was the yeare 1476, Mahomet sent out a great fleet to sea, vnder the conduct of Gedules Achmetes, his chiefe counsellour and man of warre, (whose very name was dreadfull in all places where hee came) in hope to haue by treason surpris'd the Island of CRETE: But that plot was in good time by the Venetians perceiued, the traitors executed, and he of his purpose disappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpose for CRETE, & sent the same Achmetes with his fleet into the Euxine (or as the Turkes call it, the Blacke sea) to besiege the rich citie of CAPPA. This citie was in ancient time called THEODOSIA, situate in the country of TAVRICA CHERSONESVS, fast by the sea side, and had of long time bene in possession of the Genowayes, and was a place of exceeding great trade, vntill that this great emperor Mahomet hauing taken CONSTANTINOPLE, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his strong castles built vpon the straits of HELLESPONTVS and BOSPHORVS, taken away both the trafficke of marchants into those seas, and all possible meanes for the Genowayes to send succour to that citie: yet it is credibly reported, that one valiant captain vndertooke to carrie his companie (in number not about an hundred and fiftie men) by land from GENVA to CAPPA, not much lesse than two thousand miles, and worthely performed what hee had vndertaken. Achmetes comming thither with his fleet, enclosed the citie both by sea and land: which deuised in it selfe by reason of the diuers disposition of the inhabitants, being of diuers nations, some Genowayes, some Greekes, some Armenians, but most Tartars, could not long hold out, but was in short time giuen vp to the Bassa, vpon condition, That the Genoway marchants, who were there both in number many and exceeding rich, might in safetie depart thence with their wealth. Which promise the Bassa performed not: but when he was possessed of the citie, sent such as he thought good to CONSTANTINOPLE, and commaunded the rest vpon paine of death not to depart thence, or to conuay away from thence any part of their substance. In short time after, the whole country of TAVRICA CHERSONESVS yeelded vnto the Turkish obedience. At which time time also the Tartar princes, namely the Precopenfes and Destenses, terrified with the greatieffe of the Turke, cowardly yeelded themselves as tributaries vnto him; euer since which time they haue liued a most seruile and troublesome life, subject to euerie commaund of the Othoman emperours: for whom they haue done great seruice manie times in their warres, against the Persians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Translyuanians, and Germanians, as in the proceffe of this historie well appeareth; and as the aforesaid nations their neighbours, with others also farther off, haue euen of late to their great losse felt.

Although the Venetians had in these late warres lost the great and fertile island of EVBEA, with the strong citie of CHALCIS, the surest harbour for their gallies: yet held they still diuers strong townes and commodious hauens by the sea coast, both within PELOPONESVS and without, as METHONE, CORONE, TENARVS, NAVACTVM and others: which standing as it were in the bosome of his empire, Mahomet sore longed after. And therefore to satisfie his ambitious desire, sent Solyman (the great Bassa of EVROPE) with a strong fleet into PELOPONESVS: who entring the gulf of CORINTH, at his first comming laied siege to NAVACTVM, now called LEPANTO, a citie standing in the gulf of CORINTH, in the countrey of OZOLAE neere vnto LOCNIS, ouer-against PELOPONESVS. Antonius Laurettanus (for his late good seruice done in defending of SCODRA) made Admirall for the Venetians, came with speed to NAVACTVM, and in despite of the enimie, so furnished the citie, both with men and whatsoeuer else was needfull, that the Bassa now out of hope to win the citie, rise vpon the sudden with his armie, and in a great furie departed, after he had lien there foure moneths. In this fret returning towards CONSTANTINOPLE, he put certaine companies of his men to shoare in the island of LEMNOS, in hope to haue vpon the sudden surpris'd the citie COCINVM: but as they were about to haue entred, they were contrarie to their expectation manfully resisted, by such Christians as by chance were next the gate. Where the notable courage of Marulla (a maiden of that citie) was much commended: who seeing her father slaine in the gate, tooke vp the weapons that lay by him, and like a fierce Amazon notably reuenged his death, desperately fighting in defence of other countrey with those few which were there at the first; and so kept the Turkes out vntill the rest of the citizens (mooued with the alarum) came to the gate, and forced them (not without some losse) to retire againe to their gallies. Not long after, Laurettanus came thither with his fleet: but before his comming, the Bassa was departed thence for CONSTANTINOPLE, hauing in this expedition done nothing that was expected at his hands.

Mahomet after the death of Scanderbeg, ceased not from time to time by one of his great captaines or other to invade EPYRVS, and the other parts of ALBANIA; and so gaining sometime one part, and sometime another, had subdued most part thereof. And about this time, his armie lay at the siege of CRIOIA: for reliefe whereof, the Venetians (in whose protection it was) sent Franciscus Contarenius a noble gentleman their lieutenant, with such forces as were sufficient for the raising of the siege. He finding the Turkes in the plaine of TRANNA, gaue them battell; which for a great while stood doubtfull, at length victorie inclining to the Venetians, the Turkes began to flie: after whom, the Venetians made no great pursuit, but contented to haue put them to flight, tooke their tents, with such forts as they had raised against the citie. Thus whilest the Venetians thinke themselves in sure possession of the victorie, and out of feare of their enemies, they were through their owne too much securitie, by and by themselves ouerthrowne: For whilest the common souldiours hauing their minds more set vpon the spoile than vpon the pursuit of the enimie (the battell as yet scarce ended) scatter themselves; and the captaines were consulting whither they should lodge that night (which began then to approach) in the enemies tents or not: in the midst of their consultation, the Turkes hauing perceiued their disorder, suddenly returned againe vpon them, and without great resistance ouerthrew them, and put them to flight. In which flight, a thousand of them fell; amongst whom Contarenius the Generall, and diuers others of good place and calling were slaine also. This ouerthrow, the Venetians tooke a great deale better than that which shortly after followed, in the confines of ITALY at the riuer of Sontium.

Mahomet hauing conquered a great part of ALBANIA, and daily encroching vpon the Christians, made diuers incursions into the countries of DALMATIA, HISTRIA, and CARNIOLA, yea and sometime went so farre, that he with his Turkes entred into the prouince of FRIVLI, called in ancient time FORVM IVLII, a part of the Venetian seignorie; and so carried away with them manie prisoners with much spoile. For remedie whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and wonderfull labour fortified alongst the riuer of Sontium from GORITIA to the fens of AQUILEA, the space of twelue miles, and there built two forts, wherein they continually kept strong garrisons for the defence of the country. Whereby the country people thinking themselves now in safetie, began to fall into securitie (the dangerous sicknesse of all common weales) neglecting by their carefull watch, to foresee a farre off the enemies comming, as they had before vsed. It fortun'd at this time, that Aly-Beg (whom some call Marbecke) one of the Turkes great capitaines, vpon the sudden when no such things was feared, came and shewed himselfe in an euening vpon the farther side of the riuer of Sontium, with a thousand horsemen: vpon the sight of whom, an alarum was raised in both forts, and euerie man put himselfe in readinesse, as if they should euen presently haue joynd battell. But it was so nie night, as that nothing could as then be done: yet the Venetian garrisons joyning themselves together, watcht all that night in armes. There was at that time in both these forts, three thousand horsemen and some few companies of footmen, all vnder the commaund of Hieronimus Nowell Countie of VERONA, a famous capitaine of that time: who with the rest of the capitaines resolued if hee could, to keepe the Turkes from passing the riuer; if not, then to giue them battell. Marbecke Generall of the Turkes armie, taking good view of the place, in the night time secretly conuaied a thousand of his best souldiours ouer the riuer, foure miles off, in such a place as the Venetians feared least, deeming it impossible for anie man there to haue passed ouer. These men he appointed to lie close in ambush behind a great hill in sight, not farre from the other side of the riuer, and vpon a signe giuen, presently to discouer themselves and charge the enemy. The next morning verie early he sent certaine troupes of his readiest horsemen ouer the riuer, which by offering to skirmish with the Venetians, might so draw them into the field; and then as men in doubt whether to fight or to flie, to tole them on vnto the place where the ambush lay. The Venetians had diuided themselves into three battalions; wherof the Generall himselfe had the leading of the first, who seeing these disordered troupes comming to skirmish with him, encountred them fiercely, and easily put them to flight, being so determined before, and in that flight earnestly pursued them: especially the Countie sonne, a valiant young gentleman, who with others like himselfe, thought by that daies good seruice to gaine vnto themselves great honour. When the Turkes Generall saw that the Venetians following the chase, were gone a great way from the riuer, he forthwith passed ouer with the rest of his armie, and followed the Venetians at the heeles: which the Turkes which before fled now beholding, turned againe vpon their fierce enemies, and valiantly withstood them. At which verie instant, the other Turkes vpon signe giuen arising out of ambush, came downe from the hill LICINIS, with such violence & clamor, that the Venetians therewith discouraged, would haue fled if they could haue told which way: but they were on euerie side so beset, that there was no way left for them to escape: but were there all slaine, except some few which yekeld themselves and so were saved. The other two battalions of the Venetians, discouraged with the slaughter of the first, fled incontinently; and in flying, were manie of them slaine. In this battell the Countie himselfe with his sonne, and manie other notable gentlemen and halfe the horsemen, were lost. The Turkes encouraged with this victorie, the next day spoiled all the country of FRIVLI, betwixt the riuers of Sontium (otherwise called Lisonzo) and Tiliauentum, and cruelly burnt all the country before them: so that at once an hundred countrey villages were to be seene on a light fire together; which stood so thicke, that it seemed as if one continuall fire had wholly couered all the face of the country. The barbarous Turkes laden with the spoile of that rich country, and driuing before them great numbers of miserable captiues as if they had beene flocks of sheepe, returned to Sontium. But when they had passed the riuer, and had travelled homeward one daies journey, and all men thought they had now beene quite gone; they suddenly returned backe againe, and posting through the countrey they had before spoiled, came to the riuer of Tiliauentum, which they desperatly passed, and did no lesse harme on that side the riuer, than they had before on the other: and so carrying away with the what they pleased, returned by the same way they came, hauing filled all that part of ITALY with terror and feare. This overthrow at Sontium, the Venetians account amongst the greatest losses which they receiued from the Turkes in all these their long warres.

The countrey of Friuis spoiled by the Turkes.

The next yeare about Haruest, the Turkes came againe with a farre greater power; and passing the riuer of Sontium, came before the forts at GRADISCA, where Carolus Fortebrachius lay lay with a strong garrison of the Venetians, offering him skirmish, so to haue drawne him into the field. But the watie capitaine considering the great strength of the enemy, and the losse receiued the yeare before, would not be drawne out of his strength, but stood vpon his guard, expecting to take the enemy at some more aduantage: which thing the Turkes fearing, durst not dispute themselves abroad for the spoile of the countrey, leauing so strong a garrison of the enemies behind them. And therefore when they had gone about foure miles into the countrey, they turned their course vp into the mountaines (which are part of the Alpes) towards GERMANIA, and there grieuously spoiled the mountainie people: strangely passing through those abrupt and hie mountaines with their horses, where men could hardly either go or stand on foot without something to stay vpon. And so when they had done what harme they could, taking a great compasse about, returned home another way.

Mahomet remembering the shamefull repulse hee had about foure yeares before receiued at SCODRA, and hauing the name of that citie daily sounding in his eares; determined now once againe to gage his whole forces vpon the winning thereof, and so to giue peace to his ambitious desires. And because he would not againe be dishonored with that he purposed to take in hand, he gaue out order into all parts of his dominions, both in EVROPA and ASIA, for the assembling of his best souldiours and men of warre. Now when all things were in readinesse, and such an armie assembled as he seldome or neuer had a stronger; first he sent forth Aly-Beg (warden of the frontiers of his kingdome alongst the riuer Danubius) with eightie thousand of the souldiours called Achanziz, towards SCODRA. These Achanziz are horsemen, which for their good seruice according to their deserts, haue certaine lands giuen them by the king to liue vpon during their liues; for which they are of duetie bound to serue vpon their owne charge as the forerunners of the Turke his armie, whensoever he goeth to besiege anie place: These be they which first enter into the enemies countrey, burning and spoiling what they can, vntill they come vnto the place appointed: and haue this priuiledge, That so soone as all the armie is come to the place to be besieged, they may then at their pleasure either depart or stay.

The gouernour of SCODRA vnderstanding both by common fame and certaine intelligence, of the Turkes designs, with all care and diligence fortified the towne, labouring continually both night and day at the rampiers, as if the enemy had been already present, and plentifully provided all things necessarie for the enduring of a long siege. The aged and vnneccessarie people, he sent out of the citie into other places of more safetie farther off: in whose stead hee tooke in great numbers of strong and able men which dwelt in the countrey round about; among whom were manie mariners taken out of the gallies, and other men of like qualitie, which got their liuing vpon the riuer and lake of SCODRA, lustie bodies enured to hardnesse, who in the long siege following did great seruice.

Whilest this preparation was making in SCODRA, behold the mountains a farre off Northward from the citie, began to shine with manie great fiers, and all the country was couered with thicke smoake, which euerie houre seemed to draw neerer and neerer: when within short time after, the poore countrey people (which as yet were not all fled) with such trash as they could well carrie, came running for life all ouer the countrey to the strong cities vpon the sea side, crying out that the Turkes were come.

The next day which was the fourteenth of May, Aly-Beg with his eightie thousand Achanziz, came into the suburbs of the citie, and there encamped; so that none could go in or out of the gates: which was not the least part of his charge. To him by the commandement of Mahomet, had Scander-Beg gouernour of BOSNIA, and Malcotius with seauen thousand horsemen, joynd themselves vpon the way. Of this Malcotius it is reported (as was of Augustus) that the majestic of his countenance, with the replendent beames issuing out of his eyes (as if it had been the raies of the Sunne) were of such piercing brightnesse; that no man was able with immoued and fixed eye long to behold the same: These horsemen (the forerunners, as I said, of Mahomet's great army) the Christians much troubled with often sallies and shor, out of the towne, and slew manie of them with little or no losse vnto themselves.

When Aly-Beg had thus lien before the citie ten daies, came Tant Gaiola the great Bassa of CONSTANTINOPLE with fise and twentie thousand souldiours, and about twelue thousand camels, for most part laden with mettall in mass, for to make great ordinance of, and other necessaries for the campe. The Bassas great and stately tent of purple colour, was pitched vpon the

the top of an high hill called the Bassaes hill, because in that place Solyman Bassa had lien in the former siege about foure yeares before: The Bassaes armie lay encamped betwixt the same hill and the towne. This Taut Gaiola was borne in EPYRVS of base parentage, and was from thence by the Turkes carried away young to CONSTANTINOPLE; where for his sharpnesse of wit and rare actiuitie, he grew into such fauour, first with Mahomet, and afterward with Batazet his sonne, that he was by them promoted to the greatest places of honour, next vnto themselves: wherein he became so popular, and had so possessed the hearts of the people, that it was suspected of some, he would haue aspired to the Turkish empire himselfe. Presently after the comming of this great Bassa, workmen were set a worke about the casting of the great ordinance, and making readie of other things for the siege. The Christians also were no lesse busie about their fortifications, the gouernour appointing vnto euerie man his charge; and which part of the wall to defend: yet keeping continually in the market place certaine companies (with the ensignes of S. Marke and S. Stephen) to serue as fresh supplies, as need or occasion should require. While the great ordinance was in casting, the Bassa caused a great bridge of timber to be made ouer the riuer, that so he might at his pleasure passe ouer his men, and commaund both sides of the riuer. The Christians in the meane time with vigilant eye so attending the Turkes, that none of them could stir within shot, but he was forthwith set off and slaine.

The thirteenth of Iune, Mustapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of ASIA (commonly called the great Bassa of NATOLIA) came also in great pompe to the siege with thirte thousand souldiours brought out of ASIA; personable men, but not accounted so good souldiours as they of EUROPE: for it is a common saying among the Turkes, That the men of EUROPE, and the horses of ASIA doe best seruice. This great Bassa was honourably met and welcomed by the other great Bassa of CONSTANTINOPLE, and was quartered vpon an other side of the citie, where his rich pavilion (all of Greene) was pitcht in a vineyard about a mile from the towne. Mustapha to proue the courage of his souldiours, propounded a reward to which soeuer of them, as durst aduenture but to go and touch the wals of the citie: vpon which occasion, two of his souldiours passing well mounted, attempted to haue performed that enterprife. But making what halft they could possibly, they were both slaine from the wall, and one of their bodies recouered by certain valiant souldiours which fellied out of the towne, and his head being cut off, was vpon a lance set vpon the wals for the Turkes to behold.

The sixteenth of Iune 5600 Ianizaries came into the campe, with foure white ensignes: whose comming all the souldiours of both the Bassaes camps gaue a wonderfull shout, and welcomed them with great joy. These are the great Turkes guard and best souldiours, in whom the greatest strength of his kingdome consisteth, and are called the sons of the great Sultan: after whose comming, Mahomet himselfe was daily expected. Three daies after came two other great men, attended vpon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reverence done vnto them by therest of the Turkes, seemed to be men of great place and authority: these men desired that they might with safetie speake with the gouernour of the citie and the rest of the captaines, to deliuer vnto them such a message, as they had for their good (as they said) brought vnto them from Mahomet. Which their request being granted, the elder of them, after he had with manie glorious words set forth the power of his master, and what he had done to other great cities, with their princes; and farther shewed into what danger they were like to fall, if they should long stand vpon their defence: he began to persuaide them to yeeld vpon the citie, assuring them of all kind vlsage, with manie rich rewards from the great emperour; whereas otherwise, they were to expect nothing but extreame miserie and most shamefull death. Vpon this answer was in the name of them all given by the mouth of Petrus Pagnanus, a graue and worthy citizen, That they were not afraid of the greatnesse of Mahomet, or of any thing he had done or could doe: and that he should find it hard to enforce them, but impossible to persuaide them to deliuer their citie: and therefore that he might at his pleasure vse his forces against men fully resolu'd rather to yeeld vnto nature her last due, than to hearken to any composition: and in conclusion told them, that if they should at any time after make any such motion, they should not expect any other answer than from the mouth of the Canon. With which short answer these great men departed, not a little discontented.

At this same time the strong citie of CAROLIA (which the worthy Scanderbeg had liuing so honourably defended, and dying had left it with his kingdome, in the protection and possession of the Venetians) hauing holden out a yeares siege, after that all the kingdome of EPYRVS and most part of ALBANIA was lost, for lacke of victuals was yeelded vp vnto the Turke, vpon condition, That the hungerstarued defendants (who then seemed rather ghosts than men) might at their pleasure in safetie depart: which agreement the faithlesse Turke brake, and without merce put them all to the sword. This heauie newes was deliuered to them of SCODRA by certaine Christians in the Turkes campe: wherewith they were much grieved, but nothing at all discouraged. Whilest the Turkes thus lay at the siege, the watermen, of whom a great number liued vpon the great lake of SCODRA (being in circuit about an hundred mile) came many times down the riuer by night, and did much harme in the Turkes campe: for remedie whereof, they were enspiced to build certaine small gallies to keepe them in, who for all that many times stole secretly vpon them, and much troubled them.

The two and twentieth of Iune the Turkes mounted two great peeces of Ordinance vpon the top of the hill whereon the Bassa lay: whereof the one carried a bullet, made of an hard kind of round stone, of three hundred pound weight, and the other a bullet of foure hundred, wherewith they began to batter the towne foure daies: after that, they placed a third peece of artillerie at the foot of the same hill, which deliuered a bullet of foure hundred pound weight: and the next day they planted a fourth peece, greater than the rest, about the middle of the same hill, which carried a shot of six hundred and fiftie pound weight. In this while, eight thousand of the Turkes souldiours, called Alapi (which are knowne from the Ianizaries by their red caps, whereas the Ianizaries weare white) came into the campe. And shortly after came Mahomet himselfe with all his armie to the riuer of Drimon, whether the two great Bassaes of ASIA and CONSTANTINOPLE went with great pompe and triumph to meet him.

The second of Iuly Mahomet with all his armie before the rising of the Sunne came to the campe before SCODRA: where after he had well viewed the situation thereof, he is reported to haue said: O what a faire and stately place hath the Eagle chosen out for her selfe to build her nest, and to hatch her young ones in. Diuers rich pavilions were set vp for Mahomet himselfe, but one faire greater than the rest, distant from them about a flight shoot, which was the place wherein he held his counsell: the other were for his owne priuat vse. Round about these his tents lay the Ianizaries encamped, a good distance off; yet so close one to another, as if it had been a perpetual tamping or strong trench, whereinto was but one entrance, continually guarded with a most strong guard. Round about the Ianizaries lay all the rest of the armie encamped: so that all the countrey, as farre as a man could see, was couered and white with tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is couered ouer with a deepe snow: and still moe people resorted to the campe dayly, so that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his armie of all sort of people about three hundred and fiftie thousand men, all gaping to deuour that poore citie: a sight of it selfe sufficient to haue daunted the courage of right valiant men: But what can be terrible vnto them that feare not to die? Against this terrour of the enemy, the defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable persuations and exhortations of one Batholomew, a preacher (sometimes one of the wortheie Scanderbeg his souldiours) who afterwards giuing himselfe to the studie of diuinitie, became a zealous preacher, and in this siege did notably comfort the Christian defendants against the terrour of so great an armie of miscreants. All this while the batterie was still maintained: and the fifth of Iuly the Turkes mounted two other great peeces, whereof the one was like vnto the former before mounted, but the other placed vpon the middle of the Bassaes mount, was of an incredible greatnesse, discharging a shot of twelue hundred pound weight, and was called the Princes peece, in whose name it was with much cunning and industrie made: with which huge peece, the Turkes euen from the beginning of the siege had threatened the besieged, willing them to expect the comming of the Princes peece. The next day they planted vpon the same mount a seuenth peece, which carried a shot of six hundred and fiftie pound weight: from which time they battered the citie with the aforesaid seuen great peeces; and ceased not oftentimes by night out of their great mortar peeces, to cast great balls of wild fire into the citie, so to haue set it on fire: whereby diuers of the citizens were enforced to vncouer their houses couered with shingle, and by men appointed for that purpose, to watch the fall of such fireworkes, and so to quench the same: which they so carefully looked vnto, as that the deuile of the enemy tooke none effect at all. At the same time also the Turkes out of their short mortar peeces cast huge great stones of incredible weight, which falling from high, did most terribly crush in peeces whatsoeuer thing they light vpon, wherewith the defendants were wonderfully troubled. In few daies after, the enimie mounted three other great peeces, wherof one was greater than that was called the Princes, and caried a bullet of thirteene hundred weighte from which time they daily battered the citie with ten such peeces, as the like hath seldome times been heard of: and arrowes fell so thicke into the citie, as if it had beene continuall showers of haile, so that no man could goe or well stirre in the streets without hurt. Yet in the midst of all these dangers the Christians valiantly defended the citie, and with their deadly shot from the wals and mounts exceedingly annoied the enimie. The eleuenth of Iuly the Turks mounted another great peece like vnto the former, vpon the Bassaes mount, and the same day battered the wals with 178 shot of this huge artillerie.

Mahomet hauing by the furie of his great ordinance beaten downe a great part of the wall, and that now nothing stood in his way but such simple repaires as the defendants had made of timber and planks, with earth cast in betwixt, was in good hope in short time to become master of the towne: and therefore sent certaine companies of his Ianizaries and other souldiours (which he with continuall supplies of fresh men still releued) to assault the breaches, so if it were possible to enter the towne, or at leastwise to burne such fortifications of timber as the defendants had made. But that which seemed vnto him at first so easie, hee found in execution full of difficultie and danger: for the Turkes approaching the breach, found there resolute men, a surer defence than any wall: whose valiant courage serued in stead of a strong bulwarke. So whilest the Turkes desperately striue in the face of the breach either to enter or to set fire vpon the new fortifications made for most part of timber, and the defendants with no lesse resolution doe what they may to the vttermost to repulse them, many were on both sides slaine, but especially of the assailants. Whiche Mahomet well perceiuing, and that by that manner of assault he gained nothing but notable losse and spoile of his best men, caused a retreat to be sounded, and his batterie to be againe forthwith renewed: euery day shaking the wall with 160 or 180 most terrible great shot, and one day with 194, which was the greatest batterie he made in one day during that siege.

After this great batterie, the tyrant caused a fresh assault to be giuen, but with little or rather worse successe than before: for though diuers of the defendants, & amongst them some of good place, as Franciscus Patavinus, Franciscus Scorbaro, two Italian captaines, and some other of the better sort of the citizens were there slaine with the great shot, wherof the enimie that day discharged into the breaches 193: yet were they with greater losse enforced againe to retire, and with shame to giue ouer the assault.

Notwithstanding this repulse, Mahomet continuing his batterie with no lesse furie than before, still fought by force of his artillerie to open a way into the citie: and the third day after the former assault gaue a more furious and desperate attempt vnto the citie than before, inasmuch that the Turkes were in the breaches come to handie strokes with the Christians, and there made a most cruell and deadly fight; wherein many fell on both sides, but of the Turkes most, yet were there many of the Christians also slaine, especially with the Turkes great ordinance. It was a right ruthfull sight to haue seene the rampiers at the great gate of the citie beaten downe flat to the ground, and to lie full of the rent bodies of the Christians: at which place the enimie so prevailed, that he was euen now readie to haue entered; for the Turkes so furiously assailed the defendants, and the murthering shot from the Bassaes mount fell so thicke and so terribly into the breach, beside the infinit number of arrowes, that there was scarce any of the Christians which defended that place but they were either slaine or greuously wounded. But when all seemed now almost desperat and forlorne, and the greedie enimie euen ready to deuour his prey, a new supplie of lustie souldiours well armed, came courageously to the breach, and as Lyons encountering the enimie, draue him downe againe, and so enforced him with great losse to retire. Mahomet greued with this repulse, in his furie caused 173 great shot to be discharged into the citie, and afterwards sending for his great Bassaes and other his principall men of war, declared vnto them his mind as followeth:

Mahomet purposing to giue a generall assault, encourageth his captaines and souldiours therunto.

I thinke none of you are ignorant (right worthie souldiours) that now it is the third moneth since this citie hath by vs bene most straitly besieged, and with all manner of artillerie and engines of war impugned, assaulted, and on euery side assailed, the wals thereof vtterly subuerted, and the bulwarke laid flat with the ground, and (as you see) as good as raised: Besides that, so oft as wee haue set fire upon their fortresses, so oft we haue prouoked them of SCODRA to fight, and haue also much vexed them with assaults. Last of all, as you know, we haue left nothing vnproued, nothing vnattempted which could be deuised, the easier to overcome them, being wearied, worne out, & their strength spent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter is not longer to be put off or delayed, but euen to morrow before the enimie can recouer his strength or repaire his breaches, let vs enclose the citie round, and giue them a generall and terrible assault: and therefore euery one of you make your selues readie, and exhort your souldiours in the campe, that they euery one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and well appointed for the winning of the citie. Now will I proue and know them that are worthy of my pay. Thou the Bassa of CONSTANTINOPLE, with thy squadrons and certaine companies of the Ianizaries our faithfull guard, giue charge vnto the breach: in the meane time, let the Bassa of ASIA with his power assault the other parts of the cittie: let euery man make readie and bring with him what so is needfull for this generall assault; my mind giueth me, that to morrow before this time we shall win the citie: for who is there can resist vs? The towne (as you see) is bared both of wall and of aliother defence: the bulwarke and ditches are laid euen, and an easie way for vs to come vnto it: the citizens themselves wearie with so many fights and assaults faint and want strength; whereas we are still fresh and lustie: they in number few; we almost innumerable: besides that, we farre passe them in the force of our artillerie, wherewith many of them shall perish in the defending of the breaches. Who then can gaine say, but that they of SCODRA are already our prisoners? Where, vpon such as remain alieue, I will at my pleasure vse the law of armes and captiuitie. On therefore courageous hearts without further delay. Is not the very name of SCODRA hatefull vnto vs? for which of you dooth not with great disdain call to remembrance the death of your parents, or brethren, or friends, or companions, cruelly slaine under these wals? Can you digest your hatred against them of SCODRA? and so many slaughters of your friends, by them made? But to forget elder times, and the harmes received from them long since, let vs but looke vpon our late slaughters and wounds as it were yet bleeding: it is not yet full foure yeares since that we made warre with these men of SCODRA; wherein so many thousands of our people fell, that their slaughter is yet almost obiect to our eyes, and their blood craving reuenge. This very hill whereon we stand, and the stones yet seeme besprinkled and polluted with their blood. Wherefore hast you as men of courage, take up armes, valiantly mount the hill, assault the town, and reuenge your old iniuries. Glut your selues to the full in the effusion of the Christian blood, whereunto our lawes doe so much exhort vs, and do what you may with force and sword, that not one of them of SCODRA may be left alieue: which you may easily bring to passe, hauing all things thereunto needfull: for there is nothing to withstand you, nothing wanting for the gaining of the victorie. All things are prepared, all things are readie: an easie matter it is for a strong man to overcome the weake and feeble, that wanteth strength as doe they.

This speech of the barbarous tyrant, was receiued with great applause and good liking of the hearers: and now was SCODRA to be with all might and maine assaulted; and not a man there left alieue. Hereupon proclamation was made throughout the campe, That euery man vpon paine of death should be readie against the appointed time. And the great captaines and commanders of the armie departing from Mahomet, went vp to the top of the hill whereon the Bassa lay, and from thence taking view of the citie, and laying their heads together, consulted how they might best giue the assault. The defendants on the other side alwaies expecting their enemies hovering ouer their heads, left nothing vndone that they could possibly deuise, for the defence of themselves and the citie. Now vpon the top of the Bassaes mount was a royall pavilion erected, richly couered with purple, from whence the proud tyrant might plainly behold all the assault: who with the dawning of the day (being the two and twentieth of Iuly) entering the same, the Turkes who in the couert of the night had conuaid themselves as neere vnto the wals as they could, (vpon the signall of battell, giuen by a tire of ordinance discharged from the Bassaes mount) suddenly ran to the breaches as thicke as bees, in hope by their sudden approach to haue taken the Christians at some aduantage: wherein they were much deceiued. For they alwaies doubting such a matter, and carefully obseruing the least motion of the enimie, were alwaies in readinesse to meet with their attempts: so that the Turkes desperately struing to gaine the breaches, and the Christians valiantly defending the same, there was in diuers places begun a most cruell and mortall fight; but especially neere vnto the great gate, where the furie of the Canon had made the wals most faultable. There the enimie was come to fight hand to hand, and preuailing trailing vpon the defendants, had set vp one of the Turkes ensignes vpon the top of the rampiers: which Mahomet beholding, rejoyced exceedingly, thinking the citie now as good as taken. But the Christians seeing the danger, speedily repaired thither with new supplies, and by plaine force draue the enimie out againe, and beat him from the rampiers. Vpon them also that were comming vp, they cast downe peeces of timber, great stones, wildfire, pots of lime, and such other things as might most annoy them: as for shot, none fell in vaine by reason of the wonderfull multitude of the Turkes, who stood so thicke, that a man could hardly haue cast downe a graine of mustardseed from the wall but it must needs haue light vpon some of them: by which meanes the Turkes were notably repulsd, their ensigne pluckt downe, and they enforced to retire from the wals. Which sudden alteration Mahomet perceiuing, fell into a great rage, and forthwith commaunded his great ordinance, with greater furie than euer, to be discharged into the breach: And with great words commaunded the two chiefe Bassaes which stood by him vpon the mount, to go presently downe and enforce the souldiours which were already retired, to returne againe vnto the assault. These great commanders seeing the tyrant in such a fere, forthwith descended from the hill, and where perswasion would not serue, with their drawne swords enforced the souldiours to returne backe againe to the assault. The Turkes knowing that they were now in the eye of their king, and in the presence of their greatest commanders, strue with might and maine to win the rampiers: for in that place, the wals of the citie were beaten downe to the ground, shaken before this assault with 2539 shot of the cannon or other peeces of no lesse force. The Christians likewise in defence of themselves and their citie, with inuincible courage

opposed themselves against the Turkes: so that a more desperat fight than there, was hardly euer to be seene; desperat men with desperat hand assailing one another: And the more to encrease the terrour of the day, the thundring shot, with the clamour of men and noise of the instruments of warre, was so great, as if heauen and earth should haue presently fallen together; and arrows falling into the citie as if it had bene showers of raine, oftentimes darkened the light of the day. In this dreadfull fight, manie of the defendants were slaine; but of the Turkes, twentie to one. Neere vnto that gate where this terrible assault was giuen, were certaine loupes hewen out of the maine rocke, which flanked the ditch all alongst that side of the citie, out of which the Christians with their murdering shot made lanes amongst their enemies, and slew them without number. For all that, the mightie Bassaes and great capitaines, one while by perswasion, another while by threatening, forced them still forward; and if anie turned backe, presently slew him: so that the Turkes seeing no lesse danger in retiring, than in fighting against the enimie, like desperat men thrust forward by heapes, and were slaine without number. Yet still pressing on so long as life lasted, and others stepping forward in stead of them that were slaine; they began againe to preuaile vpon the defendants (who in that place were for most part either slaine or hurt) and againe recovered the top of the rampiers, and there aduanced the Turkes ensignes. Then began the tyrant to lift vp his head, making sure account that the citie was now his owne. But as the common saying is, He that reckoneth without his hoast, must reckon twise: so chanced it to Mahomet. For the companies, from the beginning of the siege left in the market place ready for all euents, and oftentimes wishing for some occasion wherein to shew themselves; being now in good time aduertised of the imminent danger, came with speed to the place of the assault before the Turkes had taken good footing; and there valiantly encountering them, slew a great number of them, and forced the rest from the rampiers; and plucking downe their ensignes before set vp, in stead of them placed their owne. With which repulse the Turkes were so dismayed, that they quite forsooke the assault, and in despite of their imperious commanders, not expecting anie signe of retreat, in hast retired to their campe. Mahomet fallen from so great a hope, and grieved about measure with this shamefull repulse, returned into his pavilion fretting and fuming as a man halfe mad, where two daies he tormented himselfe with his owne passions, not admitting any man to his presence. The Christians afterwards tooke the spoile of the dead Turkes, and cutting off diuers of their heads, set them vp vpon poles round about the citie, to the terrour of their fellowes. In this assault were twelue thousand of the Turkes slaine, and many more wounded. Of the Christians were lost 400: and of them that came to the breach escaped none, but he was wounded more or lesse.

Twelue thousand Turkes slaine in this last assault.

After that Mahomet had two daies digested the last repulse, the shame whereof grieved him more than the losse it selfe: he sent for both the great Bassaes of CONSTANTINOPLE & ASIA, and other two of his chiefe councillors, with whom hee resolved to giue another assault, and thereon to gage his whole forces: for they were all of opinion with him, that the defendants were so weakened and wasted with the former assault, that they could not possibly hold out another. Whereupon straight commandement was giuen through the campe, that euery man without exception, should be ready to go to the assault whensoever they were called vpon: and the more to encourage the souldiours, great rewards and preferments were promised to them which in time of the assault should performe any especiall piece of seruice. The first appearance of the new Moone (which the Turkes worship with great deuotion) was the time that Mahomet had appointed for this generall assault: in the meane space he spared not to poure out his furie against the wals and rampiers of the towne, by the mouth of the cannon. The Christian defendants on the other side, first by heartie prayer commended themselves, and their citie to the protection of the most mightie; and afterwards with restlesse labour and no small perill, speedily repaired and new fortified whatsoever the furie of the artillerie had ouerthrowne or shaken, omitting nothing that could be done or deuised for the defence of themselves and the citie. Now as soone as the new Moone began to shew her selfe, the Mahometane priests going about the armie, gaue the souldiours knowledge thereof (as their manner is) by singing of a song, in manner of a procession; wherunto the whole armie answered with a short response, but with such a terrible noise as was wonderfull to heare: and at the same time bowing themselves to the ground, saluted the Moone with great superstition. All their fond ceremonies performed, they began to draw ne the citie so thicke, and in number so manie, that all the ground, for the space of a mile round about SCODRA, was thicke couered with men. The Christians expecting euery houre to be assailed, were ready vpon the wals and rampiers of the citie to repulse the enimie: but especially at the great gate where most danger was feared, for that the Turkes with their great ordinance had made that place of all others most faultable. Here Jacobus Moneta a noble captain, with his brother Moncinus a valiant gentleman, tooke vpon the to receiue the first assault which is commonly of all others most terrible; for the Turkes vse in their assaults to giue three attempts, whereof the first is most furious and dangerous, as performed by their best souldiours; the other two are of lesse force: but if they faile in all three, they forsake the enterprise as men discouraged. Whilst both the assailants and the defendants stood thus in readinesse, the one as it were facing the other a great part of the night, Mahomet before day went vp to the top of the Bassaes mount, from whence he had before beholden the former assault: at whose comming, there were presently eleven cannons discharged, and twelue smaller peeces (the signal appointed for the assault.) The Turkes vpon this signe giuen, with exceeding tumult and most hideous outcrie (as their manner is) began to assaile the citie round, and with such wonderfull agility of bodie and courage mounted the rampiers at the great gate, that they had there as it were in a trice set vp one of their ensignes, which was forthwith pluckt vp by Moneta, and the Turkes with great slaughter driuen downe, where many of them were slaine with stones, timber, fire, and such other things cast downe vpon them; beside a great number slaine or wounded with shot, arrowes, and darts, whereof none fell to the ground in vaine, by reason that the Turkes stood so thicke, that they violently pressed one another forward, in such sort, that the foremost could by no means shun any danger, were it neuer so great or terrible. In this sort the assault was with great slaughter; of the Turkes continued vntill it was day: they struiuing to win the breach, and the Christians most valiantly defending the same: Moneta himselfe in this fight receiued diuerse wounds, and was twice beaten downe to the ground; yet still recouering himselfe, encouraged his souldiours, and woorthily repulsd the enimie. Mahomet seeing his souldiours beaten from the breach, caused a tyer of his great Ordinance to be discharged vpon the Christians which stood therein thicke for the defence thereof, by force whereof many of them were rent in peeces, and the rest fore dismayed: which the Turkes quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged, came on againe with a fresh charge, forcing themselves to the vttermost to haue entered. But the valiant captain nothing discouraged either with the losse of them that were slaine, or with the danger of himselfe, courageously withstood the furious enimie, and maintained the place vntill new supplies came to releas him, and neuer departed thence, either suffered any man to depart, vntill the assault was ended. Many were slaine on both sides, yet nothing troubled the defendants so much as the great ordinance; which being discharged from the Bassaes mount into the breach, at such times as the Turkes were driuen backe, slew many of the Christians, leauing the breach almost cleare: so giuing uing occasion for the Turkes to haue entred, had not other couragious souldiours stept vp in stead of them that were slaine, who manfully repulsed the enimie. The tyrant from the mount seeing the inuincible courage of the defendants, was therewith exceedingly troubled; but fully resolu'd now or neuer to haue it, commaunded all his forces to be drawne from all other parts of the citie vnto the great gate, there to renew the assault; straightly charging his capitaines, neuer to returne thence vntill they had taken the citie. Hereupon the greatest part of that huge armie was forthwith in the sight of himselfe brought vnto the appointed place, and there gave a sharpe and cruell assault at the breach, with such desperat furie, that in short time they had slaine most of the defendants there present, and aduanced diuers of their ensignes vpon the top of the rampiers. Which Mahomet beholding from the mount, rejoyced exceedingly; making sure account that the citie was now his owne: but by that time he had well conceiued this hope, new supplies of fresh and couragious men (of purpose reserved for all euents) came to the place of danger, and with great resolution encountering the wearied Turkes, draue them backe, cleared the breach, and ouerthrew their ensignes. Which so sudden an alteration in the breach, wrought no lesse alteration in the prowd tyrants mind, his hope was turned into despaire, and his rejoycing into choller: inso much that in his furie, he commaunded all his great artillerie to be at once discharged into the breach; whereby manie of his forward and couragious souldiours were slaine together with the defendants. At the same time, the great commanders and capitaines knowing themselves to bee in the eye of their imperious lord and maister, with their drawne swords forced the poore souldiours againe forward to the breach; and the more to encourage them, aduentured themselves also amongst them: whereby the fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Manie of the Turkes were there slaine; yet such was the force and multitude of them which still stept vp in their place, and bullets and arrowes flew so thicke, that the defendants oppressed with multitude, and ouerwhelmed with shot, were hardly able longer to maintaine the place, being for most part either slaine or wounded. Whereupon a great cry ran vpon the sudden through the citie, that euery man without exception, should forthwith retire to the breach. Which was with such cheerefullnesse done, that in lesse time than was to haue been thought, a wonderfull multitude of all sort of people was there met together, encouraging one another against the present danger; who all as men resolu'd to lay downe their liues in defence of their countrey, valiantly encountered the Turkes vpon the top of the rampiers, and so hardly laid vnto them, that notwithstanding their great number, they began now againe to wauer and shrinke backe. Which thing the tyrant perceiuing from the mount, in great rage commaunded his canoniers, as fast as they could to discharge the great ordinance into the breach, without anie regard of his owne men, so that together with them, he might also kill some of the Christians: and withall imperiously commaunded his capitaines, with all their force and power to maintaine the assault, threatening them with most horrible death, if they returned without victorie. Hereupon the assault was againe renewed, euery man (in shew at least) set downe there to doe his last deuoiere. But the great ordinance still playing vpon the breach, slew manie of the Turkes as well as of the Christians. Thise the great shot fell amongst the Turkes themselves, and rent in sunder a great number of them which were formost, to the great discouragement of the rest: whereof the tyrant had small regard, so that together with them he might also diminish the number of the defendants. Neuertheless, such was the desperat furie of the enimie, that the citie was in no small danger to haue been euen presently taken, had not fresh supplies come from other places of the citie which they were appointed vnto; who with great courage resisted the enimie. Yet the Turkes farre exceeding in number (and fresh men continually stepping vp in stead of them which lay by heapes vnder their feet, and ferued them in stead of steps to get vp to the rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight: at which time the great ordinance also fore annoied the defendants, so that with one shot (whereby the greatnesse of the harmes done at other times may be gathered) eightene of the Christian defendants were slaine. As for arrowes, they flew as thicke as haile into the citie; so that they obscured the light of the day, and lay in most places of the street a span thicke: so that for the space of a moneth after, the inhabitants vsed no other fuelle to burne, but Turkish arrowes. It was a ruthfull sight to haue seene the bodies of the valiant Christians rent in sunder with the great shot, and pieces of them cleauing vpon euery wall thereabout, euery street was stained with their blood, the great ordinance continually thundred, churches and houses came rattling downe, yea the heauie countenance of the ayre it selfe seemed to bewaile the miserie of the poore Christians: besides, the noise of trumpets, drums, and other instruments of warre, with the horrible crie of the hellish Turkes, was so great and hideous, that it seemed as if heauen and earth should haue gone together; nothing was to be heard but the verie terrour of the care; nothing to be seene but death, and the verie instruments of death. And now in this extremitie a fearefull crie ran through the citie, That without present helpe all would be lost at the great gate: Whereupon, not onely they which were whole (which were the fewest in number) but they also which lay wounded or sicke in their beds, cheering vp themselves, with weapons in their hands ran with speed to the place where the danger was; chusing rather there to die, than to be slaine in their beds. Thus whilest the Christians of all sorts, pressed and in great number slaine: yet fresh men still comming vp as if they had sprung out of the earth, the deadly fight was by them still maintained. For the Turkes on the one side, for feare of the tyrant, laboured with might and maine to win the citie; and the Christians on the other, knowing no hope left for them if they should be overcome, with no lesse resolution defended the same. In this obstinacie of minds, manie fell on both sides: sometimes the Turkes seemed to haue the better, and were straight way by the Christians put to the worse. Which manner of mortall fight with doubtfull euent, was continued most part of that day: vntill that at length manie being on both parts slaine, and the rest for most part sore wounded and hurt, the furie of the assault began to assuage: for the Turkes now wearie of that long and deadly fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great stomacke to mount vp the rampiers, where they saw no hope to preuaile, but all things threatening present death. Mahomet beholding the wonderfull slaughter of his men, and that hauing done what was possible for men to doe, they now fought as men discouraged, and in despaire of victorie himselfe, caused a retrait to be founded, which the Turkes no sooner heard, but that they left the assault, and without order ran to their tents as men halfe feared out of their wits.

Of this victorie, the Christians (as they had good cause) rejoyced greatly: yet was this joy mingled with much sorrow and heauinesse, for the losse of such worthy men as were slaine in that assault, manie of whose bodies, they were glad to gather vp by peccemeale, some here, some there, some cleauing on this wall, and some on that: which they, as the time would giue leaue, honourably buried with the rest of the slaine. At which time also, they with all diligence and expedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in such readinesse, as if they should haue presently receiued a fresh assault.

Mahomet wonderfully grieved with the shamefull dishonour and great losse he had receiued at the last assault, repented himselfe that euer he had taken the matter in hand, wishing that hee had neuer heard of the name of Scoora: and in his choller and frantike rage, most horribly blasphamed against God, most wickedly saying, That it were enough for him to haue care of heauenly things, and not to crosse him in his worldly actions. In which furie he descended from the mount and got him into his tent, where he againe tormented himselfe with his melancholic passions by the space of two daies; wherein he would neither be spoke withall, or admit any man to his presence. Vpon the third day he called a generall counsell of his commanders and best souldiours, and there openly before them all said, That he was determined to giue the enimie a fresh assault, for that being weakened with so manie assaults, he could not possibly be able to hold out another: and therefore hoped for an easie victorie. But he had no sooner so said, but that all they that heard him, cried out with one voice to the contrarie: saying, That it was not by anie meanes to be attempted, forasmuch as his best souldiours were already slaine, and the greater part of them that were left, either sore wounded, or brought to that weaknesse that they were not able to doe anie more seruice; and that therefore it were better for them to kill one another, or else themselves to kill them one by one, than to expose them to be so shamefully butchered by the Christians. In this diuersitie of opinions, Achmetes Bassa the great champion of the Turkes (a man reuerend and of great authoritie, for his birth, yeares, and rare experience in martiall affairs, and one by whom Mahomet had done great matters) standing vp, with pleasing speech calmed his furious mind, and with substantiall reasons perswaded him to desist from that his intended purpose, and to take another surer course, as followeth.

greatnesse whereof the mind of man cannot conceiue, and my dull spirit but wonder thereat; my tongue faltereth to speake of them, neither would this time serue so much as to recount them. It is of all men deemed a thing of great honour (most dread soueraigne) when a prince hath receiued a kingdom from his ancestors, to be able in safetie to keepe and defend the same: greater than this is it, honourable to encrease and augment it, so left: but of a small thing, by worthie prowesse to bring it to the highest type of worldly honour, is of all other things the greatest. Which most rare excellencie, all men worthily ascribe vnto your perfection and felicitie: and I of all others can thereof bring the most assured testimonie, who haue oftentimes heard it of mine ancestors (which following the fortune of the Ottoman princes out of ASIA into EVROPE) that your worthie predecessors at their first comming into EVROPE (without offence be it said) possessed but a corner thereof; to whom you afterward by diuine appointment succeeding, haue adioined so many prouinces, kingdomes, and empires, as were tedious to rehearse them. For who can worthily expresse, how you haue in EVROPE subdued CONSTANTINOPLE, the imperiall citie of the East empire, with all THRACIA, ACHAEA, GRECIA, PELOPONNESVS, BEOTIA, THEBES, and the noble citie of ATHENS, the mother and nurse of all good learning. The empire of TRAPEZOND, with the emperor thereof, is by you ouerthrowne: the kingdomes of SERUIA and BOSNA, with the princes of PELOPONNESVS, are by you gloriously vanquished. You haue at your commaund twelue kingdomes in ASIA the lesser, PONTVS, BYTHINIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, CILICIA, PAMPHILIA, LYCIA, CARIA, LYDIA, PHRYGIA, NICHOMEDIA, and NICEA, with the famous citie of PRYSA. Besides these, IONIA, DORIS, SMYRNA, COLOPHON, EPHESVS, MILETVM, HALICARNASVS, PERGAMVS, with the countrey of TAVRICA, are vnder your subiection. The great countrey of ARMENIA hath felt your force: the Islands of LESBOS, CHIOS, and EVBEA, are parts of your empire. What should I speake of infinit people and nations, by you most victoriously vanquished? This may suffice for all, that you haue gained from the Christians twentie prouinces and two hundred great citties. For it were in long to rehearse the Mahometane kings and princes by you also vanquished: in all your expeditions at things haue yet giuen place to your fortune. The antient monuments may now cease to extoll the praises of Caesar, Scipio, Pyrrhus, Hanniball, and other chieftaines of ROME, and forraigne nations: for why, they are all inferior to you both for victories and countries subdued. The Ottoman familie is undoubtedly fatal for soueraignetie: all the world shall in short time come vnder your government, and all nations shall serue you. As for this towne of SCODRA, let it not so much grieue you: worldly things (as you know) doe oftentimes deceiue our expectation: in them fortune beareth great sway. In for this matter, quiet your selfe: for I dare gage my faith vnto your imperiall maiestie, that I will in short time find means, that this citie shall stand at your deuotion. Did not I of late bring into your subiection the impregnable citie of CROIA, which you so long desired? But where as you would now again forthwith attempt to win it by assault, I therein craue your pardon, in that I cannot be of that opinion, but must needs thinke farre otherwise: for to attempt warre, and to be ouerthrowne, is an easie matter for euery man to doe; but to vanquish the enemy, and to carrie away the triumph, that right few men know. He that consulteth of such great and weightie matters, ought to be free both from furie and desire, both euill counsellours. The Christians of SCODRA are not in my opinion to be againe assaulted: for in so doing you shall but lose your labour. For if you could not subdue them, your armie being then fresh and strong, how shall you now overcome them with much fewer, and they wounded, weake and feeble? I haue viewed the whole campe, and searched euery tent; and found no place, no tent, yea scarcely any cabbin, without groning, sighing, weeping or wailing; in euery place was heauinesse, sorrow, mourning and death it selfe: for in the last assault you lost thirtie thousand and more of your best souldiers: many moe are greuously wounded and maimed: none, but he carrieth about him some signe that hee was there: few or none there be that dare againe mount the hill to giue a fresh assault, they are all afraid and discouraged. Whom when I demanded, how so great a feare was come vpon them, and what was the cause they had so lost their wanted courage? they answered me, That it was the looke, euery the very looke of them of SCODRA, whose eyes did seeme vnto them to burne and sparkle with fire: their sterne and terrible countenances (said they) haue stricke this terrour into vs. Wherefore I thinke it not good to giue a fresh assault with men so dismayed: but rather to vse policie and delay against such resolute enemies. This citie of SCODRA is the eye and head of all this prouince, which the Venetians haue notably fortified and planted with store of ordinance and of all things els necessarie for defence thereof; but especially with most valiant souldiers, of purpose chosen out of many their garrisons for defence of this citie: you haue not now to doe with the weake and effeminate people of ASIA, but with the hard and rough people of EPIRVS. And you know (most mightie emperor) the strength and courage of this nation: it is now thirtie yeares that you haue made warre against this people, and haue not yet altogether subdued them: and how dangerous and chargeable this warre hath bene vnto you, who knoweth not? It is now six moneths since we came first before this citie; we haue intrenched our selues round about it, we haue day and night laid hard siege vnto it, we haue battered it of long with eleven cannons: I speake not of other smaller peeces or engines of warre, with all kind of shot and fire-works, and whatsoever els we could deuise. We haue many times to our cost assaulted it: what could be done by force, strength, or multitude of valiant men is already done in the former assaults. Nothing hath been left vnattempted, no policie no direction hath wanted in your leaders, neither courage in your souldiers. What should I recount the innumerable great shot, or speake of our arrowes and darts, deliuered into the citie as showers of haile? Did all this or any thing els we could doe, any thing terrifie these defendants? Were they not, maye are they not still readie, with great assurance and courage at all assays to encounter vs. You take a wrong course by force to constrain them. They haue taken vpon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be removed, there shall you be sure still to find them either alieue or dead. And what account they make of their lines, you see, they will sell them vnto vs deare for their countrey, and preferre an honourable death before a seruile life. Wherefore against men so set downe, policie is to be used: and them whom we cannot by force subdue, let vs by delay and time overcome. If you will win SCODRA, blocke it vp, build strong forts in places conuenient round about it, and furnish them with good souldiers: make a bridge ouer BOLIANA, with a strong castle on either side, to stop the passage: which done, besiege the other weaker cities of the Venetians, which are as it were the lims of SCODRA: and subdue the countrey round about, which will be no hard matter for you to doe, being master of the field: so must SCODRA at length of necessity yeeld vnto you, as of late did CROIA, enforced thereunto by famine. Thus may you in safetie without slaughter of your people come to the full of your desires.

The wholesome counsell of the Bassa so well pleased Mahomet himselfe; and the rest there present, that the assault was laid aside, and present order taken for the speedie execution of that which was by him so well plotted. Whereupon the Bassa of CONSTANTINOPLE with his forces was sent to ZABIACHE, a citie in the borders of DALMATIA, standing vpon the lake of SCUTARIA, not farre from ASCRIVUM, which in few daies was yielded vnto him. The Bassa possessed of the citie, thrust out all the inhabitants, and leauing therein a garrison of Turks, returned againe to the campe at SCODRA. At the same time the great Bassa of ASIA was also sent by Mahomet against DRIVASTO, a citie also of the Venetians: which when hee had besieged and fore battered by the space of sixteene dayes, the great tyrant came thither in person himselfe, and the next day after his comming tooke the citie, without any great resistance. Such as hee found vpon the wals, he put to the sword: of the rest he tooke three hundred away with him vnto the campe at SCODRA, and there in the face of the citie caused them all to be cruelly slain, of purpose so to terrifie the defendants. The next day after hee sent the great Bassa of CONSTANTINOPLE to LYSSA, called also ALESSA, a citie of the Venetians, situated vpon the riuer Drinus, about thirtie miles from SCODRA. The Bassa comming thither, found the citie desolate (for the citizens hearing of his comming, were for feare before fled) for which cause he set the citie on fire. Here the Turks digged vp the bones of the worthie prince Scanderbeg, for the superstitious opinion they had of the vertue of them: and happie was he that could get any little part thereof to set in gold or other jewell, as a thing of great price, as is before declared. All these things thus done, Mahomet committed the direction of all things concerning the siege of SCODRA, vnto the discretion of Achmetes. By whose perswasion, he leauing a great power for the continuing of the siege, departed thence himselfe with fortie thousand souldiers for CONSTANTINOPLE, cursing and banning by the way all the countrey of EPIRVS, all the inhabitants therein, and euery part thereof, their come, their cattell, &c. whatsoever els was fruitfull; but about all other things the citie of SCODRA, with all that therein was, for that he had neuer receiued greater dishonour or losse than there.

After his departure, which was about the seuenth of September, the two great Bassas of CONSTANTINOPLE and ASIA, according to order before taken, built a great bridge ouer the riuer Boliana, and on either side a strong castle, to the intent that no reliefe should that way bee brought into the citie. Which worke when they had brought to perfection, and furnished both castles with garrisons, ordinance, and all things necessarie, they left Achmetes Bassa with some thousand souldiours to continue the siege, and returned themselves the one to CONSTANTINOPLE, and the other into ASIA. The warre and politicke Bassa mindfull of the charge he had taken vpon him, tooke such order, that no releefe could possibly be brought vnto the citie either by land or by water: and so lying still before it a long time, brought it at length into such distresse and want of all things, that the poore Christians were faine to eat all manner of vncleane and loathsome things; horses were daintie meat, yea they were glad to eat dogs, cats, rats, and the skins of beasts for: it exceedeth all credit to tell at what exceeding great price a little moule was sold, or puddings made of dogs guts. All these bare shifts and extremities the poore Christians were content to endure euen vnto the last gaspe, rather than to yeeld themselves into the hands of their mercilesse enemies.

Whilest SCODRA thus lay in the suds, the Venetians wearie of the long and chargeable warre they had to their great losse now maintained against so mightie an enemy, by the space of sixteene yeares; and hauing no meanes to releue their distressed subjects in SCODRA, thought it best to proue, if they could procure a peace from the tyrant. For which purpose they sent Nedictus Triusianus, a graue Senatour and a man of great experience, to CONSTANTINOPLE: who so well vsed the matter, that after long debating too and fro, at length a peace was concluded; whereof the cheefe capitulations were, That the Venetians should deliuer vnto Mahomet the citie of SCODRA, the island of LEMNOS, and the strong castle of TENARVS in PELOPONNESVS, and pay him yearely eight thousand duckats; That they might freely after their wonted manner trafficke into the Euxine by the straits of Hellespontus and Bosphorus Thracius; & other parts of his dominions. Concerning the citizens of SCODRA, it was comprised in the same peace, That it should bee at their owne choice either to liue there still vnder the government of the Turkish emperour, or els at their pleasure to depart in safetie with their goods whether they would. Triusianus hauing in this manner concluded a peace, in his returne homeward the fourth of Aprill, found the Venetian Admirall riding at anker in the mouth of Boliana, from whence they both by letters certified the Gouvernour and citizens of SCODRA, in what manner the peace was concluded with the Turke, and what prouision was therein made for them. Vpon receiue of which letters, the gouernour calling together the citizens, declared vnto them how the case stood: and there with them entered into consultation vpon this hard question, Whether they would remaine there still in their natiue country vnder the Turkish tyrannie; or forsaking the same, liue amongst other Christians in perpetuall exile? But after the matter had beene thoroughly debated, and many reasons on both parts alledged, at length it was by generall consent concluded, That they should all forsake the citie and the house of bondage, as dangerous both to their soules and bodies, and liue as it should please God amongst other Christians. So the Turks giuing pledges for the safe departure of the Christians in SCODRA, they all at an appointed day with bag and baggage came out of the citie, and were by the Venetians carefully transported into other parts of their territorie in ITALIE, where they liued in peace. The Turks (who had now besieged the citie a whole yeare) after the departure of the Christians entered the citie with great joy and triumph, which with many others therabout, hath euer since to the great ruth of all Christendome, remained in the possession of the faithlesse infidels. Thus was the strong citie of SCODRA lost, and the long warres ended betwixt Mahomet and the Venetians, which happened in the yeare 1478.

Mahomet now at peace with the Venetians, sent the same Achmetes Bassa (by whom he had but a litle before taken in SCODRA) with his fleet of gallies against one Leonard, prince of NAXOS, ZACYNTHVS, and CEPHALENIA, islands neere vnto PELOPONNESVS: where the Bassa arriuing, easily tooke the same islands, the poore prince for safegard of his life being glad to flee into ITALIE with his wife & treasure to king Ferdinand, whose nigh kinswoman he had married.

About the same time Alis-Beg, surnamed Michal Oglu, Isa Beg the sonne of Cassanes, and Baba Beg, surnamed Malco Oglu (men of great account amongst the Turks, and most honourably descended) entered into TRANSYLVANIA with a great armie of an hundred thousand men, and brought such a generall feare vpon the country, that Stephanus Bator the Vaiuod, was glad with all speed to flee vnto Matthias king of HUNGARIE, to declare vnto him the danger of his country, and to craue his aid. Matthias at the same time lay sicke of the gout: neuertheless he tooke such order by his capitaines, Stephanus Cherepetrus, and Paulus Kimisus countie of TRANESYVANIA, that that the Turks were encountered not farre from ALBA IULIA, and there in a great and bloodie battell ouerthrowne: wherein Isa one of their great caprains was slaine, with 30 thousand Turks mo. Neither was this victorie gained by the Christians without losse, Bator the Vaiuod himselfe being sore wounded, and eight thousand men slaine.

Mahomet in his ambitious humour, had long time desired to haue in his subjection the island of the RHODES. For why, it grieved him that so small an island should lie so neere his great dominions in ASIA, holden by a few Christians, to the great trouble of his merchants trading in the Mediterranean, beside manie other harmes daily from thence receiued, and to haue no feeling of his greatnesse. But forasmuch as the winning of that place was thought to be a matter of great difficultie, and in former times vnfortunatly attempted by some of the Mahometane princes: he purposed now with good aduise to take this enterprize in hand. Wherefore calling together his graue counsellors and most expert men of warre, after he had declared vnto them the manifold injuries receiued from them of the RHODES; he propounded the matter, Whether it were best to attempt the winning of that island or not? Some forward men perswaded him to reuenge those injuries done by those Christians, and to subdue that island; which for the neerenesse vnto CYPRUS, might of right be accounted as part of his dominion; and not to forbear that enterprize for feare of repulse, forasmuch as he was able to bring mo men to assaile it, than were stones in the wall about it. Others better aduised, declared the strength of the island, with the valour of the defenders; men alwaies brought vp in armes, and as it were chosen out of all parts of Christendome: so that it was (as they said) like to proue a matter of more difficultie than was by some supposed; whereof some of the Mahometane princes had to their no small dishonour, already made sufficient triall: Alledging farther, that that small island which scarcely appeared in the sea, was not of that worth, as that he should thereon gage his honour, with the liues of so manie good men, and most valiant souldiours as might serue for the conquest of a kingdom. For all that, Mahomet pickt forward with the spurs of ambition, and continuall solicitation of Anthionius Meligalus, a fugitiue knight of the RHODES, resolved to follow the counsell of them which perswaded the warre. This Meligalus was a knight of the order, which when he had prodigally consumed his substance which was great, with two others, Demetrius and Sophonius, men of his owne qualitie and disposition, fled vnto the Turkish emperour; presenting vnto him a perfect plot of the citie, with all the strength both of sit, and the ille wherein it stood, and which way he might with most ease win it. In which seruice they frankly offered to spend their liues: but hoping indeed by such foule treacherie to repaire their broken estate. All things being now in readinesse, Mahomet appointed Mesithes Paleologus, one of his chiefe Bassas (the neere kinsman of Constantinus Paleologus the last emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE) Generall for that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that so great an action. Mesithes imbarcking his armie in number eightie thousand, and thoroughly furnished with all things necessarie for the siege, set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, and with a pleasant gale of wind, sayled alongst the coast of ASIA the lesse, towards the RHODES: where by the way he called vnto him Demetrius (one of the fugitiue knights) to learne of him the best meanes for the safe landing of his armie. As for the arch traitor Meligalus, and chiefe author of this warre, he was fallen sick vpon the way; and in the extremitie of his sicknesse, growing both troublesome and loathsome vnto the Turkes that were with him in the same gallie, was by the mariners throwne ouerboard aliue: crying out in vaine for helpe, no man vouchsafing to haue anie compassion vpon him; and so swallowed vp of the sea, receiued amidst the waues, the iust guerdon of his treacherie.

At this time Peter Damboise a Frenchman, an Auergnoies, a man of singular gouernment, was Great Master of the RHODES; whose valiauncie was such, that commonly once in eight daies he had certaine intelligence what great matters passed in the Turkes court: and therewith of such deepe judgement, that he was seldom or neuer ouertaken, or deceived with anie false aduertisements. This carefull Graund Master, was not ignorant of all these great preparations, neither of the coming of the Bassa; and therefore had before strongly fortified the citie, and so stored the same with all things needfull, as might well haue serued for manie yeares siege: but especially with such shot and powder, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an especiall meeries whereby the citie was afterwards preferred. At the same time, manie noble and valiant gentlemen hearing of the Turkes designs, repaired thither out of ITALY, FRANCE, SPAIN, GERMANIE,

traitour.*

MANIE, and other places of Christendome, cheerfully to adventure their liues, in defence both of the place, and of the Christian religion, against the common enemy of Christianity. The Great Master taking a general view of all the forces he had, to oppose against so puissant an enemy, found that he had in the citie sixteen thousand able men: in which number were reckoned manie Jewes and other men of seruile condition; who in the siege following, did fight good seruice. The great Bassa conducted by the false traitour Demetrius, safely landed both his arme and artilerie in the island the two and twentieth day of Iune, not farre from the citie. At which time the Great Master considering that the safetie of the citie consisted more in the liuely valour of the defendants, than in the strength of the dead wals, or other warlike prouision; thought it requisite, as a part of his dutie, by cheerfull persuasions to encourage them, valiantly to withstand the force of their enemies. And therefore calling them all together, spake vnto them as followeth:

The oration of the Great Master to the rest of the knights and souldiours, to encourage them valiantly to withstand the Turke.

At length valiant souldiours and fellows at armes, we see the Turkes our mortall enemies (as we were before aduertised, as well by letters from our friends, as by common fame) breathing after our destruction; in readinesse to destroy our churches, our oratories, our alters, our religion, and whatsoeuer els we account sacred or religious; seeking the ruine of this noble citie, and the cruell death of vs all; gaping at once, to denour our liues, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And thus as I cannot denie but that the chance of warre is doubtfull, and the event thereof vncertaine: I will consider your valiant courage and cheerefulness of mind, I presently conceive a most assured hope of victorie. They haue entered into armes against vs, not so much for anie desert of ours, or vpon any other quarrell; as for the insatiable desire of rule, and the great despite they beare against vs and the Christian religion. But to withstand their furie, and to frustrate their designs, we want neither weapons, nor artilerie, nor prouision for many yeares; we haue a most strong garrison of Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germanes, English, and others, the verie chivalrie of Christendome: and that which more is, Christ Iesus our Captaine and Generall, by whose power, we shall no doubt easily repulse the vaine force of our most wicked and gracelesse enemies. The care wee haue for the defence of the Christian faith, wherunto we are by speciall profession bound, will animate and encourage vs against them, which seeke for nothing more than to extend their wicked and grosse superstition, to the great dishonour of God, and of his sonne Christ Iesus. Besides that, we are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germanes, and other worthy Christians: they are of CARIA, LYDIA, CAPADOCIA, and the other delicate countries of ASIA; effeminate persons, brought up to pleasure. I say it not to draw you into anie manifest or inevitable danger, neither to feed you with vaine hope, or to fill your eares with windie words: but this I promise and assure you of, that if this siege shall continue long, hither will come such strong aid out of FRANCE, ITALY, GERMANIE and SPAINIE, as will serue not onely to raise the siege, but to recouer againe the empires of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRAPEZONDE. Then shall our enemies see no good end of their counsels; but all their deuises so confounded, as that they shall hardly be able by speedie flight to saue themselves. But suppose the hardest should happen, which I feare not: would not anie man account his life most happely and honourably spent, in defence of a good conscience, and the quarrell of Christ Iesus? Truly my great yeares and course of life now almost spent in defence of the Christian religion (as I euer desired) doth call me forth, as one so assured of that good lucke for me in heauen by Christ Iesus (whose battell we are to fight) that I no whit feare anie enemies for or future chance: which for all that, I haue as farre as I could, and to the uttermost of my power provided for, as that we will not (I hope) be therewith ouerwhelmed. Be you therefore of good cheer and comfort (as I know you are) and shew your selues valiant and courageous, which reflecteth vpon your selues: and as for all the rest, time, and our discretion shall right well provide I doubt not.

The valiant men and worthy souldiours, resting vpon the assurance of their aged gouernour, departed euery man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Bassa landed his great armie, and sent Demetrius the traitorous knight, Meligalus his companion, with certaine troupes of horsemen and some foot, to view the ground, where he might best encampe with his armie. Demetrius in great pride riding about the citie, was knowne by Anthony Damboisse, the Great Masters brother; by whose leaue, he sallied out with a troupe of gallant horsemen, and skirmished with them: but the Turkes being mo in number, cast about to haue enclosed them: which Anthony perceiuing, turned vpon them that were comming behind him, and that with such such force, that he slew or wounded most part of them. In this hoat skirmish, Demetrius hauing his horse slaine vnder him, and himselfe ouerthrowne, was there troden to death vnder the horses feet: an end too good for so false a traitour. Muratus a French knight, vnadvisedly disposing his dead bodie, was by the Turkes slaine, and his head presented vnto the Bassa in stead of Demetrius.

The Bassa approaching the citie, at the first comming tooke a great orchard, which the Great Master had strongly entrenched, and therein placed certaine companies of souldiours, with some small pieces of ordinance: which place if it could haue beene kept, might haue fitly serued the defendants to haue at their pleasure sallied out vpon the enemy. But they which were appointed to the keeping thereof, either terrified with the sight of so great an armie, or else doubting to be able to hold it against so great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the citie; leauing the great ordinance behind them for haist. In this place, the Bassa by the counsell of George Frapaine (a Christian fugitiue of the ROMANS, and now master of his ordinance) began to plant his batterie, & from thence to batter the tower called Nicholea, or S. Nicholas his tower, distant fro the citie three hundred paces. But against this place, Damboisse had so aptly mounted two great Basiliskes, that he made him glad quickly to forsake the same: yet finding no other place more conuenient for his purpose, shortly after he nere vnto the same place planted againe his batterie, of farre greater force than before. Wherein beside the ordinance of greatest charge, he had three hundred smaller pieces for batterie: wherewith at the first he did small harme, for that this George Frapaine repenting himselfe (as it was thought) of his foule treason, bestowed the shot to small purpose; for which cause the Bassa began to haue him in distrust: which Frapaine perceiving, fled by night againe vnto the ROMANS, and discovered vnto the Great Master all the secrets of the Turkes campe. The Turkes continuing the batterie, had sore shaken the aforesaid tower called S. Nicholas, and beaten downe some part thereof: which the Christians with great industrie, speedily repaired in best fort they could. For all that, the Turkes gaue therunto a fierce assault, by the space of six houres, forcing themselves to the vttermost to haue taken it: but perceiving that it preuailed them nothing, they retired, hauing lost eight hundred of their men, with manie others drowned in the sea, of whom the number was not knowne, and a thousand others fore wounded.

Eight hundred

Meslhes disappointed of his former purpose, bent his artilerie against the wals of the citie, and with continuall batterie had made a faire breach. But Damboisse foreseeing the danger, had with great labour cast vp such rampiers with a countermure before the breach, that the Bassa durst not in anie case adventure to enter the breach he had made. For performance of this so necessarie worke, the captaines themselves refused not to put to their helping hands: by whose example, all the rest of the people which were able to doe anie thing, being moued, willingly employed their labour vntill the worke was fully finished.

Whilest these things were in doing, Calibassa the younger (a great courtier) was sent from Mahomet, to see with what successe the siege went forward. Vpon whose arrival, it was giuen out through all the Turke campe, that Mahomet was in person himselfe comming to the siege, with an hundred thousand men, and an hundred and fiftie peeces of great ordinance. These news (of purpose deuised to the terror of the defendants) being blowne out of the campe into the citie, stricke an exceeding great feare into the mindes of some of the defendants, and so discouraged the Spaniards, with their nigh neighbors that came from NAVARR, that they began openly to reason in their conuenticles, that it was not possible for the citie to be defended against such a power; and therefore after an insolent manner, desired leaue to be gone: to the great discouragement of the rest. The Great Master vnderstanding of their doings, sent for these mutinous Spaniards: and after he had sharply reprooued them both of disorder and cowardise, promised to ship them away forthwith out of the isle, saying, That he doubted not, right well to defend the citie against the greatest power of the Turke, without the helpe of such base minded cowards. In the meane time he commanded them to surcease from their mutinous talke, threatening otherwise to make them examples to others, what it were so much to forget themselves. But these Spaniards shortly after, better considering of the matter, and what a dishonour it would be both to themselves and their nation, if they should so dishonourably be sent away; repenting themselves of that they had done, came and craued pardon of the Great Master: and to redeeme their former fault, in all sallies and seruices during that siege, shewed themselves most valiant and forward forward men: for all that, the Great Master would neuer afterwards trust them in any seruice alone. The Bassa attempting much and preuailing little, thought it would much further his designs, if he could by anie means take the Great Master out of the way, by whose careful policie he saw all his deuises still countermaunded: wherefore to bring this his purpose to passe, he practised by the meanes of one Ianus a Dalmatian, to poyson him. This Ianus hauing conceived this treason from the Bassa, was receiued into the citie of the Rhodes, as a Christian fugitiue fled from the Turkes: where hee acquainted himselfe with one Pythius an Epitoe, of great familiaritie with Marius Philephus (of late secretarie vnto Damboyse, but as then out of fauour and in disgrace, for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutinie.) Ianus by the meanes of Pythius, whom he had now thoroughly corrupted, sought after Philephus, who then as hee right well knew, liued discontented, as a fit instrument whereby to worke this treason; for that he was a man well acquainted with the cookes and butlers, and other seruitors in the Great Masters house, and himselfe (yet) there verie conseruant also. Pythius presuming of his old acquaintance and familiaritie with Philephus, and waiting vpon his melancholic humour, began to persuaide him to reuenge the disgrace he liued in, and withall to shew him the meanes how to doe it, by poysoning of the Great Master: which might (as he said) fall out to his greater good than he was yet aware of. Philephus making semblant as if he had not disliked of the motion, was desirous to know of him what farther benefit might thereby arise vnto him, more than reuenge. To whom Pythius forthwith shewed the Bassas letters, to Ianus, whereby hee assured him, that whatsoever he should promise vnto anie man for the furtherance of the practice, he would to the full performe the same. Philephus hauing got full vnderstanding of the treason, presently discouered the same to Damboyse. By whose commendement Ianus and Pythius were straightwaies apprehended, and being examined confessed the treason: for which Ianus lost his head, and Pythius (as hee had well deserued) was shamefully hanged. Philephus for his fidelitie, was pardoned his former error, and againe receiued into the Great Masters fauour.

The Bassa vnderstanding that the treason was discouered, and the traitours executed, was much grieved therewith. Neuerthelesse, he ceased not with continuall batterie to shake the citie, but especially the tower of S. Nicholas, for the assailing whereof he made wonderfull preparation. Amongst other things, he had framed a great bridge, staid with strong ropes and cables, ouer a short fret of the sea, betwixt the place of his batterie and the same tower, whereon six men might march a breast: in which deuise he reposed great hope. But as the Turkes were making fast this bridge, and had (as they thought) brought the worke to a good perfection; Geruaise Rogers an English man of great courage, and verie skilfull in sea matters, found meanes by night to cut and breake in sunder all the ropes and cables wherewith the bridge was staid: which now loose, was by the violence of the sea quickly carried away, and the Turkes disappointed of their purpose. For which good seruice he was by the Great Master honorably rewarded, and of him in publike audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious batterie by the Bassa still maintained, and a new bridge framed vpon small boats and lighters, fast moored with cables and anchors; and diuers peeces of great ordinance placed in fusts and gallies. So that the tower was at one time battered both by sea and land, the defendants assailed with small shot and arrowes innumerable, and the tower at the same instant desperatly scaled. But Damboyse had so placed his great ordinance, that with the force thereof the bridge was broken in sunder, foure of their great fusts sunke, with great store both of men and ordinance: the defendants also in the tower, with shot, timber, stones, and other such like things provided for that purpose, grievously overwhelmed the Turkes that were scaling the wals, and beat them downe with great slaughter. This hot assault was desperately maintained by the Turkes, from three a clocke in the morning vntill ten: when the Bassa seeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the assault, hauing therein lost about 2500 men; whose dead bodies shortly after driuen on shoare, were spoyled by the Christians. The same night two mercinarie souldiers of Cretes, going about to haue fled vnto the enemy, were apprehended and put to death. And George Frapaine, who in the beginning of the siege fled from the Turkes, now againe vehemently suspected of treason, was executed also.

Thus neither force nor treason preuailing, the Bassa because he would leaue nothing vnto himselfe that might better his cause, sent certaine messengers vnto the great Master, offering vnto him in the name of the Turkish emperour, great rewards, with many honourable preferments, if he would yeeld vp the citie; which he could not (as they would haue persuaaded him) long hold against so mightie an enemy: wishing him now in his declining estate not to refuse such honourable and princely offers, for feare he were afterwards constrained to accept of farre worse; or els through his desperat willfulnesse plunge himselfe and his people into such extreame perill, as should be impossible for him or them to find any way out of. Whereunto the great Master in breefe answered: That he would not willingly in his sure estate use the counsell of his enemy; neither in his greatest distresse refuse chearefully to yeeld his life vnto Almighty God, to whom he did owe it; and that with farre better will than to yeeld up the citie vpon any conditions, beare they neuer so faire a shew of honour or profit. The messengers perceiving his constant resolution, rather to die than to yeeld his citie, began (according to instructions before giuen them by the Bassa) to temper with him another way, and to persuaide him to yeeld vnto the mightie emperour some small yearly tribute or other homage, as an acknowledgement of his greatnesse, and so to liue as his friend in peace. But the great Master knowing by the wooll example of others, that in that small request lay included the beginning of the Turkish thraldome and slaerie: vterly refused to pay him the least tribute, or to doe him the least homage that could be deuised. With which answer the messengers returned, hauing obtained nothing of that they were sent for.

The resolute answer of the great Master reported by the afore said messengers vnto the Bassa, troubled him exceedingly: for though he had small hope by force to win the citie, yet hee was alwayes in hope vntill now, at his pleasure to forsake the siege with some such reasonable composition as might stand with his honour. But sith nothing remained now, but by plaine force to constrain his enemies; hee resolved for the safegard of his honour, in that extremity to vse that extreame remedie. Wherefore beside the great peeces of batterie he had already planted against the wals, he mounted diuers smaller peeces much higher, thereby the more to annoy the defendants, by beating downe of their churches and high built houses. His ordinance thus placed, he battered the citie day and night for the space of foure dayes together without intermission: during which time, the Christians out of the citie spared not liberally to bestow their shot amongst their enemies also: so that the aire seemed to grow thicke, and the light of the day to be darkened with the smoke of the great ordinance; and the great shot came so thicke into the citie, that the fearefull women and children were glad to shroud themselves from the danger thereof, in cellars and caues vnder ground. So long continued this great batterie, that at length the strength of the wail gaue place to the furie of the cannon, and a faire breach was laid open for the enemy to enter: which was no sooner made, but that with the first shew thereof the Turkes gaue thereunto a desperat assault; and preuailing by reason of their multitude, had vpon the suddaine recovered the top of the wals, and there set vp some of their ensignes: but the Christians speedily continuing in on euery side to the defence of the breach, they were againe quickly repulsed and beaten down into the ditches, out of which most of them neuer rise more. At which time the Turkes in another place with their scaling ladders had gained the top of the wals, and there aduanced their ensignes also, and were now five hundred of them entred the citie, and come into the street called the Iews street: where they were encountered by the Great Master & his followers, and all slaine that were already entred, and their ensignes that stood vpon the wals throwne downe. The rest yet scaling the wals, and ignorant of the fortune of their fellowes, were likewise beaten from the wals, and with wonderfull slaughter rejected. So that the Bassa not able longer to endure the slaughter of his men, being in both places repulsed, caused a retreat to be sounded, and left the assault; wherein he had lost of his most forward men about five thousand, with small losse of the Christians. In this assault the great Master himselfe receiued five wounds, whereof one vnder his right pap was thought to haue been deadly: which yet afterwards was very well cured with the rest.

After that the Bassa had by the space of three months to small purpose spent all his forces and deuises vpon the citie, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raise his siege and depart, or to tarry and expect some better fortune, which in all his former actions had seemed almost to haue waited vpon him: to forsake the siege, was dishonourable; and to continue it without hope, presented no lesse danger. Besides that, in the former assaults he had already lost nine thousand of his best souldiours, and all the rest of his armie was filled with heauinesse and despair, to heare the wooll fighting and groning of their fellowes, of whom fiftene thousand lay dispersed dispersed in the campe fore wounded, and readie many of them to giue vp the ghost: and also but euen a litle before two great ships sent from Ferdinand king of NAPLES, with men and munition, were in despiht of all the Turkes gallies safely arriued at the RHODES, to the great joy and encouragement of the besieged, and no lesse discontentment of the Turks. Whilest the Bassa was thus deliberating what course to take, a rumor was raised in the campe, That the Christian princes were comming with great power to relieue the town: with which news the whole armie was exceedingly troubled; whereupon he raised his siege. Some others say that Mahomet hearing of the euill successe of his armie in the island of the RHODES, with the difficultie of the siege, and now readie to goe in person himselfe against the Sultan of ÆGIPP, sent for the Bassa, and that so the siege was raised. Howsoeuer it was, the Bassa before his departure caused all the vines and trees growing in that part of the island to be cut downe and spoiled: and so after he had poured forth his furie vpon the sencelesse creatures, which he could not according to his desire exercise vpon the people, againe embarked his armie, and with shame departed, the 17 day of August.

At the same time that the RHODES was thus besieged, Mahomet sent his old and most expert captain Achmetes Bassa, with a great fleet and a strong armie to make an entrance into ITALIE (for no kingdom was so strong, which the ambitious tyrant in the pride of his heart thought not hee might now commaund) and hauing long before conquered CONSTANTINOPLE, otherwise called New Rome, was still dreaming I wot not what of the conquest of Old Rome also. The mischeuous Bassa according to his great masters designs, embarked his armie at VALLONA (otherwise called AVLONA) a sea towne in the borders of MACEDONIA; and from thence passing directly ouer that narrow sea, which is in breadth about sixtie miles, landed his men in that rich and fertile part of ITALIE, called in ancient time APVLIA (now PUGLIA) next vnto the old and famous citie of HYDRUNTUM, at this day called OTRANTO: where as soone as this warlike Bassa had landed his forces, he foraged all that rich country alongst the sea coast, and tooke such infinit spoile as might well haue satisfied the greedie desire both of himselfe and of his hungrie soldiours: all which rich bootie he caused to be conueyed vnto his gallies. So when he had at his pleasure raunged vp and downe the country by the space of foureteene dayes, and saw that none made head against him, he laid siege to OTRANTO, the cheefe citie of that countrey, and as it were the key of that part of ITALIE: and hauing with such ordinance as he tooke out of his gallies made a breach, easily entred the same, and so without any great losse tooke the citie. A thing not greatly to be maruelled at, for as much as it was but weakly manned, and more weakly defended, by men altogether liuing in securitie in the midst of their wealth and pleasure. The Archbishop, with Zurlo the Gouverneur, and the cheefe men of the citie, for safegard of their liues fled into the great cathedrall church, as into a sanctuarie; where they were altogether most miserably slaine. The rest of the citizens, whose hard fortune it was to escape the sword (as people refered to more miserie) were after ward shipped ouer into GRECIA, and there sold for slaves. The landing of the Turkes in APVLIA, with the taking of OTRANTO, brought a generall feare vpon all ITALIE, inso much that Sixtus Quartus, then the great Bishop of Rome, forgetting all things saue himselfe, was about to haue forsaken the citie for feare. Now after the Turkes had at their pleasure ranackt OTRANTO, Achmetes caused the same to be strongly fortified (as the sure footing of the Turkes in ITALIE) and victualled for eighteene moneths, and there leauing eight thousand of his best souldiours in garrison, returned himselfe with the rest to VALLONA, and so by land to CONSTANTINOPLE to know his great Masters further pleasure: but purposing with himselfe, with the first of the next Spring to haue returned with greater forces againe into ITALIE for the prosecuting of his former victorie. Which if he had done, it was greatly to haue been feared, that all that goodly countrey, sometime mistresse of the world, but then and yet also rent in sunder by the discord and ambition of the Christian princes, had in short time become a prey vnto the barbarous Turke for euer.

But whilest the great Bassa (in his life time the great scourge of Christendome) thus proudly plotteth the ruine and destruction of faire ITALIE, God in whose hands the hearts of kings are, put an hooke in the great tyrants nose, and led him quite another way. For at the same time, the Caramanian king, aided by the Persian and the Sultan of ÆGIPP, had in a great battaile overthrowne Baiazet (*Mahomet*s eldest sonne then liuing) and slaine most part of his armie: in reuenge whereof, Mahomet with great expedition raised a great and puissant armie, and taking

Achmetes

Achmetes with him as his cheefe man of war, rejecting the wars of ITALIE vnto a more conuenient time, passed ouer into ASIA: where vpon the way, about a daies journey short of NICOMEDIA, a citie of BYTHINIA, at a place called GAIVISEN, he fell sicke; and there for the space of three dayes greuously tormented with an extreame paine in his bellie, which some supposed to be the collicke, died; but being indeed (as most men thought) poysoned: when hee had liued about 52 yeares, and thereof reigned 31, in the yeare of our Lord 1481. His bodie was afterwards magnificently buried in a chappell neere vnto the great Mahometane temple, which he himselfe first built at CONSTANTINOPLE.

Mahomet dies at Geimsin in Bythinia, now without suspect on of poyson. He is buried at Constantinople.

The death of this mightie man (who liuing troubled a great part of the world) was not much more lamented by those that were neerest vnto him (who euer liuing in feare of his crueltie, hated him deadly) than of his enemies, who euer in doubt of his greatnesse, were glad to heare of his end. He was of stature but low, and nothing answerable to the height of his mind, square set, and strong limbed; not inferior in strength (when he was yong) vnto any in his fathers court, but to Scanderbeg onely; his complexion was Tartarlike, fallow and melancholic, as were most of his ancestours the Oshtoman kings; his looke and countenance sterne, with his eyes piercing, hollow and little funke as it were in his head, and his nose so high and crooked that it almost touched his upper lip. To be breefe, his countenance was altogether such, as if nature had with most cunning hand therein depainted and most curiously set forth to view the inward disposition and qualities of his mind: which were on both parts notable. Hee was of a very sharpe and apprehensiu wit, learned as amongst that nation, especially in Astronomie, and could speake the Greek, Latine, Arabicke, Chaldey, and Persian tongues. He delighted much in reading of histories, and the liues of worthie men, especially the liues of Alexander the Great, and of Julius Cæsar, whom he propoed to himselfe as examples to follow. He was of an exceeding courage, and thereto very fortunate: a seuerer punisher of iniustice, in them especially to whom hee had committed the administration of justice. Men that excelled in any qualitie, he greatly fauoured and honourably entertained: as he did Gentill Bellin, a painter of VENICE, whom he purposely caused to come from thence to CONSTANTINOPLE, to draw the lively counterfeite of himselfe, for which he most bountifully rewarded him. He so seuerely punished theft, as that in his time all the wayes were safe, and a theefe scarcely to bee heard of. But these good parts were in him obscured with most horrible and notorious vices: for why, he was altogether irreligious, and of all others most perfidious, ambitious aboue measure, and in nothing more delighted than in blood: inso much, that it is probably gathered, that hee was in his time the death of eight hundred thousand men: craft, couetousnesse, and dissimulation were in him accounted for tollerable faults, in comparison of his greater vices. In his loue was no assurance, and his least displeasure was death: so that hee liued feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had issue three sonnes, Mustapha (dead before him as is before declared) Baiazet, and Gemes, or rather Zemes, of some called Zizimius, Isapha, Baiaxet, and Zemes. competitor of the empire with his elder brother: whom hee exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his reigne, so that he could not well attend any other thing but him: which oportunitie (by God himselfe no doubt offered for the safegard of ITALIE) Alphonse duke of CALABRIA, (king *Ferdinand*s eldest son) taking hold vpon, with all the power he could make in ITALIE, besieged the Turks in OTRANTO: with whom he had many sharpe skirmishes, wherein he lost diuers of his great captaines and commaunders; as the countie Iulio de Aquino, Loys de Capua, and the countie Iulio de Pisa, with others, and was still by the strong garrison of the Turks put to the worse: vntill such time, as being strengthened with aid out of SPAIN and PORTINGALE, but especially with certaine companies of most valiant souldiours sent from Matthias Corninus out of HUNGARIE (whose forces the Turks most feared) he began to cut them short, and straitly besieged the citie both by sea and land: vntill at length the besieged Turkes hearing of the death of their great emperour, and now hardly pressed with the dangers of a strait siege, no longer expecting the reuente of Achmetes their Generall (then readie to haue come to their rescue with five and twentie thousand soldiours) yielded vp the citie vnto the duke vpon composition before made, That they might with bag and baggage in safetie depart thence: which they did, after they had to the great terror of all ITALIE holden that strong citie by the space of a yeare. And so was that rich countrey rather by the mercie of God (in taking away the great tyrant) preferred, than by the strength or policie of the inhabitants; which was then in great danger to

Like earthborne brethren, Baiazet and Zizimus in armes, Seeke for the Turkish empire great, the one by th' others harmes.
Vntill that Baiazet preuail'd, and Zizimus was faine
To flie to RHODES, from thence to ROME, whereas he caught his baine.
Great stormes endured Baiazet, in peace and bloudie broiles:
A man both happie and accurst, amongst his richest spoiles.
But now forworne with trembling age, and ciuile discord new,
Thrust from his empire by his sonne, died poisoned by a Jew.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND SECOND EMPEROVR OF THE TURKES.

Pon the death of Mahomet the late emperor, great troubles began to arise about the succession in the Turkish empire; some of the Basses and great capitaines, seeking to place Baiazet the eldest sonne of Mahomet in the empire; and others with no lesse deuotion labouring to preferre Zemes, or Gemes, otherwise called Zizimus, Baiazet his younger brother. By occasion whereof, there arose two great and mightie factions, which in few daies grew to such heat, that manie great tumults and hoat skirmishes were made in diuers places of the imperiall citie, betwixt the fauourites of both factions, and great slaughter committed. In these broiles, the prowd Ianizaries for an old grudge slew Mahometes, one of the foure great Basses, a man by whose graue counsell most of the waightie affaires of the Turkish empire had beene managed during the raigne of the late emperor: And proceeding farther in their accustomed insolencie, spoiled all the Christians and Iewes which dwelt amongst them, of all their wealth and substance; at which time the rich merchants and citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE which were naturall Turkes themselves, escaped not their rauening hands, but became vnto them a prey and spoile also. The other three Basses of the court, Isack, Mesthes, and Achmetes (lately returned from the winning of HYDRUNTUM in ITALIA) although they secretly maligned and enuied one at the greatnesse of an other; yet to appease these so dangerous troubles, and to assure their owne estates, joynd hands together, and by their great authoritie and multitude of followers and fauourites, found meanes that Corcutus (one of the younger sonnes of Baiazet, a young prince of eightene yeares old) was as it were by generall consent of the nobilitie and souldiours saluted emperor, and with great triumph and solemnitie placed in the imperiall seat. In whose name, the aforesaid Basses at their pleasure disposed of all things, little or nothing regarding either Baiazet or Zemes, then both absent, the one at AMASIA, and the other at ICONIUM in LYCAONIA: for the jealous Turkish kings, neuer suffer their sonnes to liue in court neere vnto them, after they be growne to yeares of discretion; but send them to gouerne their prouinces farre off: where they are also vnder the command of the emperours lieutenants generall in ASIA or EVROBIA, and may not depart from their charge without great danger, not so much as to visit their father, without his expresse leaue and commandement. So jealous are those tyrants, yea euen of their owne sonnes.

Baiazet and Zemes hearing of the death of their father, and of the troubles in the imperiall citie, halted thitherward with all speed, where Baiazet being the neerer, first arriued: but finding the empire already possessed by Corcutus his younger sonne, and himselfe excluded; he in the griefe of his heart, poured forth most grievous complaints before God and man, calling heaven and earth to witnesse of the great wrong and injurie done vnto him by the prowd Basses. And what by teares and humble obtestations, what by great gifts and greater promises, but most of all by the earnest labour & sollicitation of Chersegle the Viceroy of GRACIA, and the Aga or capitaine of the Ianizaries, both his sons in law, preuailed so much with the great Basses and souldiours of the court, that Corcutus being of a mild and courteous disposition, overcome by their entreatie and the reuerence of his father, resigned vnto him the imperall gouernment, which he presently tooke vpon him with the genierall good liking of the people, and made CORCUTUS gouernor of LYCIA, CARIA, and IONIA, with the pleasant and rich countries thereabouts, allowing him a great yearly pension for the better maintenance of his estate, with promise also of the empire after his decease: and so sent him away to his charge, where he most pleasantly liued during the raigne of his father Baiazet; giuing himselfe wholly to the studie of Philosophie, which made that he was afterwards lesse fauoured of the Ianizaries and other men of warre.

ther Baiazet.*

Zemes thus preuented by his elder brother, and vnderstanding by his friends how all things stood at CONSTANTINOPLE, and that Baiazet was already possessed of the empire: returning with great speed, raised a puissant armie in the countries which were vnder his command; and marching through the heart of ASIA the lesse, by the way as he went, tooke into his possession such cities and strong places as he thought best: and so entering into BYTHINIA, tooke the great citie of PRUSA, the ancient seat of the Othoman kings. Purposing in himselfe, that as Baiazet had shut him out of EVROPE, so he would also in requitall thereof exclude him out of that part of the Turkish empire which is beyond HELLESPOINTVS in ASIA, and to make himselfe lord thereof. Wherein fortune at the first seemed vnto him most fauourable, all the people whereofsoeuer he came yeelding vnto him obedience as vnto their prince and soueraigne: so that in short time he seemed both vnto himselfe and to others in strong possession of that part of the empire.

Of these his proceedings Baiazet hauing intelligence, and perceiuing the greater part of his empire now in danger to bee lost; and doubting farther that Zemes his ambitious mind would hardly rest therewith long contented: for remedie of so great a mischeefe, leuied a strong and puissant armie, wherewith he passed ouer into ASIA, and came to NEAPOLIS, a citie of ANATOLIA, nere whereunto Zemes lay with his armie strongly encamped. As Baiazet was vpon the way against his brother, Achmetes the great Bassa (in the confession of all men the best man of warre, and most expert capitaine amongst the Turkes, and of all others most entirely beloued of the Ianizaries) came, and vnarmed, presented himselfe vpon his knees before Baiazet, his sword hanging at his saddle bow: to the great admiration of many, who could not but wonder to see so worthe a cheefestaine of so great place in time of seruice, without any apparent cause, in such humble manner to appeare before his soueraigne, as if he had had nothing to doe with armes. It chanced many yeares before in the mortall warres betwixt Mahomet the late and great emperor K of the Turkes, and Assymbicus Vsun-Cassanes the king of PERSIA, that Baiazet hauing the leading of the right wing of his fathers armie, had not martialled it in so good order as was to Mahomet his liking: for which cause he commaunded this Achmetes to goe and set that part of the battell in better order. Which his soueraignes commaund whiles hee most skilfully performed, Baiazet taking it in euill part, as tending to his owne disgrace, in great choller threatened the Bassa to find a time when he would be reuenged vpon him: But he being a man of great spirit, and one that durst both do and say much, perceiuing his meaning, bid him do what pleased him; and laying his hand vpon his sword, solemnly vowed, That whensoever he came to command as emperor, he would neuer after weare sword in field: the remembrance wherof was the cause that he then came in manner aforesaid, readie to serue if he were thereto commaunded, or otherwise to endure what so his princes pleasure was. Baiazet perceiuing, that the vnkindnesse so long before conceiued, was not yet digested, in token of grace stretched out to him his scepter, and taking him vp, commaunded him to girt his sword vnto his side, and not to remember that which he had long before both forgiven and forgotten. And knowing right well that he was a most valiant and expert capitaine, made him Generall of his armie, to the great contentment of the Ianizaries and the rest of the armie: who so soone as they saw him, gaue out diuers great shouts for joy, as if victorie had most assuredly attended vpon him. Achmetes taking vpon him the charge, came and encamped so nere as he could to Zemes, and so lay by the space of ten daies: during which time, many shapieskirmishes were made with diuers fortune; sometime the one side preuailling, and sometime the other. At length the matter was brought to a generall battell: wherein after a long and cruell fight, and great slaughter on both sides, the fortune of Baiazet, conducted by the policie of Achmetes, preuailed against Zemes. VVho seeing his armie ouerthrowne, betooke himselfe to flight, and came to ICONYM: in which flight, many of Zemes his followers were taken prisoners, whom Baiazet would haue pardoned and enlarged, but that by the persua-

sion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terrour of others suffered them all to be put to the sword.

Zemes doubting after this ouerthrow to fall into his brothers hands, and finding no means to make head againe: when he had stayed three daies at ICONYM, caused his treasure, plate, jewells, and other things of great valour and light carriage to be trussed vp, and taking with him his mother and his two yong children, a sonne and a daughter, accompaied with a small retinue, fled into SYRIA, then part of the dominion of Caytbeyus, commonly called the great Sultan of EGYPTE and SYRIA. It was not long after the departure of Zemes from ICONYM, but that Baiazet came thither with his armie, to haue surprised him: but vnderstanding of his flight, he took order for the peaceable gouernment of that part of his empire. And so hauing suppressed that dangerous rebellion, and againe reduced that troubled part of his empire to his obedience, returned with victorie to CONSTANTINOPLE.

The distressed prince Zemes travelling through SYRIA, came at length to HIERUSALEM: where he stayed a good space, deuoutly visiting the monuments of that most auncient and famous citie. From thence he travelled into EGYPTE; where at his first entrance into the countrey, he was met by diuers of the greatest nobilitie of that kingdome, sent from the great Sultan, by whom he was honourably conducted to CAIRE, and there presented to Caytbeyus, of whom hee was graciously welcommed: vnto whom after due reuerence done, hee declared the cause of his coming as followeth:

If it were not to me certainly knowne (most victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, or from whence descended, or with what iniurie enforced, after long and painefull trauell I am here arrived; it would much concerne me to use another manner of beginning of my speeche, and with greater protestation of words to seeke your gracious fauour. But for as much as all these things are vnto your most royall Maiestie sufficiently knowne, as I doe well perceiue in this, that your infinit clemencie hath entertained me with farre greater kindnesse, than I in such my aduerser fortune durst wish for; much lesse request: now nothing remaineth for me to say, more than iustly to complaine vnto your invincible Maiestie of the wrong and iniurie done vnto me by Baiazet, whom I waz more iustly to arme my cruell enemy than kind brother. For he not contented to haue taken vnto himselfe my fathers empire by great tumult and slaughter, hath with all hostilitie and force of armes persecuted me his brother, excluded out of the imperall citie, and then liuing in BYTHINIA, troublesome neither to him nor any of his people, and neuer rested untill he had chased me out of the bounds of my fathers empire. Neither hath the zealous desire of soueraigntie (whereof my father whilest he liued, had him alwayes in distrust) so much moued him vnto this so cruell a fact, as a certaine vnnaturall crueltie towards all his kindred in generall, and mortall hatred against me his brother in particular: for he which is already possessed of the empire, and doth with all hostilitie persecute a priuat person, subiect and exposed to his iniurie, that man thirsteth not after soueraigntie, but after blood; neither desireth he to conquer, but to kill. And whereas after my fathers death great troubles arise in CONSTANTINOPLE, and many bloodie skirmishes were fought betwixt the fauourits of both of vs, it cannot wish any truth be laid to my charge, as done by my aduise or counsell, I being at the same time so far from thence. Neither am I iustly to be blamed, if that after my fathers departure I put my selfe vpon the way towards CONSTANTINOPLE, especially being sent for thither by many my good friends, men of great marke and qualitie: but his fortune preuailling, I gaue place, and least my coming to the imperall citie might haue been the occasion of new troubles, I turned aside into BYTHINIA, and so to PRUSA, with purpose there to haue rested in quiet, if my brother would haue giuen me leaue. But so farre was he from that, to suffer me there to rest, as that I was by him most cruelly assailed as an open enemy: and had I not by speedie flight withdrauone my selfe from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my fathers kingdome, I must haue yeelded my selfe, my blood, and life, as a sacrifice into his cruell hands. Neither is he to me so mortall an enemy, or thirsteth after my life so much for feare, as for vengeance and mallice: for what is there in me to feare? Verely nothing: CONSTANTINOPLE is his, the fauour of the great cheefestaines and men of warre is his, the treasure and regall riches are all his, wherefore he hateth his brother, but feareth him not. He will sway all things alone, he will haue all that belongeth to the Othoman familie alone, and he, yea none but he, must lue alone. Xerxes was a mightie king, and yet in that great and large kingdome he not onely preferred his brethren in lesse, but had them also in great honour and estimation. What did Alexander the Great? who not only

Baiazet the second,

only tooke pleasure in his brother, but had him also as a companion of his most glorious expeditions: and many other famous kings of forraigne nations, and of our owne familie, haue ruled both more safely, and better strengthened with the counsell and aid of their most louing brethren, rather than with others. But Baiazet is of a farre other mind, reputed violence and haughtinesse of heart to be his greatest and surest defence: herein his fierce nature delighteth, more than in the lawfull course of nature, iustice, and equitie; he had rather haue his brother his enemy than his friend, and to driue him into exile than to make him partaker of his counsells. But I beseech thee most puissant Monarch, the faithful keeper and maintainer of our law and religion, by the sacred reliques of our great prophet Mahomet, which thou hast at Hierusalem and Macha, suffer me not, a kings sonne, to liue in banishment and exile, poore and miserable, a scorner of his brothers crueltie, farre from home, farre from his countrey and kingdome: but regarding the law of the great Prophet, lift vp the afflicted and oppressed, and by the great authoritie which you haue, bridle domesticall wrong: or if that will not take place, reuenge it with thy sword, and suffer not our empire, with so great trauell founded, by the crueltie or follie of one wishfull man to be ouerthrowne: which should be no more grieuous and lamentable to vs, than dangerous to your most high estate, and all other kings and princes of our religion. For you of your selfe vnderstand right well, what deadly enemies the Christian princes are vnto the Turks: and doe you thinke, that if any great warre (which I wish not) should arise of this our discord, that they would long rest in quiet, and as idle beholders stand looking on, untill it were of it selfe appeased? Or rather, hauing such an opportunitie presented, would not with might and maine suddainely invade our kingdome, before shaken with ciuile warres, and seeke the utter ruine and destruction of the same? which their desire, if that hatefull people could bring to passe (which thing Mahomet turne vpon themselves) my mind abhorreth to thinke how far that mischeefe would run: for the Othoman familie once rooted out, there is none of our religion, your Maiestie onely excepted, which is able to withstand their power: wherefore you must then stand for your selfe, and all the rest, you alone must withstand the force of the Christians, you must maintaine that warre with much losse, and greater charge, and most vncertaine successe. Wherefore inuincible Monarch, I most humbly beseech thee, that pitying our estate, whilst the matter is yet whole, and remedie is yet to be had, to deale with Baiazet by your ambassadors, That though he will not receiue me his brother as partener of the empire, yet at least to admit me into some small part of my fathers kingdome: let him raigene and rule, let all things be at his command; let it be lawfull for my poore man, but to liue in rest and quiet somewhere, possessing but so much as may suffice me honestly to lead a priuat life. which thing if he shall refuse to grant, although he neither feare the lawes of God or man: yet as I haue at Hierusalem, so will I also shortly at Macha (if by your leaue I may) complaine vnto the great prophet of the iniuries done vnto me by my cruell and vnnatural brother; and afterwards make prooffe of your compassion towards me, all which I hope shall much auail. But if (which I would not) I shall proue all these things in vaine, with desperation enforceth men to all extremities, I will goe with fire, sword, and slaughter, by secret and open force, by right and wrong; and hated, will vex my hatefull brother by all manner of mischeefe, by all manner of reuenge. Neither will I make an end of confounding of all, untill I be either receiued into part of the empire, or els together with my life leaue those desperat and lost things for him alone to enjoy. For I deeme it much better, quickly to die, than with disgrace and infamie to protract a lingering loathed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the distressed prince, willing him to bee of good cheere, and patiently to beare his present hap: for as much as it became a man borne in so high fortune, not to be discouraged with any mischance, or dismayed if things fell out otherwise than he looked for: commending him withall, for that hee saw in him no lesse courage than might well haue becommen his better estate: and willing him to liue still in hope, promised to doe what in him lay, to reconcile him vnto his brother, and to perswade him that he might be receiued into some part of the kingdom. And to that purpose shortly after dispatched away an honourable embassage to Baiaſet. Zemes in the meane while, by the same Sultans leaue, vpon a superstitious deuotion travelled into ARABIA, to visit the temple of Mahomet at Meca, and his sepulchre at Medina. Vpon his returne to Caire, the embassadours before sent, returned also, but not hauing obtained any thing they desired: for Baiaſet would not giue care to any agreement, but seemed altogether to contemne and despise his brother. Wherefore Zemes more vpon stomacke and desire of reuenge, than for any hope he had of the empire, determined with

A himselfe to make open warre vpon him: reposing some good hope in his secret friends, and in the result of some of the great captaines, who discontented with the government of Baiazet, secretly wished for his returne.

Whilest hee was thus plotting these waightie matters, a messenger with letters came fly-from the king of CARAMANIA, offering with all the power he could make, to joync with him, if he would take vp armes against his brother. This poore ritular king then liued in ARMENIA, and being able by his friends to make some good force, was in hope by joynning with Zemes, to recover some part of the Caramanian kingdom, from whence his father was not many yeares before driuen by the force of the late Turkish emperour Mahomet the Great, Baiazet his father.
It is hard to say, whether of these distressed and exiled princes, gaue the greater encouragement to the other, to take this desperat war in hand, being both together farre vnable by all the friends they could make to encounter with the great power of Baiazet. But what is so dangerous or desperat which aspiring minds will not attempt, in hope of a kingdomes whose brightnesse fo-resheweth their eyes, that they can see nothing but it.

Hereupon Zemes hauing receiued great gifts of the Ægyptian Sultan, with promise of aid, departed from CAIRE (the Sultan earnestly perswading him to the contrarie) &c. as it was before appointed, met with the Caramannian king vpon the borders of ASIA, the lesser: where they concluded to joyne together such forces as they had, and to invade Babazel. VVhich they accordingly did: for raising all the power they could, they entered into CILICIA, now called CARAMANNIA; and joyning their armies together, encamped betweene ICONIUM and LARENDA. Neither did Babazel in time of so great a danger sit still, not so much fearing his brothers power, as the reuolting of his captaines and souldiours; whom he knew, either to loue, or at least not to hate the young prince his brother. VVherfore he raised a great armie, and sent Achmetes the greatest man of war before with the one part thereof, himselfe following after with a far greater strength: for at that time he had vnder his ensignes two hundred thousand men.

As he was marching with this great armie, a rumor was raised in the campe, That some of his cheefe capitaines had conspired to betray him into the hands of his brother, and that many of the souldiours secretly fauouring Zemes, would vpon the joyning of the battell forsake him, and take part with his brother. Which report so troubled Baiazet, that he stood in doubt what to doe, or whom to trust: but knowing that nothing winneth the heart of the common souldiour more than the Generals bountie, he forthwith caused a wonderfull masse of money to be deuicd amongst the capitaines and souldiours, lodging their minds with ample promises of farre greater rewards, for their fidelitie and valour to be shewed in that present seruice. Having thus assured vnto himselfe the wauering minds of his souldiours, he began to draw neerer to Iconium, where his enemies lay encamped: and by glosing letters and flattering messengers made shew openly, as if he had bene very desirous to come to some good agreement with them, but secretly went about to stop all the straits & passages, in such manner as that it should not be possible for them againe to retire backe into Syria: for hee doubted nothing more, but least they being but few in number, & so in strength far vnequall vnto him, would not vpon so great disadvantage hazard the fortune of a battell, but retire themselves into Syria, and so to his exceeding trouble and infinite charge protract the warre.

E fini charge protract the warre.
Zemes perceiuing his brothers subtil drift, and seeing no such revolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by letters to him benee promised; and waighing with reason his owne weakneces, retired in good time vnto the straits of the mountaine A M A N V S, which deuidenth CILICcia from SYRIA. Here, despairing of all good successe in the enterprise he had taken in hand, he perswaded the Caramannian king his confederat to giue place vnto the time, and, to referue himselfe vnto his better fortune : and so breaking vp his armie, with a few of his followers came downe to the sea coast of CILICIA; where he hired a tall ship to attend in readinesse, that if any suddaine danger should arise, he might goe aboard, and so saue himselfe by sea. In the mean time he sent a messenger vnto Dambos, Great Master of the RHODES, certifying him, That for F as much as he had no place of safetie left amongst his owne people, wherein hee might throwd himselfe from the furie of his brother, still seeking after his life, hee would vpon his safe conduct come vnto him into his island of the RHODES. Which his request the Great Master easily gaunted, deeming the flight of so great a prince from the Turke, to be a thing much profitable to the Christian commonweale : and thereupon he presently sent forth certaine gallies to fetch him

him from the troublesome coast of C I C I L I A. But before these gallies were come, Zemes was enforced by the sudden access of his enemies, for the auoiding of present danger, to go aboard on that ship which he had proudly before prepared to be in readinesse for such purpose. And hauing put a little from the shore, shot backe againe an arrow with letters made fast vnto it, directed vnto his brother Baiazet, containing as followeth:

*Zemes his letters to his brother

Thou knowest (most unkind and cruell brother) that I lie not vnto the Christians, the mortall enemies of the Othoman family, for hatred of thy religion or nation; but enforced therunto by thy iniurious dealing, and dangerous practises which thou incessantly attemptest against me; yea even in my extreame miserie. But this assured hope I carrie with me, that the time will come when as thou the author of so great wrong, or thy children, shall receive the iust guerdon of this thy present rannie against thy brother.

It is reported, that when Baiazet had read these letters, he was so troubled in mind, that for certaine daies he gaue himselfe wholly to mourning and heauinesse, and would in no wise be comforted: inso much, that he was brought into the campe by the Bassaes, as a man halfe distraught of his wits, shunning for a season all mens speech and companie.

the Rhodians.*

Zemes sailing to the R H O D I E S, was there honourably receiued of the Great Master, and all the rest of the knights of the order: to whom in their publike assembly three daies after, he openly declared the causes of the discord betwix his brother and him: alleading for the colour of his rebellion, That although Baiazet were his elder brother, yet that he was borne whilest his father yet liued in priuat estate, vnder subjection and command, long before hee possessed the kingdom, and so no kings sonne: whereas hee himselfe was the first borne of his father, being an emperour, and so not heire of his fathers priuat fortune (as was Baiazet) but of his greatest honour and empire; and yet not of such an haucie mind, but that he could haue beene content to haue giuen place vnto his brother, so that he could haue beene contented likewise to haue granted him some small portion of the empire, wherein he might safely haue liued as a poore prince, and his brother: but that such was his pride, as that he would not vouchsafe to suffer him to liue so much as a poore priuat life in anie corner of so large an empire, and was therefore by his vnnaturall and tyranous dealing, enforced to craue aid of the Christian princes. Of whom (for so much as he had alwaies heard much honour) he was in good hope to find succour and reliefe in that his distressed estate: protesting vnto God and the world, that if euer it should be his good fortune by their meanes and helpe to obtaine the empire, he would neuer be vnmindfull of so great a benefit; but to make with them a perpetuall and inuolable peace, and so to rest their fast friend for euer. The Great Master on the other side comforting him with cheerfull speeches, promised to keepe him in safetie from the furie of his brother; and farther, to commend his cause to the other great kings and princes of Christendome.

of Zemes.*

This exiled prince Zemes was about the age of eight and twentie yeares when he came to the R H O D I E S; of stature tall, somewhat corpulent and well limbd, gray cied, but looking something a squint; hooke nosed, and in the middle rising, in such manner as the Persians commend in their kings: of colour browne, spare of speech, and by nature cholericke; a great feeder, so that he seemed rather to deuoure his meat than to eat it; much delighted in swimming, and to lie abroad in the night; pensie and melancholy, which men imputed to his great cares, neuer merrie but in the companie of the graund Master; a religious obseruer of his superstition, from which he could neuer be drawne during the long time he liued in exile; learned, as among the Turks, so that he writ the historie of his fathers life. But leauing him in safe keeping with the Graund Master of the R H O D I E S, let vs againe returne to the course of our historie.

Baiazet hauing now the second time chased away his brother, after he had well quieted that part of his troubled kingdom in A S I A, returned againe to C O N S T A N T I N O P L E, carefully attending when some new motion should be made by his brother, to his farther disquiet. But after he vnderstood that he was with the Great Master of the R H O D I E S, he sent certaine of the Bassaes (amongst whom Achmetes the great souldiour is reported to haue beene one) vnto the Great Master, requesting him to deliuer vp Zemes, offering for him a wonderfull summe of money. Which dishonourable request, when it could by no meanes be obtained, the same embassadors in the name of their master, concluded a peace verie commodious for the Rhodians: wherein amongst other things it was agreed, That the Great Master should keepe Zemes in safe custodie, so that he should no more trouble the Turkish empire: in consideration whereof, and for his honorable noble vltage, Baiazet should yearly pay vnto the Great Master thirtie thousand duckets the first of August, which was afterward accordingly paid.

It fortuned that whilest Achmetes the great Bassa (employed in matters abroad) was absent from the court, Baiazet discoursing with the other Bassaes his graue counsellors, vpon his late expedition into A S I A against his brother, seemed to be highly offended with the vntrustinesse and doubtfull faith of some of his greatest captaines and souldiours: yet vpon whom he might justly lay the blame, he well knew not, although it seemed by his talke he should somewhat distrust the great captaine Achmetes. Hereupon Isaack the most auintient Bassa of the court, and of greatest authoritie next vnto Baiazet himselfe (whose daughter, a ladie of exceeding beautie, Achmetes had long before married: but doubting that she had yeilded her honour to the wanton lust of Mustapha the eldest sonne of Mahomet the late emperour, had put her from him, and would by no meanes be reconciled; for which cause there was a secret hatred euer after betwix those two great Bassaes) perceiuing the emperours discontented and suspitious humor, and desiring nothing more than the destruction of Achmetes; tooke hold vpon this opportunitie, and by all meanes he could deuise, encreased the suspicion of the treason, which had alreadie too much possessed the jealous emperour: sometimes craftily imagining, intelligence to haue passed betwixt Zemes and Achmetes; and forthwith amplifying his power and authoritie, which (as hee said) was so great with the Ianizaries and souldiours of the court, that they by reason of his often imployments, werewholly at his deuotion; so that he might at his pleasure doe more in Zemes his quarrell, than should stand with the safetie of Baiazet: a matter to be well considered of, and also carefully preuented. For remedie of which dangers, it was thought necessarie that Achmetes at his returne to court, should be taken away and slaine.

Achmetes fearing nothing lesse than that which was contriued against him, came after his wonted manner to the court: and was with the other great Bassaes invited to a solemne supper, which Baiazet had commaunded to be prepared, to solace himselfe after his trauels (as it was giuen out) with his chiefe Bassaes. To this royall supper came Achmetes with the rest of the bidden guests, mistrusting nothing, and was there sumptuously feasted by Baiazet: who to make his guests the merrier, drunke wine plentifully himselfe, causing them also to drinke in like manner, so that they were full of wine: a thing vtterly forbidden by their law, yet daily more and more vied, especially by their great men in their feasts. Supper now ended and the night farre spent, Baiazet in token that they were welcome, and stood in his good grace, caused certaine rich robes of pleasing colours to be brought forth, and to be cast vpon euery of his guests one, giuing beside vnto euery one of them a faire guilt boule full of gold. But vpon Achmetes was cast a gowne of blacke velvet, which amongst the Turks may well be called the mantle of death; being so sure a token of the emperours heauie indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth or to intreat for him vpon whom it is by the emperours commandement so cast. Achmetes seeing himselfe now vnder the shadow of death, and knowing it but vaine to intreat for mercie; as he was a man of great spirit, brake forth and said: Oh catchpogli (which is as much as to say, thou sonne of a whore) sith thou intendedst so much crueltie against me, why didst thou not put it in execution before thou hadst enforced me to drinke this impure and forbidden wine? and so casting his cies vpon the ground sat still. The other Bassaes hauing leaue to depart, giuing thanks to the emperour, and crauing pardon for their excesse, kissed the ground at his feet and so departed: with whom Achmetes offered to haue gone out also, but was forthwith commaunded to sit still, for that the emperour had to talke with him in secret. The Bassaes were no sooned to depart, but the terrible executioners of Baiazes his wrath stept in, and laid hands vpon Achmetes to haue slaine him: when one of the Eunuchs in greatest fauour with the tyrant, standing by, aduised him not to be too hastie in executing of so great a man, so entirely beloued of his best souldiours and men of warre, but rather to stay his execution for a while, to see how the matter would be digested; and in the meane time, by torture to wrest out from him what might be got, to make it in some sort appeare, that he died for his due desert. Hereupon Baiazet deferred his execution to a farther time, and caused him there presently to be stript, and carried away to be tortured.

Amongst other gallants of the court which attended the comming out of the great Bassaes whom they followed, was one of Achmetes his sonnes, a gentleman of great hope, who misling his father amongst the rest, began presently to mistrust that all went not well: & speedily running from called of the Turkes KALE, but in antient time ACHILLEIA, which was at length deliuered vnto him by composition. From thence hee went to ACGIRMEN, otherwise called ASPROCASTRON, which after a moneths siege was also deliuered vp by composition: which two strong places so woon, he returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE.

princes sue to the Master of the Rhodes for Zemes.

Many great princes desirous of Zemes, laboured by their embassadours to haue obtained him of the Great Master of the RHODES, first Baiazet his brother fearing least hee should at one time or other againe breake forth vpon him, or els set vp by the Christian princes, trouble his estate, offered great summes of mony to haue had him deliuered into his hands; and Charles the French king purposing the conquest of NAPLES (which he in few yeares after performed) and after that to haue inuaded GRACIA, thought Zemes a most fit instrument for the furtherance of those his high designs, and was therefore wonderfull desirous to haue had him. Matthias also king of HUNGARIE (a fortunat Warriour against the Turke) perswaded that the hauing of him might be vnto him a great furtherance in the course of his victories, sought by all the meanes he could to haue obtained him. At which time also Innocentius the eight of that name, bishop of ROME, no lesse desirous than the rest, to haue in his keeping so great a pledge of peace and warre (the bridle of the Turkes furie, together with the large pension) hee was sure to receiue yearly from Baiazet for the safe custodie of him, so wrought the matter by Lynnell bishop of CONCORDIA his cunning legat, that the Great Master fearing on the one side to be constrained by the great power of Baiazet to graunt that he had so often refused, and now so earnestly solicited on the other side by the bishop, caused Zemes to bee deliuered to him at ROME in the yeare 1488: for which doing hee was by the bishop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardinall. So Zemes to the great profit of the bishop (who receiued from Baiazet a yearely pension of fortie thousand duckats) remained in safe custodie at ROME all the time of Innocentius, and also of Alexander the sixt his successour: vntill that the French king, Charles the eight, passing through the heart of ITALIE with a strong armie, against Alphonfus king of NAPLES in the yeare 1495, and making his way through the citie of ROME, so terrified the great Bishop, who altogether fauoured and furthered the title of Alphonfus, that he was glad to yeeld to such articles and conditions as pleased the king; and amongst the rest to giue in hostage vnto the king his gracelesse sonne Cesar Borgia Valentinus, and also to deliuer vnto him Zemes his honourable prisoner, as shall be afterwards in place conuenient at large declared.

In the beginning of Baiazet his raigne, whilst he was busied against his brother Zemes in ASIA, John Castriot, the sonne of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunately ouerthrowne the Turks in a battell neere vnto CROIA, recouered a great part of EPIRVS out of their possession. At which time also John Chernouich, a Christian prince of ALBANIA, casting off the Turkish yoke imposed vpon him by the late emperour Mahomet, suddainly tooke vp armes, and by the helpe of the Venetians valiantly expelled his enemies out of that part of ALBANIA: and so troubled Baiazet, that he was glad to suffer him peaceably to enjoy all that hee had by force recouered, and further to content him with a small tribute for the rest.

Caramania.

Baiazet highly offended with Abraham (whom some call Pyramet) the king of CARAMANIA, for aiding his brother Zemes against him; in reuenge thereof raised a great armie both in EVROPE and ASIA: & marching alongst ASIA the lesse through the countries of PHRIGIA, MISIA, CARIA, LYDIA, and PAMPHILIA, entered at length into CARAMANIA. But the king of CARAMANIA hearing before of his comming, and knowing himselfe too weak to meet him in field, fortified the strong cities and places of his kingdome, and retired with his armie into the straits of the mountaine TAVRVS, where it parteth CILICIA from SIRIA, wherein he was in more safetie than in any of his strongest holds. Baiazet finding no way to come to him, spent most part of the Summer in spoiling of the open countrey: but perceiving his enemies could not so be drawne into the field, he laied siege vnto the famous citie of TARSVS, being the cheefe citie of the champaigne part of CILICIA (the native place of S. Paule the Apostle) and in short time so battered the wals of the citie with his great ordinance, that he had made them faultable. The citizens considering the danger they were in, offered to deliuer vp their citie, their libertie liues and goods referred. Of which their offer Baiazet accepted, and most honourably performed his promise for their safetie: not permitting any of his souldiours to enter the citie, more than such as must needs for the guard of his person, and safe keeping of the citie. And for as much as Winter began now to grow fast on, he dispersed his souldiours into the country they villages round about, not suffering the countrey people to till or sow their land, or to doe any thing els which might turne to their profit or good; whereby they were enforced to yeeld themselves wholly to his deuotion. The Caramanian king seeing his people daily fall from him, and fearing to be at length forsaken of his souldiours also; in this his distresse obtained aid both of men and money of Caytheims the great Sultan of EGYPTE, and so with all the power hee could make, tooke the field with the first of the Spring, fully resolved to trie the fortune of a battell, although in strength and power he knew himselfe much inferiour to his puissant enemy.

Baiazet glad to see his enemy so forward, speedily assembled his armie, and without delay offered him battell: which the Caramanian king refused not. So betwixt them was begun a fierce and terrible fight; which by the skilfull conduct of the leaders, and exceeding courage of the souldiours, was maintained the whole day, with doubtfull victorie and great slaughter on both sides, new supplies still comming on in stead of them which were slaine. The day declining, the Caramanian king (whose fatal destinie had now appointed him vnto his last worke) seeing his wearied souldiours rather ouerlaid with multitude than by force vanquished, to begin to giue ground vnto their enemies; courageously thrust forward with his guard and other valiant souldiours about him, with such furie, that hee brake into the midst of his enemies battaille: where being knowne, hee was forthwith enuironned by the Turkes, and so hardly charged on every side, that hauing his horse slaine vnder him, he was enforced to fight on foot; where after he had with his owne hand slaine diuers of his enemies, hee fell downe dead in the midst of them. His souldiours discouraged with his death, turned their backs and fled, and in flying, were for most part either slaine or taken prisoners. After this victorie, Baiazet speedily ouerran all that large countrey, and without resistance, in short time brought vnder his obeyfance all the countrey of CILICIA.

A long and terrible battell betwixt Baiazet and the king of Caramania.

There was at that time in that part of CILICIA which is called TRACHEA, and lieth towards the sea side, an antient Mahometane prince, who had vnder his command most part of that country, with the famous and populous citie of SCANDELORO, the cheefe place of his resistance. This prince had of long time liued betwixt the Turkish kings and the kings of CARAMANNIA, as neuter, still fearing the greater, but indeed louing neither: and had vntill then chiefly maintained his state by the alliance he and his ancestors continually held with the kings of CYPRVS and the Grand Masters of the RHODES. Against this poore prince, the onely one now left in ASIA the lesse, not subject vnto the Turkish kings, began Baiazet now to turne his forces: purposing before he proceeded any further, to make a full conquest of the lesser ASIA, and so to make all sure behind him. Of which his purpose, the prince hauing knowledge, and wisely way-making his owne small power to withstand so puissant an enemy: offered by his embassadours to deliuer vnto Baiazet his chiefe citie of SCANDELORO, with all the rest of his territorie in CILICIA, vpon condition, that Baiazet should giue vnto him other possessions for it in some other part of ASIA the lesse, to the like value. Which his offer Baiazet accepted, and so became lord of all the sea coast, from the straits of BOSPHORVS vnto the confines of SIRIA.

After he had thus conquered CILICIA, with a great part of the mountaine TAVRVS, hee descended into ARMENIA the lesse, and in short time brought vnder his subiection so much of that country, as also of CAPPADOCIA, as was sometime belonging to the Caramanian kings. When Baiazet had thus slaine the Caramanian king, and subdued that most antient kingdome of the Turkes, which had long and many times mightily contended with the glory and power of the Othoman kings; he left Mustapha (one of his great Bassaes) at ICONIUM, with his Asian armie to keepe in obedience those new woon countries: and as a triumphant conqueror returned himselfe to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was of his subjects joyfully receiued.

After that Baiazet had thus enlarged his empire with the kingdome of CARAMANNIA, and he was now become an vnwelcome neighbour vnto the great Sultan of EGYPTE and SIRIA; he began to swell in disdain against that mightie prince, for that he had giuen aid against him, first vnto his brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian king in these late waies: of which wrong, purposing to be reuenged, hee shortly after appointed one Caragofes Bassa his lieutenant in ASIA, with Ishender, another of his great captaines, with a strong armie to inuade SIRIA, the purpose, when they were come to the vttermost parts of CILICIA, the new bounds of Baiazet's empire, were then to passe by the confines of Aladenles his kingdome, before they could passed the great mountaine TAVRVS to come into SYRIA. This Aladeules commanded as king ouer the rude and fierce people which dwelt alongst that great and rough mountaine, and was then in league with the Sultan: he hearing of the approach of the Turkes armie, with a great number of his mountaine people lay in ambush in the straits, whereby the Turkes must needs passe, of purpose to intercept them. Ishender marching in the vanguard with a great number of the voluntarie souldiours called Acaziz, as the manner of the Turkes is, and fearing nothing lesse than to be set vpon by the mountaine king, before he was aware was come into the middle of his enemies; and was by them so fiercely charged on euery side from their places of aduantage, that he there lost most part of his men, and forsaken of the rest, which sought by flight to saue themselves, he with his two sonnes and others were taken prisoners. Michael beg the eldest of the two being fast bound, was slaine by one of Aladeules his followers, whose brother he had slaine in that skirmish: his head being cut off, was by the commandement of Aladeules carried to his father Ishender, the more to greeue him: who disdainfully willed the messenger not to shew it vnto him, but to bid his master eat it if he would: with which answer Aladeules was exceedingly moued: neuertheless pitying the old mans miserie, he shortly after set Iaxis Beg the yonger brother at libertie; but Ishender himselfe he sent prisoner vnto Caitbeius the great Sultan at CAIRE, where he remained in prison five yeares after. Caragofes the Bassa discouraged with the losse of so great a man, retired with his armie backe againe into CILICIA, and from thence aduertised Baiazet what had happened, by whom he was commanded to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, as a man vnfit for so great an enterprise.

discomfited and taken prisoner and sent to CAIRE.

The next Spring following, Baiazet constant in his former resolution for the inuasion of SYRIA, sent Achmetes another of his Bassas, with a farre greater armie than had Caragofes, against the Sultan: who was no sooner come vnto the farther part of CILICIA, but he was there at a place called of the Turkes TZVCVROVA, encountered by the Egyptians and Arabians, and there in a great battaile ouerthrowne; wherein he himselfe fighting most valiantly, lost two of his fingers, and being taken prisoner was sent to CAIRE.

Baiazet with this ouerthrow rather incensed than discouraged, made great preparation the next yeare against the Sultan both by sea and land, such as he had not before at any time made. And when all things were now in readinesse, sent Alis Bassa (of some called Calibeu) and Chersogles his sonne in law, two notable captaines, with a great and puissant armie by land against the Egyptian Sultan: at which time he requested of the Venetians, with whom he was then in league, that he might by their good leaue, as occasion required, refresh his fleet (then readie to put to sea for the inuasion of SYRIA, as he said) in their Island of CYPRVS. Which his request was by the generall consent of the Senat denied, as a thing tending to the danger of their state: yet wisely doubting least Baiazet taking that deniall in euill part, should seeke to haue that by force which he could not obtaine by request, they presently sent Francisco Prinolo, their Admirall, to sea with thirtie gallies for the defence of that Island. He hearing that one fleet of the Turkes gallies, lately come out of HELISPONTVS, lay houering at the Island of SCIROVS, expecting a farre greater from the coast of IONIA; and carefully considering how secret and suddaine the Turkish designements were, although it was giuen out, that all that great preparation was made against the Sultan: yet to provide that they should not suddainely surpris the Isle, hee speedily sent sundrie companies of souldiours, especially archers out of CRETA, into CYPRVS, for the better defence thereof: but stayed himselfe with his fleet at the Island of NAXOS, that so at hand he might be the readier to withstand whatsoeuer the Turkes intended. But when he vnderstood that all their fleet was met, and now set forward, he hoisted saile, and held his course directly for CYPRVS. In the meane time, the Turkish fleet sayling alongst the coast of LYCIA, PAMPHYLIA, and CILICIA, kept on their course, vntill they came vpon the coast of SYRIA: by which time Calibeu and Chersogles were come with a mightie armie into CILICIA, neere vnto the mountaine TAVRVS.

Caitbeius the Egyptian Sultan hauing before had certaine intelligence of the great preparation that Baiazet had made against him, had before sent Vsbe, a most valiant and politicke captaine, with a strong armie of his Mamalukes and other his most expert souldiours into SYRIA to be readie at all times to withstand the Turkes. This worthie cheefestainder vnderstanding of the comming of the Turkes armie, thought it greater policie to carrie the calamities which alwayes wait vpon great armies, into the enemies countrey, than to receiue it into his owne bosome. And there-therefore although he knew himselfe to be for number farre inferior vnto his enemies, yet supplying that want with the valour courage and assured confidence he had reposed in the applying that with such violence and furie; that the earth seemed to tremble vnder their feet, and a most present destruction threatned vnto them all: Which terrible and cruell fight was maintained all that day with doubtfull victorie and exceeding slaughter on both sides. The policke Generals with new supplies of fresh souldiours, continually relieuing the most distressed parts of their battels: and they likewise as men prodigall of their liues, resolutely offering themselves to all dangers. When this most dreadfull fight had in this sort endured the whole day, and manie thousands of valiant men of late aliue, lay now dead vpon the ground, the approaching night brake off the battell: and both the armies foreweared and weakened (but especially the Turkes) retired to their camps, where they rested that night.

But the Egyptians comming to their campe, found all their carriages with their prouision of victuals and other necessaries quite taken away and gone. Which thing (as some write) the bordering people of the countrey (for most part liuing vpon robbrie) had done in the time of the battell, to please the Turkes: or as some others report, they which had the charge thereof, terrified with the greatnesse of the Turkes army, and doubtfulnessse of the battell, fled away: and taking their way alongst the sea side, fell into the hands of the Turkes which were put on shore out of the gallies, and so were of them spoiled. How soeuer it was (for in so great vncertaintie I dare not asseme) certaine it is, that the Egyptians were sore troubled with the losse of their prouision; fearing that if they should now stay longer in the countrey, they should forthwith be diuident vnto great extremities for want of necessaries. Wherefore, when they had euill rested that night, the next day early in the morning they presented themselves in order of battell before their enemies, brauing them into the field, and daring them to battell. The Turkes disdainning to see anie prouder in field than themselves, after they had in goodly order ranged their battels, set forward with ensignes displayed against their proud enemies. There began a most terrible and bloudie battell, fought with such desperat resolution, as if they had solemnly vowed either to ouercome or die in the place where they stood. A man would haue said, that the former daies furie had bene but a play in comparison of this. Manie valiant souldiours couered with their dead bodies the same ground whereon they liuing stood when they receiued the first encounter of their enemies. Of both those great armies none was seene to giue ground, or once looke back. The Turkes Ianizaries, and the Egyptians Mamalukes, the vndoubted strength of the greatest Mahometane Monarchs (souldiours for their valour much feared, and through the world respected) there buckled together, and standing foot to foot, spent the vttermost of their forces one vpon another: as if they would in that battell haue made it knowne vnto the world, which of them were to be accounted the better souldiours. Whilest victorie stood thus doubtfull, and the day was now farre spent, Vsbe (the Egyptian Generall) with fiftene thousand valiant horsemen (whom he had reserved for that purpose) gaue a fresh charge vpon the Turkes squadrons, with such force, that they had much adoe to keepe their order, and began now to giue ground; which was by and by made good againe, by other fresh men speedily brought on by the Bassas. Then became the battell more fierce than before, euery man struing to the vttermost of his power, to sell his life vnto his enemy as deere as he could. In which manner of fight all the rest of the day was spent, vntill that after the going downe of the sunne, the darknesse of the night comming fast on, they were glad for lacke of light to breake off the battell and to retire themselves into their camps, not knowing as yet who had got the better.

The Turkes Bassas taking view of the armie, and finding that of an hundred thousand fighting men which they brought into the field, there was scarce a third part left, and most of them also maimed or hurt; and doubting to be set vpon againe the next morning by their resolute enemies, fled away secretly the same night, leauing behind them for haft, their tents well stored with victuals, and all other things needfull. The Egyptians also hauing lost one halfe of their

armie (which was at the first seuentie thousand) and wanting their necessarie provision, were retired also the same night into the mountaine TAVRVS; not knowing anie thing of the flight of the Turkes. And some of the souldiours passing quite ouer the mountaine without stay into SYRIA, raised a report all ouer the countrey as they went, That the Sultans armie was overthrowne, and that the Turkes had got the victorie: so vncertaine was the true knowledge of the euent of that battell, euen vnto them that were present therein. The Egyptian lying that night vpon the side of the mountaine, had speedie intelligence from Aladenles of the flight of the Turkes: which being also confirmed by his espials to be true, he presently came downe from the mountaine, and entred into the Turkes campe, where he found plentie of victuals and of all other things needfull for the refreshing of his army.

Aladenles the mountaine king, with the people called Varfacide; by whose confines the Turkes must needs in their returne passe, robbed and slew manie of them in their disordered flight; and had so stopped the passages, that they were in flying overtaken by the Mamalukes and flaine, with so great a slaughter, that of all that great army of the Turkes few remained alieue to carrie newes home. Calibeius and Chersceogles the Bassaes, were in that flight both taken prisoners, and afterwards presented to Caitbeius the Sultan at CAIRE; with eigheteen ensignes of the Turkes Sanzackes, which are great men amongst them, hauing euerie one of them the regiment and commaund of some one province or other, and are in degree next vnto the Bassaes.

Neither was the fortune of Baiazet his naue at sea, better than that of his armie at land: for as it lay at rodevpon the coast of SYRIA at the mouth of the riuier Orontes, which runneth by the famous cite of ANTIOCHIA, his gallies were by tempest and rage of the sea put from their anchors, and in the sight of their enemies swallowed vp of the sea; or else driuen vpon the main, and there with the surges of the sea beaten in peeces. Baiazet not a little troubled with these losses both by sea and land, at length with much adoe, by his embassadours concluded a peace with the Sultan, vnto whom he restored all such places as he had before taken from him: for which the Sultan deliuered vnto him, Calibeius, Chersceogles, Achmetes, and Isbender, with all the rest of the Turkes prisoners, which he had in great number in his keeping.

Shortly after this peace was concluded betwixt these two great and mightie princes, Caitbeius the Sultan died: who of a Circassian slaue, by manie degrees of honour, and by the fauour of the Mamalukes his fellowes, obtained the rich kingdome of EGYPT, which he right worthily gouerned to his immortal praise by the space of two and twentie yeares; commanding at one time the great and rich countrey of EGYPT, with all AFFRIKE as farre as CIRENE, Westward; and IVDIA, with a great part of ARABIA, and all SYRIA, vnto the great and famous riuier Euphrates, Eastward. In the latter end of his raigne, he (ouetcome with the importunitie of his wife Dulibe an Arabian borne, a woman of an hautie spirit) joyned his sonne Mahomethes, a young man of about foure and twentie yeares old, with him in the fellowship of his kingdome; that so possessed of it, his father yet liuing, hee might the better enjoy it after his death. Contrarie to the custome of the Mamalukes, who of long time had not vsed to haue their king by succession, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choise, immediatly after the death of Caitbeius, slew Mahomethes his sonne; and in a few moneths after, foure mo, who one after another, without their good liking, had aspired vnto the kingdome: neither could they be contented, vntill such time as that they had according to their wonted custome set vp a Sultan of their owne choise.

About the same time that the aforesaid peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometane princes, Baiazet and Caitbeius, Charles the French king was making great preparation against Alphonfus king of NAPLES, giuing it out, That after he had recovered that kingdome, he would forthwith from thence invade the Turkes dominions in GRÆCIA. Which great attempt the haughtie king was induced to take in hand, by the persuasion of diuers of his nobilitie, but especially by the solicitation of Lodonius Sfortia duke of MILLAN: whereby the whole state of ITALIE was in short time after sore shaken, and Sfortia himselfe, author of those troubles, at last carried away by the French, miserably ended his dayes as a prisoner in FRANCE. Alphonfus the Neapolitane king doubting the greatnesse of the French king his enemy, entred into a confederation with certaine of the states of ITALIE against the French, but especially with Alexander the sixt then Bishop of ROME: for the beter assurance whereof, he gaue his bafe daughter in marriage to Godfrey Borgia, the Bishops sonne, and made him prince of CARINIA: his other sonne Francis he entertained also in great pay to serue him in his wars. And by his embassadour Pandonius Camillus, lately returned out of FRANCE, gaue Baiazet to vnderstand what the French king had purposed against them both, requesting him to aid him with six thousand horsemen and as many foot against their common enemy, promising to giue them honourable entertainment during those warres. And to further the matter, Alexander the great Bishop sent George Bucciarde, a Ligurian, skilfull in the Turkish language, embassadour to Baiazet, to declare vnto him with what great preparation, both by sea and land, the young French king (desirous of honour and the enlargement of his kingdome) was about to invade NAPLES; and then, with what great power (after he had dispatched his warres in ITALIE) he purposed to passe ouer into GRÆCIA; and that hee had to that end earnestly travelled with him, to haue Zemes his brother deliuered into his hands, whom he desired to vse as a most fit instrument for the troubling of his state and empire, by reason of his many friends: yet that his Holinesse (hauing the French in distrust as a proud and ambitious people, as also carefull for the danger of the cite of ROME, and of the state of ITALIE in generall) had entred into a confederation with Alphonfus king of NAPLES, with their vnited forces to withstand that proud nation, both by sea and land; wanting nothing more for the accomplishment thereof, than money: by which onely meanes Baiazet might (as hee said) prouide for the safetie of his kingdome in GRÆCIA, if he would put to his helping hand, to furnish them with money for the entertainment of souldiours: for as much as the cite of ROME, and the kingdome of NAPLES, were the surest wals of that side of the Othoman empire; if hee not altogether refusing the charge, would not spare for a little cost to maintaine the warre rather in that fortaine countrey, than to receiue it brought home to his owne dore: concluding, That it were much more commodious and easie with his treasures to repress his enemy in a strange countrey a farre off, than by dint of sword and plaine battell in his owne. A thing by experience well knowne, that they which haue neglected and set at nought remote dangers, for sparing of charge, haue afterwards been enforced with greater danger to receiue the same into their owne bosomes, when as they were become desperate and past remedie. Baiazet, who both by his espials and often letters and embassadours from Alphonfus, knew all this to be true, gaue great thanks to the bishop by his embassadour, for that he sitting in so high place, did so friendly and in so good time admonish him, both a stranger, and of a contrarie religion, of things of so great consequence: yet for answere, hee willed him to returne againe to his master with one Dautius his embassadour, who should carrie with him both money and his other secret resolutions concerning those matters. Amongst other things giuen him in charge, was an Epistle written in Greeke, wherein the barbarous king with great cunning perswaded the bishop to poyson Zemes his brother, as a man of a religion altogether contrarie to his: for indeed of him alone for his great vertues Baiazet stood in feare and doubt, least hee should by some chance escape out of prison to the troubling of his state. For the performance of this his request, he promised faithfully to pay vnto the bishop two hundred thousand duckats, and neuer after, so long as he liued, to take vp armes against the Christians. Otherwise than had his father Mahomet and his grandfather Amurath done, who both as deadly enemies vnto the name of the Christians, neuer ceased by continuall warres to worke their woe.

But George the bishops embassadour, and Dautius, travelling towards ITALIE, and hauing now happily passed the Adriaticke, as they were about to haue landed at ANCONA were boulded by Jo. Rouereus, brother to Julianus the Cardinall (a man of great account in those quarters) and cleane quit of their treasure and whatsoever else they had aboard. Rouereus pretending for the defence of the fact, That the bishop did owe him a great summe of money, due vnto him for his good seruice done in the time of Innocentius his predecessour, for which he now paid himselfe. Neither could the bishop, much troubled with that iniurie, euer after recouer any one part thereof, although he threatened vengeance with fire and sword, and also sought for recompence of the Venetians, whom it concerned to saue the Turkes harmelesse in those seas: for why, Rouereus bearing himselfe vpon the French, which were now vpon comming, whose faction he followed, kept the money, and set at nought the bishops thundering curses and vaine threats. Dautius himselfe, Baiazets embassadour, being set on shore, was glad to goe on foot to ANCONA; and so from thence passing vp the riuier Padus, came to Franciscus Gonzaga, duke of MANTVA, of whom (for the antient friendship betwixt him and Baiazet) hee was courteously entertained and furnished both with money and apparell, and so spoiled returned into GRÆCIA, to carrie G newes vnto his master how he had sped.

When Baiazet vnderstood by Dautius the euill successe he had in his late journey, he forth with sent Mustapha one of the Bassaes of the court, vnto the great Bishop Alexander, with like instructions as he had before giuen to Dautius; who with better hap arrived in ITALIE, and came to ROME in safetie; where he forgot no part of that was giuen him in charge by his great master. But amongst manie other things, the life of Zemes was that he most sought for at the Bishops hands.

At the same time, which was in the yeare 1495, the French king Charles the eight of that name, passing through the heart of ITALIE with a strong armie against Alphonfus king of NAPLES: and taking his way without leaue through the cite of ROME, so terrified Alexander the bishop, who (as we haue before said) altogether fauoured, and as much as in him lay furthered the cause of Alphonfus; that he was glad to yeld to all such articles and conditions as it pleased him then to demand: not purposing in himselfe at all the performance of anie of those things, which for feare he had with great solemnitie promised, as the iequell of the matter afterwards declared. Amongst other things, he was enforced to giue vnto the king his gracelesse sonne Cesar Borgia Valentinus (then one of the cardinals) in hostage, for the performance of the other of his promises. Which disgrace the craftie old bishop sought to couer, by gracing his sonne with the title of his legate: and with him he was also enforced to deliuer Zemes the Turke, Baiazet his brother his honourable prisoner; who to the great profit of the bishop and his predecessour, had remained in safe custodie at ROME about the space of seauen yeares. But Zemes within three daies after he was deliuered vnto the French, died at CAISTA, being before his deliuerance poisoned (as it was thought) with a powder of wonderfull whitenesse and pleasant tast; whose power was not presently to kill, but by little and little dispersing the force thereof, did in short time bring most assured death: which pleasant poison, Alexander the bishop skilfull in that practise (corrupted by Baiazet his gold, and enuying so great a good vnto the French) had caused to be cunningly mingled with the sugar wherewith Zemes vled to temper the water which he commonly dranke. His dead bodie was not long after sent to Baiazet, by Mustapha his ambassador, who to the great contentment of his master, had thus continued his death with the bishop. Not long after this dead bodie so farre brought, was by the appointment of Baiazet, honourably entered amongst his ancestors at PRYSA. Cesar Borgia also the bishops sonne, a little before giuen in hostage vnto the French king, deceiuing his keepers at VELITRAS, returned againe to ROME before the French king was come to NAPLES. This wicked impe come of an euill strain, not worth the remembrance but by way of detestation, (the verie monster of nature, if a man should well consider the course of his whole life) shortly after his escape, enuying at the honour of Candianus his brother, who then was Generall ouer the bishop his fathers forces, which were at that time great: when he had one night merily supped with his said brother with their mother Vannotia, traiterously caused him to be vnawares murdered in the streets as he was going home, and his dead bodie to be cast into the riuer of Tiber. Then casting off his priestly habit with his Cardinals robes, he tooke vpon him the leading of his fathers armie in his brothers stead, and gaue himselfe wholly to martiall affaires: a vocation best fitting his fierce and bloudie disposition. And with exceeding prodigalitie, wherewith he exhausted his fathers coffers and the treasures of the church, bound fast vnto him desperat ruffians and souldiours (especially Spaniards, his fathers countrey men) such as he knew fittest to serue for the execution of his most horrible deuises. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were such as all good men detested, yet did the old hypocrit his father winke thereat, fearing as it was thought, to be murdered of the viper himselfe, when it should serue for his purpose. Now when he had thus strengthened himselfe, and that he was become a terrour to all the nobilitie of ROME and the seigniories thereabout, he by the deuise and helpe of his father (who desired nothing more than to make him great) first draue the most honourable family of the Columnij out of the cite, and afterwards out of LATIUM: and by most execrable treacherie, poisoned or killed the honourable personages of the great houses of the Vrsini and Cætani; taking vnto himselfe their lands and possessions. With like cruelty he strangled at one time foure noblemen of the Camertes: and draue Guido Felsinus out of VRBIN. He tooke the cite of PISAVRUM from Io. Sfortia, who with much difficultie escaped his bloudie hands: and draue the Malatestas out of ARIMINUM. The great ladie Catherine rine Sfortia he thrust out of FORVM LIVII and FORVM CORNELII, and shamefully led her in triumph through ROME. And neuer satisfied with bloud, which he without measure shed, he tooke the cite of FAVENTIA from Astor Manfredus, a young gentleman of rare perfection: whom after the beastly tyrant had most horribly abused against nature, he caused to be cruelly strangled, and his dead bodie to be cast into Tiber. Having thus filled the measure of his iniquitie, and as a fretting canker, hauing either deuoured or driuen into exile most part of the Romane nobilitie; and purposing by the supplantation of his father, to make himselfe lord and soueraigne both of the cite, and of all LATIUM in the pride of his thoughts he was by the hand of the most highest attached and cast downe, and that by such meanes as he least feared: For being with his father at a solemn supper in the Vaticane, of purpose prepared for the destruction of certaine rich Cardinals and some other honourable citizens, they were both poisoned by the fatal error of one of the waiters; who mistaking of a flagon, gaue the poisoned wine to the accursed bishop and his sonne, which was prepared for the guests: whereof the old bishop in few daies after died. But his sonne who had drunke the same more delayed with water, although he died not of long time after, yet presently fell into such an extreame sicknesse, that he was not able to helpe himselfe, or to commaund his desperat followers, whereof he had great store: but lying sicke, in short time saw himselfe of them forsaken; and two of his enemies, Pius the Third, and Iulius the Second, one after another sitting in his fathers place. Of which two, Pius enjoyed that pontificall dignitie but sixteene daies: and Iulius succeeding him, caused this Cesar Borgia (who of right had deserued a thousand deaths) to bee shut vp in the castle called MOLES ADRIANI, from whence he set him at libertie vpon the deliuerie of certaine strong holds which were yet holden by his garrisons. After he had thus rid himselfe out of Iulius the bishops hands, he fled to OSTIA, and so by sea to NAPLES: where he was by the commaundement of Ferdinand king of SPAIN, apprehended by Consalvus the Great, and transported into SPAIN; for feare least he being of a most troublesome nature, and much resorted vnto by his old fauourits, should raise some new stir in ITALIE. He was no sooner arrived in SPAIN, but he was cast into prison in the castle of MEDINA, where after he had lien three yeares he deceiued his keepers, and with a escape which he had gotten, let himselfe downe from an high tower of the castle: and so escapeing, fled to the king of NAVARRE, whom he afterwards serued in his wars, and was in an hoate skirmish against the kings enemies (wherin he had obtained the victorie) slaine with a small shot. Vnworthy after so manie horrible villanies, to haue ended his daies so honorably. His dead bodie was found stript, and so brought vnto the king vpon a bad beast, as if it had been a dead calfe all naked; which was by his commaundement honourably buried at PAMPILONA.

The death of Cesar Borgia.

But to returne againe from whence we haue something too long with this troublesome body gone astray. The French king hauing thus lost both his great hostages, Zemes the Turke by death, and the Cardinall Borgia by escape, held on his journey towards NAPLES: and with wonderfull successe preuailed as hee went, all places yeelding vnto him without any great resistance. Alphonfus seeing himselfe destitute of such aid as he had in vaine requested both of the Turkish emperour and of the Venetians, and now almost beset with his mightie enemy, to whom so manie strong places had in shorter time been deliuered than anie man had before imagined; and withall, considering with himselfe, how that he had lost the hearts of his subjects (the strongest defence of princes) for that most of the nobilitie, and especially the Neapolitans, hated him for his too much severity in punishing the offenders in the late rebellion, wherein the princes of SARNE and SALERNE were chiefe; and the common people were no lesse offended with the grievous and heauie exactions, required of them for the maintenance of these warres, in so much that their murmuring speeches came oftentimes to his owne hearing; as oftentimes it falseth out, That the hatred of the subjects against their princes, which hath for feare of long time bene dissembled during their prosperitie, more frankly and fiercely breaketh out in their declining estate: For these causes, Alphonfus fearing to be forsaken of his people, as a man in desperate estate: For these causes, Alphonfus fearing to be forsaken of his people, as a man in desperate estate, with abundance of tears openly in the sight of all the Neapolitans, resigned his kingdome of NAPLES vnto his sonne Ferdinand, when as he had as yet scarcely reigned one whole yeare after the death of Ferdinand his father: and with foure gallies passed ouer to MAZERA a cite of CILICIA. His son Ferdinand, a prince of rare perfection and singularly graced with all the vertues of true nobilitie, and thereto deerey beloved of all the people, was to the wonderfull contentment of the Neapolitans with great joy and acclamations saluted king: and so hauing performed formed all the ceremonies belonging to his coronation, returned presently to his armie. By this time the French king with all his forces was entered farre into the kingdome of NAPLES: and hauing taken by assault certaine cities which trusted too much to their owne strength, strucke such a generall terrour into the minds of the Neapolitanes, that they thought no place now strong enough to abide his batteries, or power sufficient to encounter his forces. Ferdinand the young king with his armie had taken the straits of the Forrest of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further passage of the French king. But whilest he was there busied, he was suddenly advertised, that Fabritius Columna with a great power of Frenchmen had by the Appenines broken into CAMPANIA, and so was marching towards him: wherefore doubting to bee shut vp betwixt two strong armies of the enemies, he retired speedily to CAPVA, a strong citie situated vpon the riuer Vulturus; purposing there by meanes of that deepe riuer, to stay the French from passing farther. But whilest hee lay there, newes was brought vnto him, That all the citie of NAPLES was in an vpror, and that the citizens were all vp in armes, as men in doubt which way to turne themselves. Ferdinand not a little troubled with these bad newes, commended the charge of his armie and the defence of the citie of CAPVA to his cheefe captaines, and hid himselfe in post backe againe to NAPLES.

It is a strange thing to tell, what a suddaine alteration ensued vpon his arriual there: for suddenly all the tumult was appeased, euery man laied downe his armes, and welcommed him with a generall gratulation: for he was a man of a great and an inuincible courage, and of so comely a personage as might easily win the hearts of his subjects; insomuch, that when he earnestly requested them, that they would not traiterously betray him vnto his barbarous & cruell enemies, being their naturall king, or rather their brother borne and brought vp amongst them: they all with one consent answered, That they would spend their liues and goods in his quarrell, so long as he should keepe his armie whole, and defend the citie of CAPVA: But if it should so chanc, that the Aragonians should be ouerthrowne, or els for feare abandon that citie, and the French king, as victor, to approach the citie of NAPLES; he should doe both against reason and equitie, by exacting fidelitie and allegiance of his subjects, apprehended with so just a feare, he should so expose that noble citie with the fruitfull countrey therabout, to bee spoiled and destroyed by a mercilesse and cruell enemy. Whilest Ferdinand was thus busied in appeasing and confirming his wauering subjects at NAPLES, the French king had taken diuers cities, and was come before CAPVA. The citizens of CAPVA although they were alwayes well affected to the Aragonian kings: yet seeing the French king as a most violent tempest to beare downe all before him, began now to consult amongst themselves of yeelding vp the citie; whereunto they were the more prickt forward, by the suddaine reuolt of the great capitaine Triunulius with his followers, as also by the departure of Verginius and Petilianus, two great and famous commanders, who seeing themselves forsaken of Triunulius, fled with their companies vnto the citie of NOLA. In this discomfiture of king Ferdinand his armie, the Frenchmen had entered into the suburbs of the citie: which thing Gothfredus and Gaspar (two valiant Germane captaines) beholding, gallied with their companies out of the citie, of purpose to abate the pride of the French, & to confirme the doubtfull citizens: These worthie captaines when they had with exceeding valour repulled the French, and thought to haue againe returned into the citie, could not be suffered to enter, but were by the citizens shut out of the gate, in danger to haue had their throats cut by the enemy. In which perplexitie they were glad vpon their knees to entreat the cowardly citizens standing vpon the wals, not in such traiterous manner to betray their friends readie in their defence to bestow their liues: and with much entreating, at length obtained of those heartlesse men, that they might by ten and ten in a companie be receiued in at one gate of the citie, and so put out at another, farthest from the danger of the enemy: in which sort when they had passed through the citie, they tooke the way towards NAPLES: and vpon the way met with the king at AVERSA, vnto whom they declared all that had happened in his absence at CAPVA. Who although he saw his armie dispersed, and all things now desperat, yet went hee on forward, and came to the very gates of CAPVA, and there called vpon diuers of the cheefe men of the citie, requiring to be let in. But when hee saw there was none to giue him answer, and an ensigne of the French king displayed vpon the wall, in token that the citie was become French, hee returned to NAPLES: where he found the gates now shut against him, and all the citizens vp againe in armes, and not willing to receiue any of the fouldiors which came from CAPVA, more than the king himselfe:

for flying fame preuenting his returne, had filled euery corner of the citie with report, That all the cheefe captaines of his armie were either gone out to the enemy, or els for safegard of their liues fled: That the whole armie was broken vp, and CAPVA yeelded to the French. Wherefore the Neapolitanes framing their fancies according to the condition of the time; began now also to fawne vpon the good fortune of the French; and to haue king Ferdinand in contempt: which hee well perceiving, and fetching a compasse farther off from the citie, came vnto the castle, whereinto he was receiued with his followers by his faithfull captaines therein before left. But proudly foreseeing that he could not there long stay, but that hee should bee besieged by his enemies both by sea and land, he commended the keeping of that peece vnto Alphonfus D'ana- NARTIA, a most valiant capitaine; and departed himselfe with twentie gallies well appointed vnto Æ- NARTIA, an Island not farre from NAPLES, hauing in it a commodious harbour and a strong castle: where fortune, neuer firme but in miserie, seemed againe to deride the poore remainder of his honor: For comming thither, the capitaine of the castle, vnworthely named Iustus, forgetting his dutie towards his soueraigne, of whom he had before receiued many extraordinarie fauours, most traiterously now in his so hard distresse shut the gates of the castle against him at his landing, and vnkindly refused to receiue him. With which v unexpected ingratitude, the poore king was wonderfully perplexed and almost abashed: yet with earnest entreatie and ample commemoration of the benefits and preferments which both his father and himselfe had in times past bestowed vpon him, he preuailed so much with this vnthankfull man, that hee was content to receiue him into the castle, so that he would come but himselfe alone: of which his offer, when no more could be got, the king seemed to accept. So the capitaine hauing opened a port to receiue him in, was in the very entrance thereof suddenly stabd to the heart with a dagger by king Fer- A most resolute dand, and slaine in the midst of his armed fouldiours. Which was done with such a countenance and maiestie, that the warders with their weapons in their hands, dismayed with his look, forthwith at his commaundement opened the gate, and receiued him in with all his followers. Whereby it appeareth, That in the countenance of princes resteth a certaine diuine maiestie, in all fortunes about the common course of nature: which is of power to daunt the hearts of most disloyall traitors in the performance of their vnnaturall treasons. The next day after the departure of king Ferdinand from the castle of NAPLES, Charles the French king was receiued into the citie with such pompe, triumph, and acclamation of the Neapolitanes, as if they had even then by the benefit of that forraigne king been restored vnto perfect libertie, and deliuered out of some long and hard bondage. Shortly after, the castle of NAPLES, with all the strong places thereabout, were yeelded vnto the French, and embassadours sent from all the princes and people of that kingdome, yeelding themselves into the power of the French king. Then Ferdinand seeing all lost and gone, departed from ÆNARTIA, where he lay expecting the euent of his hard fortune, and sailed into SICILIA. Thus the house of ARAGON in lesse than fife moneths lost the kingdome of NAPLES, about 63 yeares after that it was first taken from the French by Alphonfus the elder, this Ferdinand his great grandfather.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this warre, had long before filled the eares of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks dominions in EVROPE: but when they saw the French ensignes displayed vpon the wals of the castles and strong townes alongst the coast of CALABRIA and SALERNE, such a sudden feare fell vpon the Turkes garrisons alongst the coast of EPIRVS and MACEDONIA on the other side of the Adriaticke, oueragainst that part of ITALIE, that many of them forsooke their charge: the Christians in those places, as also in GRACIA and PELOPONESVS beginning then to lift vp their heads in hope of their deliuerance, and to make the best preparation they could to joyne with the French against the Turkes: but especially the rough and wild people inhabiting the high mountaines called AEROBRYA in the borders of EPIRVS, who presently tooke vp armes, refusing to be any longer tributaries vnto the Turkish emperour.

This prosperous and speedie successe of the French king in the conquest of NAPLES, filled the minds of most of the Christian princes, as also of the Turkish emperour, with a doubtfull expectation, whether his greatnesse would grow: many being of opinion, that he couertly affected the empire of ROMB, and to make himselfe the sole monarch of ITALIE. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Bishop Alexander, and Maximilian then emperour. Baiazet also so feared much, least he should vpon the suddaine turne his forces into EPIRVS or GRACIA, to his his no small disquiet. And Ferdinand, the aduised king of SPAIN, was no lesse carefull for the safetie of SICILIA. Lodouicus Sfortia also (shortly after created duke of MILLAN, the cheefe occasion of the French kings comming into ITALIE, and a great aider of him in those warres) began now to consider better of the matter, and to stand in doubt of the king, whom hee well perceiued to make small reckoning of his word or promise, so that he might thereby enlarge his dominions. And the Venetians, who in all these warres had stood looking on as neuters (in hope that when the Aragonians and French had with long warres, which they vainely imagined, well weakened one another, that they might then at their pleasure share out something for themselves) were now in doubt with the rest of the states of ITALIE to lose some part of their owne territorie: for now there was no prince or state in ITALIE able to oppose themselves against the French, but stood as it were all at his deuotion.

Wherefore the aforesaid princes, namely Maximilian the emperour, Ferdinand king of SPAIN, Alexander Bishop of ROME, the state of VENICE, and Lotharius Sforza duke of MILLAN, for the more assurance of their estates, by their embassadors speedily sent from one to another, concluded a strong league amongst themselves, whereof the chiefe capitulation was, That if any of these confederates should vpon their owne accord make war vpon any other prince, they should doe it vpon their owne charges : but if any of them should chance to be inuaded by any other, that then every one of these confederates should, of their owne charge send foure thousand horse and ten thousand foot in aid of their confederate so inuaded, vntill the wars were ended : which league was to endure for twentie yeares. The fame of this league was welcome to many other princes, but especially to Baiazet, who now feared nothing more than the forces of the French, and therefore had offered vnto the Venetians, to aid them both by sea and land against the French, if their affaires should so require. This league so much pleased other princes, but it troubled the French king more, as of purpose made against him, although it was by the confederates pretended to be made onely for their owne safetie. Wherefore he with all expedition placed his best capitaines with strong garrisons in all the cities and strong holds of the kingdome of NAPLES, and left Mompensier his viceroy in the cite of NAPLES, and with the rest of his armie returned towards FRANCE, purposing by the way as he went to terrifie the dissembling Bishop, so if it were possible to draw him from the league, and afterwards to deal with Sfortia and the rest as he might. But when he was come neere vnto ROME, the Bishop for feare fled out of the cite to PERVSIVM, intending from thence to haue fled to VENICE, if the French king should haue further pursued him. Charles deceived of his purpose, in peaceable manner entered the cite, and there stayed three dayes and so departed vsing violence against none, but against such as were well knowne to be of the Aragonian faction. From ROME he marched to PISA, and so with much paine passing the Appenines, was at the riuer of Tanus, not farre from PARMA, set vpon by Franciscus Gonzaga duke of MANTVA, generall of a great armie which the Venetians and Sfortia had raised vpon the sudden to haue stopped his passage : in which battaile he was in great danger to haue bene taken or slaine, and there lost his tents, with all the rich spoile gotten in the rich kingdome of NAPLES: yet hauing at length with great slaughter valiantly repulsed his enemies, he afterwards returned in safetie home.

About the same time that this battell was fought at Tarrus, the young king Ferdinand; lately driven out of his kingdome by the French king, returned againe out of SICILIA to NAPLES: where he was joyfully receiued of the Neapolitanes, and by the helpe of his friends (but especially of the great Consalus, sent in his aid by Ferdinand king of SPAIN) in lesse than a yeares space recouered the kingdome of NAPLES againe from the French: and then dying without issue, left the same vnto his vncl Federicus: wherein the vncertainetie of worldly honours, the cheefe felicitie of ambitious minds, is well to be noted; when as in that one kingdome the cheefe government was six times changed in lesse than the space of three yeares. For first Ferdinand the elder dying, left that kingdome vnto his sonne Alphonsus, at such time as the French king was making preparation for these warres: Alphonsus despairing of his owne forces, resigned the kingdome to his sonne Ferdinand, when he had scarcely raigned fully a yeare: Ferdinand in lesse than three moneths was driven quite out of ITALIE by Charles the French king: Charles possessed of the kingdome, in short time after was againe dispossessed by the same Ferdinand: Ferdinand hauing with much trouble thrust out the French, died within lesse than a yeare: After whom succeded Federicus his vncl, no lesse vnfortunate than the rest. And Charles the French king himselfe liued not long after, but died suddenly as he came from playing at Tennis, being then but seuen and twentie yeares old, leauing the flourishing kingdome of FRANCE, with the troublesome title pretended to the kingdome of NAPLES, vnto Lewis his successeur, who liued with great trouble to conquer the same, and with greater griefe to loofe it againe:

But to retaine againe to the course of our historie, from whence the great occurrents of that time (not altogether impertinent to our purpose) haue a little too faire led vs. Baiaſet deliuered of two great feares, first by the death of his brother Zemes, and after by the casting out of the French out of NAPLES; began now to turne his forces vpon the Christians, and by his lieutenant Bala-beg, Sanzacke of SILISTRA, inuaded the countiees of P.ODOLIA and R.VSSIA, being part of the Polonian kingdome, where the Turkes did great harme; and carried away many prisoners. But comming againe the second time, and making such like spoile as before, they stayed so long, that the cold of the Winter (which in those countiees is very extreame) was now come on; and in their returne, as they were about to haue passed through MOLDAVIA, they were by Stephanus, prince of that countrey, denied both passage and victuals, and forced to take the way along the sea coast: where many of them stragling from the armie, were by the way cut off and slaine by the Moldauians; and the rest, what by the extremitie of the cold, what for want of food, and fouldnesse of the way, perished: so that of that great armie very few returned home. The Turkes histories report, That in this expedition were lost fortie thousand Turkes.

land Turkes. He sent also Cadames one of his Bassaes into ILLIRIA; who spoiling that countrey, with a part of CROATIA, was encountered by nine thousand Croatians and Hungarians neere vnto the riuer MORAVA, vnder the leading of countie Bernard Francopaine: where after a cruell and bloodie fight, the Christians were put to the worse, and aboute seven thousand of them slaine; the rest saved themselves by flight through the mountaines and woods. Of the Christians that were lost, manie were drowned in MORAVA, chusing rather so to end their daies than to fall into the hands of their cruell enemies. This ouerthrow was imputed to the Generall, who would needs giue the Turkes battell in plaine field, although he was carrieftly entreated by countie To. Torquatus to haue kept the straits of that countrey, whereby he might haue had great advantage of the enemye. Torquatus himselfe hauing lost all his horsemen in that battell, and his horse killed vnder him, fought valiantly on foot; vntill hee was by the multitude of his enemies oppressed and slaine. The Bassa to giue Balaçet a sure testimonie of the victorie, caused all the noses of the slaine Christians to be cut off and put vpon strings, and so by wagon sent them as a barbarous present to CONSTANTINOPLE. After the death of Charles the French king, Lewes the twelfth of that name hauing obtained that kingdome, writ himselfe also duke of MILLAN, as descended of one of the daughters of To. Galeatius first duke of MILLAN: in which his supposed right he was fully resolved to make warre vpon Sfortia then duke of MILLAN. And for his better successe in those warres, sought by all meanes he could, to draw some other of the princes and states of ITALIE into the fellowship of that intended warre; but aboute all others the Venetians, as most commodious for his purpose, with whom he made a firme leaguer; and for the aid they were to giue him, couenanted that they should haue for their share, the cite of CREMONA, with all the pleasant countrey about ABDVA, then part of Sfortia his dominion: which was afterwards accordingly performed.

*S*forthe understanding of this compact made against him, and knowing himselfe farre too weak of himselfe to stand against so puissant enemies; attempted first to let Mussulman the emperour, with the states of GERMANIE vpon the French king : But that not sorting to his desire, he fought to agree with the king by offering to hold his dukedome of him, by paying him a yeately tribute : After he had thus in vaine proued all the meanes he could deuise to haue appeased the French king, & provided for his own safetie; he by his embassadors sent of purpose, certified Rais et of the confederation betwixt the French king and the Venetians; and that their purpose was, after they had oppressed him, and some other of the states of ITALIE, then with their united forces to invade his dominions: and that therefore it were good for him in time to looke vnto it, and to giue aide against those which would in short time become his most dangerous enemies. By this meanes the Duke was in good hope, so to busie the Venetians by bringing the Turke vpon them, as that they should stand the French in small stead. At which time algiue to the embassadors of FLORENCE did what they could to prick forward the Turke to make warres.

warres vpon the Venetians; for the malice they bare against them for protecting them of PISA against the oppression of the Florentines.

Baiazet perswaded by the embassadors, and calling to remembrance the injuries before done him by the Venetians; first in giuing aid to John Castriot the sonne of Scanderbeg, and John Chermouich another prince of EPIRVS (whereby he lost a great part of that countrey, and was also further enforced to yeeld to such conditions as altogether stood not with his honour;) and againe by denying to giue his fleet leaue to put into their harbours in CYPRVS, in the time of his warres against the Sultan of AEOT: all which he was glad then to endure, for feare least that his brother Zemes (then liuing) should by their means be set vp against him; promised now to do what these embassadors had requested: glad in his mind that the discord of the Christian princes had presented vnto him so fit an opportunitie of reuenge.

First part of the Venetian ter-ritorie spoiled by
the Turkes.

Hereupon he made great preparation both by sea and land against the Venetians, and vpon the sudden caused Scander Bassa (his lieutenant in ILLYRIA) with twelue thousand horse to breake into the countrey of FRIVLI, part of the Venetian territorie vpon the frontiers of ITALIE. The Bassa as he had in charge, passing ouer diuers great riuers, at length entred the countrey, burning and destroying all before him as farre as LIQVENTIA, carrying away with him all the poore countrey people prisoners. But when he was come to the banks of TILIAVENTVM, and vnderstood that hee came too late to pleasure the duke of MILLAN (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without resistance driuen him quite out of ITALIE and GERMANIE) he there, with more then barbarous crueltie put foure thousand poore prisoners to the sword: and so hauing filled the countrey with mourning and with bloud, returned from whence he came, loded with the spoile of that rich countrey.

At the same time also, Baiazet put to sea such a fleet as none of his predecessors had before set forth; and with a great armie in person himselfe marched alongst the sea coast of MOREA, in such sort, as that his armie by land and his fleet at sea (as neere as they could) kept euen pace, the one within sight of the other. Neither were the Venetians vnmindfull of themselves, but set forth a strong fleet vnder the charge of Anthony Grimani their Admirall; in number farre inferior to the Turkes, but for equiPAGE, strength, skilfull mariners, and all other manner of warlike prouision, much superiour. For which cause the Turkes, although desired and braued by the Venetians, yet durst not at the first ioyne with them in battell; but still crept alongst the coast of MOREA, not daring to put farther off into the sea. In this their course, the Venetians troubled them exceedingly, sometimes making shew as if they would haue constrained them to fight, and otherwhiles giuing them chase, neuer departing far from them; wisely accounting it right good seruice, if they could but keepe that huge fleet from landing in ITALIE, or other places of the Venetian territorie. Most men were in good hope, that if those great fleets should haue joyned in battell, the Venetians should haue had a notable victorie; for that the enemy as afraid, kept so dangerous a course and so neere the maine. The longer they thus failed, the more was the state of VENICE offended with their Admirall, that he contrarie to all expectation delayed to fight, and still suffered the dangerous enemy to approach neerer and neerer their territories: and there were none which had not rather he should haue set all vpon the hazard of one battell, than to protract by delay a long and doubtfull warre. Whilest all mens minds were thus in expectation of some great exploit to be done vpon the enemy, newes came to the cite, That the Turkes fleet had put into the haven SAPIEN in the island SPHRAQA, to water, and was there embayed by the Venetians. This report was of most men joyfully receiued, as if the victorie had been already assured: and so much the more, for that it was vainly supposed, that it would be gained without any great losse. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter farre otherwise, saying, That the place, wherein the enemy lay was such, as that he might safely at his pleasure depart thence. Yet for so much as the Turkes fleet was more subject vnto danger in putting out of the harbour than in the wide sea, there was no man but was of opinion, That the Venetian Admirall would set vpon them as they should come forth againe. Whilest men were thus diuining too and fro, and the Venetians attended the coming forth of the enemies fleet, it fortuned that Andreas Lauredanus, and Albanus Armerius (two valiant gentlemen) but a little before come from CORINTH of purpose to be present at the battell, were the first that began the fight; and with their two nimble ships (after they had changed a few bullets) boarded a tall ship of the Turkes, being of such beautie and burthen that she seemed rather a ca-file than a ship, whereof one Baruch of SMYRNA (a notable pirat) was captaine: who after a long and cruell fight, perceiuing that he must either yeeld or by force be taken, desperately set fire on his owne ship, by rage whereof both she and the Venetian ships fast graptled vnto her, were all three together burnt downe to the water: manie of the men (to shun the violence of the fire) leapt ouer board into the sea, where some of them were taken vp by other ships, and some perished. Some few others of the Venetian fleet courageously assailed the Turkes at their coming out; and doing great harme, put the Turkes whole fleet in no small feare. But the most part of the Venetian gallies lay looking on a farr off vnto whom the other before in fight with the Turkes, after they had done what they could, retired also. But by that they had done, it appeared plainly that the Venetian Admirall that day let slip out of his hands a most notable victorie, if he as a resolute man had with his whole fleet charged the enemy.

After this fight the Turkes held on their course, still keeping MOREA on the right hand, whom the Venetians still followed: at length the Turkes fleet was come to the entrance of the gulfe of PATRAS, where the Venetians againe faintly setting vpon them, suffered them to recover the gulfe; with no lesse dishonour than they had before let them escape at the port SAPIENTIA. For the Venetians, hauing the aduantage of the place, and better appointed for fight at sea, might easily (as it was supposed) haue gained the victorie, if the commanders (but especially the admirall) had been so forward in the seruice as became men of their place. But manie of the afraid to fight, lay aloofe; so that Danthes the Turkes Admirall (who perceiuing himselfe too weake, had purposed to haue run his gallies on shoare, and so to haue fled to the armie at land if he had felt himselfe ouercharged by the Venetian fleet) had now contrarie to his expectation recovered the gulfe he desired, though not without losse of some of his gallies. Within this gulfe standeth the auncient cite of NAVPACTVM (now called LEPANTO) then subject to the Venetians, whither Baiazet was then come by land with his armie; and now by the coming of his fleet into the gulfe, laid hard siege vnto the cite both by sea and land. They of the cite seeing themselves on euerie side beset with their enemies, without any great resistance fell to composition with Baiazet, and so yeelded vnto him the cite, which the Turkes hold at this day.

Lepanto yielded
to the Turke.

Grimani the Venetian Admirall returning to Venice, was for his euill seruice (or rather for that he according to his mild nature had not used severity against such captaines as refused to fight) cast into prison: and although he was a man mightily friended, yet was he by a publike decree banished into one of the Absyrtides, islands vpon the coast of LIBYRIA. From the first foundation of the cite of VENICE was neuer man impugned with more spight, or defended by greater friends: but common hatred preuailling; he was neuerthelessse exiled. Thus Baiazet hauing made a road into the Venetian territorie by Scander Bassa, and taken from thence the cite of NAVPACTVM with the countrey thereabout, returned with victorie to CONSTANTINOPE.

The next yeare following, which was the yeare 1500, Baiazet put to sea a greater and stronger fleet than he had the yeare before: and himselfe in person, with a puissant armie of an hundred & fiftie thousand men, entred by the strait of CORINTH into PELLOPONNESVS, and marching through the countrey came and encamped before the strong cite of MATHONE (now called MODON) then vnder the gouernment of the Venetians. At which time his great fleet met him there also by sea, as he had before appointed. When he had thus beset the cite both by sea and land, and with long and continuall batterie made three great and faire breaches in the wals, he gaue vnto the same two terrible assaults, and that with such desperat furie that manie of them which went foremost vnto the breach, ouerthrowne by the presse of them which followed, were trodden to death. Yet neuerthelessse the cite was both times valiantly defended by the citizens and garrison souldiours: so that when he had done what he could, he was glad to retire from the wals, hauing filled the towne ditches with the bodies of his slaine Turkes. The Venetian Admirall Triusanius lying at the isle of ZACYNTHVS (but farre too weake to fight with the enemy) in the beginning of the siege sent Valerius Marcellus and Baptista Polanus, with two gallies full of men and munition in reliefe of the besieged: and now doubting their farther wants, sent to Maripetrum, Alex. Cothius of CORCYRA, and Cachuris of HYDRUNTVM, with three other great gallies, with men, munition, and such other things as he thought needfull for the defence of the cite. These three resolute captaines comming with a full wind, and packing on all their sailes, brake through the Turkes fleet lying in their way, and ran themselves a ground vnder the wals of the towne: for they of the towne had so barred the hauen for feare of the enemye, that they could not that way possibly get in. The citizens and souldiours joyfull of the coming of this fresh supplie, and withall fearing least the gallies should be fet off againe from them by the enemye, came running by heapes from all parts of the citie towards the sea, to receive this new come aid: which was done with such a confused disorder, that diuers places of the citie towards the land, were left without defendants, as if there had bene no enemye nere. Which the Ianizaries quickly perceiuing, presently entered by those forsaken places with little or no resistance. Then the citizens all too late began to make head: for the Ianizaries already entered, made way for the rest of the armie; which swarming into the citie, slew without pittie all that came in the way, as well Grecians as Venetians. In this slaughter Antonius Fabius and Bardella, gouernours of the towne, with Andreas Falco, bishop of METHONE, in his pontificalibus and his myre on his head, were slaine: none escaped the furie, but such as were for their strength referred for seruile labour, or for their beautie, to the victors lust: and of these a thousand bound fast together in long ropes were brought to Baiazets pavilion, and there in his sight by his commandement cruelly murdered. The cities of CORONE and PYLVS, now called NAVARRINVM sometime the dwelling place of old Nestor, terrified with the taking of METHONE, yielded themselves by composition to Baiazet. This citie of CRISSEVM, now knowne by the name of Caput S. Galli, was taken also by Cherseogles, Baiazet his sonne in law. All these were cities belonging to the Venetians. NAVPLIVM was also besieged by Haly Bassa, but yet still defended by the Venetians. Baiazet hauing new fortified the citie of METHONE, and stored it with new inhabitants, left in it a strong garrison, and so with victorie returned to CONSTANTINOPLE.

At this time Trinisanius the Venetian Admirall died (of greefe of mind as some supposed) in whose place the Senat sent Benedictus Pisaurius, a noble and valiant gentleman, who with the Venetian fleet followed the enemye, then departing from the siege of NAVPLIVM, pursuing them euen vnto the straits of Hellepontus, still cutting off such as stragled or tarried behind the rest of the fleet: by which meanes hee tooke about twentie of their ships and gallies, and in his returne tooke from the Turkes the Island of Ægina, and landing in diuers places of the Turkes dominions, left vnto them the wofull remembrance of his being there. Afterwards meeting with Consulius, surnamed the Great (sent by Ferdinand king of SPAINNE, to aid him against the Turkes) at ZACYNTHVS, hee invaded CEPHALENIA, which Trinisanius his predecessor had in vaine attempted the yeare before, and laied hard siege to the citie, which was for a space valiantly defended by the Turkes: yet at length by the good conduct of Consulius it was by force taken, when as Gisdare the Gouernour thereof, with his garrison of Turkes, had before fought it out euen to the last man. The citie being taken, all the whole Island yielded forthwith to the Venetians.

Pisaurius hauing taken CEPHALENIA, repaired the citie, and leauing a strong garrison for defence of the isle, departed to CORCYRA: where hee was aduertised, That the Turkes were tugging forth a great fleet against the next Spring; whereof some part lay in the bay of AMBRACIA not farre from CORCYRA, some at EANTE, and the rest within the straits of HELLESPONTVS. Wherefore purposing to do some exploit vpon those gallies which lay in the bay of AMBRACIA, to auert the mind of the enemye from perceiuing of that he had secretly with himselfe intended, hee sent the greatest part of his fleet vnto the island of NERITOS, who suddenly landing, should put the inhabitants in feare. The capitaines sent about this businesse, cheerefully put in execution what the Admirall had commaunded, and by their sudden landing raised such a tumult, that all the countiees thereabout were filled with the expectation of that which should ensue thereof. The Bay of AMBRACIA is so straitened on either side with the mountaines of EPHYRS, that the entrance thereof is but halfe a mile ouer: but by and by opening it selfe into a great widenesse, and running vp into the land, maketh a most pleasant and safe harbour for ships and gallies to ride in. Pisaurius with a faire wind comming thitherwith eight gallies well appointed, when the Turkes thought him to haue been at NERITOS, and entering the strait, rowing farther into the bay, burnt one of the Turkes great gallies, to the terrour of all them that dwell round about the bay, and carried away with him eleuen moe, laded with munition and victuall, through the strait; the Turkes in vaine fretting thereat, and doing what they could with their great ordinance from shore to haue sunke him in going out of the bay. But hauing done what he came for, he returned with his prey againe to CORCYRA. Not long after he also recovered the castle of PYLVS in MOSSA, which as it was suddenly gotten, so was it as suddenlye lost. For Camalia, a notable pyrat of the Turkes, who had been abroad seeking after purchase, putting into that harbour by chance tooke three gallies, there lost by the Admirall for defence of the place; and so terrified the faint hearted capitaine, that hee felts his composition with the pyrat, to yeeld him the castle; so that hee and his souldiours might in safetie depart: which the pyrat granting had the castle deliuered vnto him, which he could not with three greater strength haue possibly won. So was PYLVS for the second time in the year yeelded vnto the Turkes, and was both times the death of the cowardly capitaine, which gaue in vnto being both beheaded by the commandement of the Admirall. About the same time Pisaurius attempted to haue burnt other of the Turkes gallies lying in the river Euryas, vpon the coast of Macedonia, but without good successe as before. For the Turkes, made more carefull by the losse they had but a little before receiued at AMBRACIA, did now more vigilantly keepe their gallies. So that when Pisaurius had in certain small vessels, made of purpose for that purpose, in that river two hundred resolute souldiours to haue gone vnto the coast to haue fired the gallies, they were by the way, after they had entered a good way into the river, encountered by the Turkes, and embred to returne. But before they could get out of the river, the wind blew so contrary to such a stiff gale full in the mouth of the river, that the souldiours ouermastered with the violence of the weather, when they had done what they could, and spent all their strength, were driuen aboord some on the one side of the river, and some on the other, and so fell into the hands of their enemies, of whom it boorded not to graue mercie.

About this time Baiazet tooke also the ancient and famous citie of DARRACHIVM, now called DURAZO; from the Venetians being before ruinous and almost quite abandoned by the inhabitants as a place of danger, and not to be kept, now that the Turke had gon all the country round about it. The Venetians sore pressed with these warres so long maintained against the Turke, had many times prayed aid of other Christian princes, and were well holpen by the Spaniard in the taking of CEPHALENIA: and now Lewes the French king vpon a good deuotion to that warre, sent the lord Rahessen with seven tall ships, and fifteene gallies well appointed out of PROVINCIA and GENOVA, to aid the Venetians his friends. His fleet departing from NAPLES, where they had by the way put in, and passing about ITALIA, and so through the Ionian sea, came to MELLOS; one of the CYCLADES, at which Island Pisaurius with his fleet in short time arrived also: from whence they by mutuall consent departed together to invade the Island of LESBOS. And being there safely arrived, landed their forces, and layed siege vnto the strong citie of MYTELLENE, where by the furie of their artillerie they in short time had made a faire breach in the wall. In the time of this batterie whilest the breach was in making, the Pisaurius with part of his fleet sailed to TENEDOS, for it was reported, That certaine of the Turkes gallies were then comming for that place out of Hellepontus. Which report, as some write, was of purpose giuen out by the French, thereby to withdraw the Venetian Admirall from the siege, that so in the meane time they being in good hope to take the towne in his absence, might themselves carrie away the honour thereof, together with the rich spoile. Others fauouring the French, blame the Venetian Admirall, as if he had of purpose departed, enuying at the honour of the French: which is hard to be beleued in so honourable a personage, and in an action so much concerning the good of his commonweale. Howsoeuer it was, the breach being made, in his absence was by the Frenchmen presently assaulted: although that Paulus Valdesius the Venetian vice-Admirall earnestly requested the French Admirall to deferre the assault for a while, and to expect the returne of Pisaurius. Which his counsell the French Admirall gaue him the hearing of, but yet went forward with the assault. The Frenchmen after their manner furiously assailing the breach, were valiantly repulsd, by the Turkes: so that in the citie was manfully defended by the Turkes, and the Frenchmen enforced to retire. The French Admirall hauing taken this repulse, commaunded all things to be carried aboard, purposing to haue forsaken the siege, and so to haue departed: when in the meane time the Venetian Admirall returned, and with much adoe persuaded the French to stay. Whereupon the battle was againe begun with greater furie than before, and now the leaders were consulting of a

But for the better vnderstanding of the ground of these troubles, which hapned at this time in the raigne of Baiazet by occasion of these two fugitiue Persians; as also of the mortall warres which afterwards ensued betwixt Hysmael (commonly called the great Sophi of PERSIA) and Selymus, Baiazet his successor: it shall not be much from our purpose briefly to declare the great mutation which at this time hapned in the Persian kingdome, as well in the state it selfe; as in matters of their superstition. At such time as Asymbeius Vsun-Cassanes reigned in PERSIA, there was one Haider Erdebil (whom Iouius calleth by the name of Harduelles) a man honorably descended amongst the Persians; who contemning worldly honour, riches, pleasure, and whatsoeuer else belonged vnto delicacie of life (commonly accounted the greatest part of humane felicitie) as meere vanities and trifles, led such a straight and austere kind of life, with such continencie and contempt of the world, as that the vulgar people, for most part giuen to pleasure, wondering at that in him which they could not or would not themselves imitate, began to haue the man in singular admiration for the opinion they had conceived of his vpright life and rare vertues. The fame of this new prophet (for so he was accounted) was growne so great in the Persian kingdome, that people without number resorted out of all parts of PERSIA and ARMENIA vnto the great citie of TAVRIS to see the man. And he the more to seduce the multitude (delighted with nouelties) began to inuay against the common received opinion of the Mahometanes, concerning the true successours of their great prophet; and to reuince the opinion of Giumi, surnamed Sofi: perswading the people (as if he had been inspired with some diuine inspiration) That none of the professors of the Mahometane religion should inherit the Kingdome of heaven after they were dead, but such as were the followers of Haly, the true successour of the great prophet Mahomet, and his fellow in writing. Whom he taught them onely to honour as priuie to the mind of the great prophet, and so to receiue his writings as of all others most authentically: rejecting Eubekin, Omer, and Osman, with their writings, as most wicked & accursed men, whom the Turkes had euer, and yet doe with the other Mahometanes, honour and worship as the true successours of their great prophet Mahomet, and his sincere interpreters, together with the aforesaid Haly, whom the Persians doe onely acknowledge: and therefore in their praiers doe commonly say, Cursed be Eubekir, Omer, and Osman, and God be fauourable to Haly and well pleased with him. Whiche their difference about the true successor of their prophet, in whom was no truth, hath been, and yet is, one of the greatest causes of the mortall wars betwene the Turkes and Persians: and not the diuers interpretation of their law (as manie haue written) which among the Turkes and Persians is all one.

The Turkes and Persians differ not about the interpretation of their law, but about the true successor of their great prophet Mahomet.

Vsun-Cassanes moued with the fame and vertues of this new prophet, or rather (as some thought) desirous to win the hearts of the multitude of them that had receiued this new phantastic; gaue him in marriage his daughter Martha, begotten of the Christian ladie Despina the daughter of Calo Ioannes emperor of TRAPZONDE. Whiche marriage the Christian emperor made with that Mahometane prince, and he also accepted thereof, thereby to strengthen themselves against the Turkish emperor Mahomet the Great; whose power was then become a terrour vnto all his neighbour princes: but to how small purpose this policie serued them both, is before declared in the life of the same Mahomet. At the conclusion of this marriage, the emperor had specially couenanted with Vsun-Cassanes, that his daughter Despina might haue the free exercise of the Christian religion. Whereby it easily came to passe, that this Martha her daughter, instructed by her mother, became a Christian also: who now married by her father vnto this precise hypocrite Haider Erdebil, in short time bare him a sonne called Hysmael, whom she so much as she could trained vp in the principles of the Christian religion. Whereby it came to passe, that afterwards when hee had by rare fortune obtained the kingdome of PERSIA, he alwaies during his life had the Christians in good regard, and neuer found fault with their religion.

Haider thus graced with the marriage of the great kings daughter Martha, only for his rare vertues and puritie of life, as was commonly supposed; grew now into farre greater credit and estimation of the people than before. So that his doctrine and opinions began to be generally receiued, and the number of his followers so greatly augmented, that Iacup succeeding his father Vsun-Cassanes but lately dead, began to haue the power and credit of Haider his brother in law in suspect; and to distrust least the Persians (who secretly fauoured the remainder of the posteritie of their auncient kings) should assemble together vnder the colour of this new superstition, and and raise some dangerous rebellion before he were well settled in his seat. For he was not ignorant, that Asymbeius Vsun-Cassanes (his father) had but by force and pollicie vsurped the kingdome, hauing killed Moloonchres the lawfull king: whereof there arose two factions, some favouring the vsurper, and other some the poore remainder of the discent of their auncient kings of the race of Tamerlane. For which causes Iacup (as hee was of a suspitious and troublesome nature, and about measure jealous of his state, nothing regarding the neere alliance or reputed liuelynesse of his godly brother in law) caused him, suspecting no such matter, to be secretly murthered: and so hauing stricke off his head, with fire and sword persecuted all the professors of that new doctrine; so to deliuer himselfe for euer of that his vaine and needlesse feare: Hysmael the sonne of Haider (who was afterwards called the great Sophi of PERSIA) being then but a child, as it were by fatall destinie escaped the furie of his cruell vncke Iacup, and fled into HIRCANIA vnto one Pyrebales his fathers friend, who then ruled in a small territorie neere vnto the Caspian sea.

Amongst many other of the disciples and followers of Haider (which in that cruell persecution were glad to flee for safeguard of their liues) the two before named Chasan Shelife, and Schach Culi, afterwards surnamed Cuselbas, in outward shew both of vertue and learning not inferior vnto their master, flying that dangerous tempest and passing ouer the riuer Euphrates, came into ARMENIA the lesser, and there tooke vp their dwelling at the great mountaine ANTITAVRVS: at the foot whereof the broken rockes haue diuers darke and obscure caues, made partly by art, and partly by nature; which place is of the inhabitants called Tekeli: whereof diuers historiographers, I know not whether deceiued by the name of the place, or else wittingly transferring the name of the place vnto the man that liued therein, haue called this Schach Culi (who of the two proued of greater fame) by the name of Techellis, by which name we will also from henceforth call him. A thing heretofore much vsed amongst the religious, and also some of the children of great princes, who oftentimes bare the names of the places where they were borne, or where they most liued. This place is both wholesome and exceeding pleasant, for the varietie of fruits and liuely springs, wherewith the plaines adioyning are continually watered, and the mountains at all times of the yeare garnished.

Here Shelife with his companion Techellis, hauing separated themselves farre from the company of men, and giuen themselves wholly to a contemplatiue life, for diuers yeares liued most straitly and austerely, contenting themselves with such things as the earth of it selfe afforded them, without seeking for better. These hypocrites were first scene, and afterwards acquainted with the shepherds and herdsmen liuing vpon the mountaines: and in processe of time with the rude husbandmen and countrey people, who wondering at their strait and deuout kind of life, relieved them with all things necessarie. Yea Baiazet himselfe hearing of their austere and deuout manner of liuing, sent them yearly six or seauen thousand aspers; as his almes giuen them vpon charitie and deuotion. But afterwards when they began to tell fortunes, and as it were by the way of diuination to prognosticate of things to come; the rurall people held them for more than men, and conceiued of them a firme opinion that they were some diuine prophets. And so were by the countrey people first drawne into the countrey villages, and afterwards as if it had been against their wils, into the cities; where they had in short time filled all the countrey, farre and neere, with the admiration of their fame. But after they began to publish their new phantastical doctrine concerning the true successour of their great prophet Mahomet, they waited not their new-fangled followers (as had Haider their master before among the Persians) who had them in singular reuerence; persuaded now by them, that they should be condemned for euer, if they did not (as they were by them taught) giue the honour of the true succession of their great prophet, onely to Haly, and him onely to reuerence and call vpon next vnto the great prophet himselfe.

When they had thus with their often sermons and blind prophecies seduced the people, and in short time woon great credit amongst the vulgar sort, of themselves too much giuen to noueltie and superstition; they commanded their disciples and followers to weare vpon their Turkish hats a red band or riband, whereby to be knowne from others that were not of their profession. Of which red bands or ribands, they which professed this new superstition, were and yet are ouer all the East part of the world called by the name of Cuselbassas, which is to say Red heads.

The beginning of the Cuselbassas.

Hysmael

Hyfmaell his behaviour in the time of his exile.

Hyfmaell also living in exile, most earnestly embraced that new superstition which Haider his father had before taught in PERSIA, but with farre better fortune and successe. For as soone as he was growne to mans estate, he following his fathers manner of life, and being by nature wonderfull eloquent, comely of person, exceeding wise, and of an invincible courage, was of the rude vulgar people accounted of more like a god than a man: so that he grew to be of great fame and power amongst those barbarous people with whom he liued. And not the base and vulgar sort only, but diuers noblemen also and others of good reputation, once allured with the noveltie of his doctrine, the more to manifest their good will towards the author of their sect; after they had forsaken their old superstition, ceased not (as the manner of men is) to commend him in the highest degree of vertue & honor. And he himselfe as yet but a youth, altogether bending his wit to the setting forth of himselfe, making semblant of more than was indeed in him, obtained, as if it had bene against his will, riches, honour, fame, and authoritie; of all which things, hee as a notable dissembler seemed to make no account or reckoning: neither were there some wanting, which would sweare, that Haider his father (as he was an excellent Astronomer) calculating his natiuitie, should say, That he should prooue a great prophet, and the author of true religion; who subduing the greatest part of the East, should become as glorious both in matters of religion and martiall affaires, as was Mahomet the Great prophet himselfe. Which report being bruied abroad amongst the vulgar people, greatly encreased his authoritie, and gaue them occasion to talke of wonders. Not long after Hyfmaell was first by the admiration or rather assentation of his friends and followers, and afterwards as if it had ben by a generall consent, surnamed Sophos: which amongst those people signifieth a Wise man, or the interpreter of the gods. These prosperous beginnings, with the troubled state of the Persian kingdome, encouraged him to take in hand great matters: for his vnckle Jacup the Persian king was long before dead, being together with his sonne poysoned by his adulterous wife: which thing he presently perceiving, enforced her to drinke of the same cup; and because he would be sure that he should not escape, with his owne hand stricke off her head, and immediately after died, with his sonne. After whose death great troubles arose about the succession: and diuers great men one after another aspired to the kingdome, which they enjoyed not long. And amongst the rest Eluan-beg (whom Iouius calleth Aluantes) at that time stood in no sure possession of the kingdome, being mightily impugned by his brother Moratchamus.

Hyfmaell reuermeth into Armenia, and recouers his inheritance.

Hyfmaell taking hold of this opportunitie, armed diuers of the most able men of his followers, and receiving some small aid from his poore old friend Pyrchaes, entered into ARMENIA, and there partly by the fame that ran of him, and partly by the good will of the people, rather than by any force, recouered his fathers inheritance, wherunto the remembrance of his dead father did not a little further him. He encouraged with this good beginning, daily grew stronger and stronger, by the continuall repairing vnto him of such as hauing once received the doctrine of Haider, were glad of long for (feare of persecution) to dissemble the same: but now hauing got an head and cheefestaine to cleaue vnto, began openly to shew themselves againe, and in great number to resort vnto him, in hope of the good successe of their religion; not so happily begun by his father.

Sumachia taken by Hyfmaell.

His power thus daily encreasing beyond his expectation, he laied siege vnto SYMACHIA, a citie in the confines of MEDIA, which he tooke by force and sacked: and with the spoile thereof both enriched and armed his souldiours, which before were for most part naked men. Thera king of this citie wonderfully encreased both his fame and courage, as oftentimes it falleth out, That haughtie minds, courageously attempting high exploits, by the good euent of their first attempts make vnto the full of their stately desires. So after this, Hyfmaell his thoughts were not so low, as to thinke of the taking of this or that litle citie; but how he might now compass the great citie of TAVRIS, the very seat of the Persian kings, and afterwards the kingdome itselfe. Whereupon reposing no lesse confidence in his owne good fortune, than the valour of his souldiours, he marched with his armie directly to the citie of TAVRIS, and that with such expedition, that he was come before it before any such thing was feared, much lesse provided for. Eluan the Persian king was then at TAVRIS, and had but a litle before fought a great battaile with his brother Moratchamus for the kingdome: and hauing vanquished him, draue him out of ARMENIA and PERSIA; and afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding vp of ciuile warres, had caused diuers of the cheefe citizens of TAVRIS, which had taken part with his brother against him, to be severely executed, filling the eyes of their friends with the horrible spectacle of their dismembred bodies, and the hearts of most men with sorrow and heavinesse: whereby he had so alienated the minds of the citizens from him, that now upon the approach of Hyfmaell, they were all readie to forsake him: of which their disposition Hyfmaell was before-hand informed, and vpon the good hope thereof had halted his comming. Eluan the Persian king thus ouertaken on the suddaine, had not time to raise such forces as might suffice either to encounter his enemie, or defend the citie; wherefore despairing of his owne strength, and justly fearing the reuolt and furie of the discontented citizens, as a man dismayed, suddainely fled out of the citie. After whose departure the gates were presently set open vnto Hyfmaell. For the citizens which in those troublesome times (wherein the two brethren contended for the kingdome) had suffered great calamitie, chose rather in that present danger to receive a conqueror of so great fame as was then Hyfmaell, than to their vtter destruction to oppose themselves against him in the quarrell of their cruell king: and the rather, for that they saw a generall securitie and open way to preferment proposed vnto all such as should receiue the reformed religion of this new conquerour.

Hyfmaell entering the citie, slew certaine of the kings guard which were not yet departed, and then vtterly rased the stately tombe wherein his vnckle Jacup was after the manner of the Persian kings royally buried. And to mitigate the sorrow hee had so long conceiued of his fathers death, and with reuenge to appease his angrie ghost, he caused the tyrants bornies to be digged vp and scattered abroad, and the memorie of his name to bee quite rased out of all places of the citie.

Hyfmaell taketh the citie of Tauris, and defaceeth the tombe of his vnckle Jacup.

Although Hyfmaell was thus possessed of the regall citie of TAVRIS, and had thereby made a way for the obtaining of the whole kingdome; yet hee knew that so long as Eluan liued, his conquest was not vnto him assured: and therefore to the vttermost of his power he augmented his armie with new supplies taken vp in that populous citie, whom he furnished with armour and weapons taken out of the kings armourie. In the meane time newes was brought vnto him, that the Persian king before fled into the farthest part of his kingdome, was now comming from SCYRAS with a great armie against him; and that Moratchamus his brother, forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels, had raised a great armie about BABYLON in ASSYRIA, in short time to ioyne with his brother.

Hyfmaell neuerthelesse nothing terrified with the report of the great preparation of the two brethren against him, to the intent hee might seeme to undertake this warre by the appointment of God, and vpon a greater assurance than vpon his owne strength, resolved to go against them. And so after he had mustered his armie, and in best manner he could provided all things necessa-tie, he set forward from TAVRIS: vying no other perswasion to encourage his souldiours, but that they should as became resolute men, make hast and follow him whom God had giuen them for a cheefestaine and leader, vnto a most assured victorie. The Persian king was at the same time ten dayes journey from TAVRIS, when Hyfmaell with incredible celeritie preuenting the fame of his comming, was come to the mountaine NIPHATES, which parteth ARMENIA from ASSYRIA: which mountaine Eluan purposing shortly to passe ouer with his populous armie, had sent before his scouts to discover the straight passages, and a multitude of pioneers to make the wayes more commodious for his great armie to passe. Which thing Hyfmaell vnderstanding, and politickely considering that it should be much for his aduantage, if hee should first himselfe passe ouer those great mountaines, and so vpon the suddaine set vpon his enemies then lying in securitie, and fearing nothing lesse than such a desperat attempt: vpon that resolution advanced his ensignes vp the mountaines; and hauing with small resistance discomfited them which kept the passages, came downe the same mountaines like a tempest, and furiously assailed the king, then lying in his campe on the other side at the foot of the mountaine: vpon the approach of whom, such a hurly burly was raised in the kings campe, that what for the confused tumult of the souldiours, and fearefull outcries of the multitude of base people which followed the campe, the king could scarcely giue order vnto his captaines what he would haue done, or yet encourage his souldiours, or put them in order of battaile. So that Hyfmaell giuing a fierce onfet with his ARMENIAN souldiours, there was suddainely begun a most terrible and bloodie battaile. Neither did that day the fortune of Hyfmaell faile him, whose courage and prowesse neuer failed: For assailing the kings battaile of footmen, with three squadrons at once, he had overcome them and put

them to flight before that the horsemen could arme themselves and mount their horses, which were for most part vnbridled and vnbridled at his comming. The king, who had nothing either feared or foreseen this so suddaine a mischeefe, but had vainly perswaded himselfe, That the very fame of his comming with so huge an armie, would so terrifie his enemies, as that hee should find none either at TAVRIS, or in all ARMENIA, that durst make resistance; was glad now to run too and fro to encourage his souldiors, to stay his discomfited battailes, yea and to come to handie blowes himselfe. But when neither his capitaines nor souldiors could put in execution his suddaine directions which he was enforced to giue in that imminent danger, being at once overcome with shame and desperation, he resolutely thrust himselfe into the head of his battaile, and there valiantly fighting, was slaine. Whereupon the Persian horsemen, the greatest strength of the kings armie, hauing now no king for whom they should fight, betooke themselves to flight, after whom followed the archers and all the rest of the kings armie.

When as Hyfmaell had with lesse losse than a man would haue thought so great a victorie could haue beene achieved, possessed the enemies tents, hee made no great pursuit after them, for that he thought it more requisite to refresh his souldiors, throughly wearied and almost spent with long trauell and the late fight: wherefore for certaine dayes he reposed himselfe with his armie in those his enemies forsaken tents. Afterwards, when hee had receiued embassadours from diuers places, yielding their cities and townes, and that the fauour of the people generally enclined to him, together with the victorie; he marched with his armie to SCYRAS, where hee was of the citicens, who had before heard of the victorie, joyfully receiued, and his armie relieved with all things he could desire. Hyfmaell there entertained with the greatest honours that the fearefull citicens could possibly attribute vnto him, did oftentimes preach vnto them of the truth and excellencie of his fathers doctrine, and withall gaue out straight proclamations, That he would account all them for his enemies, which did not within the space of thirtie dayes renounce their old superstition, and receiue this new found vertue (as he would haue it.) Wherefore for as much as on the one side were proposed most certaine rewards, by the happie course of his victories; and on the other, was threatened exile and torture to such as should obstinately persist in their opinion; in short time hee drew all the vulgar people to embrace his new doctrine. And afterwards hauing payed his souldiors with the riches of that great citie, he gallantly furnished both his old and new souldiors that wanted armour, with most excellent armour and furniture: for in that citie, one of the greatest and most famous of the East, were many shops full of all kind of armour, which the armourers with wonderfull cunning vsed to make of yron and Steele and the iuice of certaine hearbes, of much more notable temper & beautie than are those which are made with vs in EVROPE; not onely headpeeces, cuirasses, and complete armors, but whole caparisons for horses, curiously made of thin plates of yron and Steele. Departing from SCYRAS, he tooke also the great cities of SAPHA, supposed to haue been the citie in ancient time called SVSA, and SVLTANIA, which for the wonderfull ruines of the huge buildings, is deemed to haue been the ancient and famous citie TIGRANOCERTA. These great matters quickly dispatched, and hauing in euery citie placed gouernours of his owne sect, hee passed ouer the riuer of TIGRIS into MESOPOTAMIA, of purpose to expulse Moratchamus the late kings brother out of BABILON, who was yet in armes, and had intended (as is before said) to haue passed into ARMENIA, to haue joyned his forces with the king his brother: but now terrified with his brothers calamitie (who together with a most puissant armie, and the strength of the Persian kingdom, was in one day fallen from the height of so great a fortune) thought it not best to trie his fortune in the field against so fortunate an enemy, but forthwith to withdraw himselfe into the remotest places of that large kingdom, and from thence to expect some better fortune. For he well knew that he was not able to withstand his victorious enemy, now leading after him a most puissant armie, who not long before had with a small power vanquished & slaine his brother in a great battell. Hyfmaell now by the greatnesse of his fame and forces, and as it were by the fauor of God himselfe, become a terror to all the princes of the East, entered into MESOPOTAMIA after the flight of Moratchamus, & receiued all that great province into his subiection, euery man as it were striving who should first by his speedy submission purchase the fauor of the victorious conqueror. To be breefe, Moratchamus already terrified, and reposing no great hope in himselfe, or his own power, neither deeming it for his safetie to shut himselfe vp within the wals of any strong citie, trusted vp his things of greatest price, and with his wiues and children fled into ARABIA. This against Moratchamus.

This Moratchamus is he whom some historiographers call Mara Beg, and is in the Turkes histories called Imirsa Beg, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the daughter of Baiazet, and recovering part of the Persian kingdom, was suddenly murdered by some of his nobilitie, whom he purposed secretly to haue put to death, if they had not prevented the same by murdering of him first. Hyfmaell hauing victoriously subdued a great part of the Persian kingdom, and filled all the East part of the world with the glorie of his name, returned out of ASSYRIA into MEDIA, and tooke in such cities and strong holds as were yet holden by the garrisons of the late Persian king. And afterwards returning into ARMENIA, made wars vpon the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell vpon the borders of the Caspian: For that those nations, in auncient times tributaries vnto the Persian kings, taking the benefit of the long ciuile warres wherewith the kingdom of PERSIA and all the Easterne countries, with the ruine of the kings house, had been of late turmoiled; had neither paid anie tribute by the space of foure yeares, nor sent anie honourable embassage as they were wont, and as was expected, especially in so great a victorie and alteration of the state.

Hyfmaell hauing thus obtained the Persian kingdom, in short time became famous through the world, and was justly accounted amongst the greatest monarchs of that age. But nothing made him more to be spoken of, than the innouation he had made in the Mahometane superstition: for by his deuise and commaundement, a new forme of prayer was brought into their Mahometane temples, farre differing from that which had been of long time before vsed. By reason wherof, Ebnbekir, Homer, and Osmán, the successours of their great prophet Mahomet, before had in great regard and reuerence, began now to be contemned, & their writings nothing regarded: and the honour of Hali exalted, as the true and onely successour of their great prophet. And because he would haue his subjects and the followers of his doctrine knowne from the Turkes and other Mahometanes, he commaunded that they should all weare some red hat-band, lace, or riband vpon their heads; which they religiously obserue in PERSIA vntill this day: whereof they are of the Turkes called Cuselbas or Redheads. And in short time hee had so vied the matter, that he was wonderfully both beloued and reuerenced of his subjects: in so much that his sayings were accounted for diuine oracles, and his commaundements for lawes. So that when they would confirme anie thing by solemne oath, they would sweare by the head of Hyfmaell the king: and when they wished well to anie man, they vsually said, Hyfmaell grant thee thy desire. Vpon his coine which he made both of siluer and gold, on the one side was written these words, La illahé illallahú, Muhamedun resúl allahé: which is to say, There are no gods but one, and Mahomet is his messenger. And on the other side, Ismaill halife lullahé; which is to say, Hyfmaell the Vicar of God.

Whilest Hyfmaell was thus wrestling for the Persian kingdom, Chasan Chelise and Techellis (whom wee haue a little before declared to haue beene brought out of the mountaines and deserts into the countrey villages, and afterwards into the cities; and to haue filled the countreys of ARMENIA and a great part of the Lesser ASIA with the noueltie of their new doctrine and opinions, first phantastied by one Ginnet Siech, and afterward reuiued by Haider Erdebil (Hyfmaell his father) hauing gathered a great armie of such as had receiued their doctrine, innuaded the Turkes dominion. For after that Techellis (this cold prophet) had with wonderfull felicitie in the presence of manie prognosticated of things to come; and Hyfmaell the Sophi (of late a poore exiled and banished man) was thought to haue growne vnto the highest type of worldly honours, not by mans helpe, but by vprightnesse of life, and the fortunate passage of an vndoubted religion: such a desire of receiuing that new superstition possessed the mindes of the people in generall, that the cities and townes thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profession had taken vpon them the wearing of the red hat, the knowne badge of the Cuselbas. First they met together at the citie of TASCIA at the foot of the mountain ATTALIA, to the number of ten thousand vpon a great Faire day; where they laied hands vpon the chiefe magistrate of the citie and executed him, setting his quarters vpon foure of the highest towers of the citie: and farther perswaded by these new masters of this new superstition, to take vp armes in defence of themselves and of their sincere religion (as they termed it) in case that anie violence should be offered them by the irreligious Turkes; they all swore neuer to forsake their capitaines for anie distress, or yet refuse anie labour or aduenture for the honour of their most holy religion (as they would would haue it) in defence whereof, they had already vowed their soules and bodies. These ring-leaders of rebellion, seeing the minds of their franticke followers so well prepared for their purpose, and reposing a great confidence in their valour and resolution; and withall considering that the money which was bountifully brought in vnto them by the countrey people, partly for deuotion, partly for feare, was not sufficient to maintaine so great a multitude; gaue leaue by publicke proclamation to their viruly followers, to forage the countrey round about them, and to liue vpon the spoile of them which would not receiue that new sound doctrine. Whereupon they deuiding themselves into diuers companies, and raunging vp & down the countrey, brought into the campe great abundance of cattell and other such things as the countrey yeelded: and forthwith (their multitude still encreasing) they entered into LYCAONIA, a populous and fruitful countrey, where they refreshed themselves manie daies, roaming vp and downe to the great grievance and terrour of the people: and brought such a feare vpon the whole countrey, that they which dwelt in open dorpes and villages, were glad to flic with their wiues, children, and goods into the strong citie of ICONIUM: for proclamations were in manie places set vp in the names of Chasan Chelise and Techellis, wherein manie both spirituall and temporall blessings were in most ample manner proposed to all such as should forthwith take part with them, and follow that their new doctrine already established in PERSIA: But vnto such as should obstinately perseuere in their old superstition, after they had once drawne their sword, was threatened utter destruction without hope of pardon or life. So that all the inhabitants thereabouts, terrified with the terrour of this proclamation, some for feare of death, some vpon vnconstancie; some for safegard of their goods and possessions (dearer vnto them then any religion) some other indebted, infamous, in danger of law: beside manie fugitiue seruants daily resorted to these new masters. Not long after, whilst the Turks were making preparation for the suppressing of this dangerous rebellion, certaine troupes of horsemen sent from Hyfmaell came in good time to these new prophets: for Hyfmaell in fauour and furtherance of that new superstition, had a little before by fit messengers, exhorted them to proceed courageously in their so religious an enterprise, and to joyne martiall force vnto the religion they professed: promising further, not to bee wanting vnto them at their need, but to send them skilfull leaders, and from time to time to furnish them with coine for the maintenance of that warre. All this Hyfmaell did openly in despite of Baiazet, of small beginnings to sow the seed of greater warre. For he bearing an old grudge against Baiazet, for the former warres betwixt the Turkes and the Persians, as also for their disagreement in matters concerning their superstition; and prickt forward with the heat of youth, desired nothing more in the greatnesse of his power, and prosperous successe of his affaires, than to haue occasion to make wars with the Turkish king: For which purpose he sent his embassadours vnto the state of VENICE to joyne with them in league and amitie, in such forme and sort, as they had long time before by Catarinus Zenus, Barbarus and Contarenius their embassadours, concluded with Vsun-Cassanes the great Persian king his grandfather. The chiefe things that he requested of the Venetians was, That they would send him out of ITALIE by the way of SYRIA, men skilfull in the casting of great ordinance, and with their fleet to trouble Baiazet by sea: promising in the meane time himselfe to fill ASIA the lesse with his army by land, and so to giue a faire occasion vnto them, to recouer by sea all such places, as they had before in the late warres lost vnto the Turkes vpon the coast of PELOPONNESVS and GRÆCIA.

The Venetians hauing with all courtesie entertained the embassadours, gaue them answers, That they would neuer be forgetfull of the ancient league and amitie they had made with the Persian king; the remembrance whereof, was vnto their state a thing most pleasant: and that they were wonderfull glad, that the new king was an enemy vnto the Turke, and had them in such hatred, as to participate vnto them the causes of that warre: and farther to promise vnto them those things, which if his grandfather Vsun-Cassanes or his vnckle Iacup would haue performed, he should not now haue had need to make warres with the Turkish emperor. But such was the alteration of things and times, that as the Persian kings then liuing at home in peace, thought it not good to stir whilst Baiazet was busie in EVROPE; so now their state standing in far worse condition and fortune, could not performe that which they heartily wished, and most of all desired: for that they thought it not good to breake the league which they had not long before made with Baiazet the Turkish emperor: especially then, when sundrie warlike nations of EVROPE conspiring together, and diuers mightie kings prouoked with no iniurie, but onely enuy-

ing at their happie estate, made warres vpon them; yet were neuertheless in good hope, that God would stand in their iust defence, and still perseuere their state, which no enemies power had for the space of 700 yeares and more, euer beene able to ouercome. Wherefore they should shew vnto their king, that they would as occasion should serue, and as it should stand with the good of their state, doe their vttermost deuoiure, to make him vnderstand, that nothing was deerer vnto them than the friendship of so great a king: nor anie thing more honourable than by mutuall counsell and combined forces, to assaile the Turke their common enemy.

Shortly after, the embassadours (hauing obtained nothing more than the hope of a league to bee in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their galleies to CYPRVS, and so from thence to SYRIA, where they had secret conference with Petrus Zenus (the sonne of Catarinus Zenus, a man famous for his embassage vnto Vsun-Cassanes into PERSIA) gouernour of the Venetian merchants at DAMASCO. Which thing Baiazet hauing intelligence of, and of the passage of the Persian embassadours that way, complained grieuouly both by his embassadours and letters vnto Campson Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt, that he dealt not as a friend and confederat with him, in suffering those embassadours so to passe through the midst of SYRIA vnto the Christians their common enemies, to stir them vp to warre. Whereupon, all the Venetian merchants which were at TRIPOLES, ALEPPO, DAMASCO, BERYTVS, and ALEXANDRIA, and especially Zenus himselfe, were forthwith apprehended by the commandement of the great Sultan, and carried in bonds to CAIR: where they were manie times enforced in chaires to answer vnto such things as were laid to their charge, and after they had by the space of a yeare endured the manifold despights of the proud Mamalukes, hardly obtained to escape with life and libertie.

The two seditious prophets Chasan and Techellis well strengthened with the aid of the Persians, were now come vnto ICONIUM the most famous citie of LYCAONIA; and wasting all the countrey before them, drew a great multitude of people to receiue their new doctrine. For the repressing of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahometes, two of Baiazet his nephews (who in stead of their fathers Alem Schach and Tzihan Schach, the sonnes of Baiazet before dead, gouerned those countreies) gathered together their forces, and disdaining to suffer such disgrace by such a rabble of rascall people, in the sight of so famous a citie, came into the field to giue them battell. But they in their youthfull heat making too much hast, and joyning battell in a place of disadvantage, were by the rebels ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neither would these ringleaders in that victorie haue forborne to haue assailed ICONIUM, but that they wanted artillerie and engines of war requisite for the besieging of cities.

Corentus also one of the sonnes of Baiazet, hauing at the same time leui'd a conuenient army about THYATIRA, SYPIVS, MAGNESIA, and PHOCIA, durst not farther stir or set forward against the rebels, although they lay disperfed about the countrey fast by him. These new prophets with ensignes displayed, marching from countrey to countrey through the heart of the lesse ASIA, entered at length into BYTHINIA, where neere vnto the riuer Sangarius they met with Carageses Bassa the Viceroy of ASIA, coming against them with a great army well appointed, which he had a little before raised vpon the bruit of the comming of these rebels; and had also commaunded Acomathes (whom the Turkes call Achmetes) the eldest sonne of Baiazet then liuing, gouernour of the great countreies of CAPADOCIA and PONTVS, to raise his power, and to follow at the backe of the rebels: who if they should hap to be put to the worse, would neither be able to retire, neither to keepe the field, being so shut vp betwixt two great armies. But Techellis by his speedie comming, frustrated these designs of the Viceroy: for marmies ching with all possible speed, he was vpon Carageses before he was well aware of his comming, and nere vnto the mountaine HORMYVS; as he was then taking vp of mo souldiours, and daily expected the comming of others, as if he had beene going, against some puissant enemy. The Viceroy seeing the rebels approach, although he had before not purposed to haue encountered them before he had raised farre greater forces: thought it not now to stand with his honour to refuse to giue them battell, although his army for most part consisted of the rude countrey peafants, taken vp vpon the sudden out of PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTVS, and BYTHINIA, raw souldiours, and for most part vnarmed: as commonly they are which in those countreies are pressed against their wils out of the townes and villages, and are of the Turkes called Alapi, who of the Ianizaries are scarcely accounted for men. But his greatest confidence he reposed in the approued valour of his auntient horsemen, by whose meanes he doubted not, in safetie to retire out of the battell, and to saue himselfe if anie thing should fall out otherwise than well; making no great account of the common souldiours more than by them if he could to weaken the force of the rebels: who on the other side (their greatest force consisting of footmen) had no hope to saue themselves by flight, but onely by plaine valour and dint of sword. Which Techellis well considering, exhorted his souldiours to remember into what country they were come, and that there was no cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to flie vnto, if they should not that day play the men: Wherefore let vs courageously (said he) set forward against our enemies, and by victorie defend our liues, together with the truth of our religion, for which we haue vowed both our soules and bodies. He had scarce said thus much, but that his whole army (in token of cheerfulness) gaue a most terrible shout, & without farther stay, set vpon their enemies. The Viceroy had placed his footmen in the maine battell in the middle, and his horsemen in the wings, thereby to haue compassed in his enemies: but Techellis had set all his footmen in one great square battell, and his Persian horsemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his freshwater souldiours, could scarcely abide the sight of Techellis his army: for in the front of the battell stood souldiours throughly armed, and all the rest of his army with red haire vpon their heads, as if they had been embred with blood, which wonderfully terrified the Persians cowardly and vnskillfull souldiours: so that hauing endured the fight scarcely halfe an houre, they all turned their backs and fled. The Turkish horsemen which had valiantly assailed the rebels army on both sides, although they had slaine manie with their arrowes and launces, and somewhat disordered the battell, for that the footmen were enforced to leaue their places, and to presse still on forwards against them; yet when Techellis his souldiours (hauing overcome the footmen, and diuiding themselves into diuers squadrons) began with their long pikes to kill their horses, and to lay hardly vnto them, they likewise betooke themselves to flight also. Then the Persian horsemen (which all this while had stood still as lookers on) left their standings, and following the chase slew manie of the Turkes in their disordered flight: and following fast on, enclosed the Viceroy as he was staying of his horsemen, and could not for the thicknesse of the dust well discerne his enemies; so that he had bene there taken, if he had not bene speedily rescued by his guard, and so deliuered from that danger: The rest of the Turkes horsemen saved themselves by flight. In this battell scauen thousand of the Turkes footmen were slaine, and all their ensignes taken, with great store of prouision.

Techellis besieging Carago-ses the Viceroy in the citie of Cusata.

After which victorie, Chafan and Techellis resting their armie one day, marched to the citie of CYTAIE, neere vnto the mountaine HORMINVS: This citie is situated as it were in the midst of ASIA the lesse, and is the seat of the Turkish emperours Viceroy in ASIA: as SOPHIA in MACEDONIA is for his other Viceroy in EVROPE: For it was reported, that the country people had for feare of the present warre, conuaid thither the greatest part of their wealth; and the rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himselfe with his chiefe horsemen were fled thither also: Neither doubted they, but that all the armie might be greatly enriched by the wealth of that citie, if they should without delay employ their whole forces for the gaining thereof; their enemies now altogether discouraged with their late ouerthrow. Techellis also deeming that enterprise of so much worth as whereon to gage his whole forces, comming before the citie, placed such field pieces as he had before taken in the battell, and his archers in such fit places as might most annoy the defendants; afterwards hee caused scaling ladders to be set vp, and proclamation made through all his campe, That the whole spoile of the citie should be the souldiours, if they could take it; with promise of greater rewards to them that should first recouer the top of the wall. Filled with this hope, the rebellious multitude approached the wall, fearing neither enemies force, multitude of shot, or danger of death; struiuing who should first mount the ladders, and some clambering one in the necke of another, so to get vp by the ruines of the wall. The defendants in the meane time from aboue casting downe vpon them great stones, timber, fire, scalding water, lime, sand, and such like without measure: Wherewith although many were ouerthrown and cruell to death or spoiled, yet others presently stepped vp in their place; neither was anie of them so feene for feare of so present danger, to shrinke backe or be discouraged. For the Viceroy on the one side, and Techellis on the other, were both eyewitneses of euery mans valour in that hot seruice: the one prickt forward with doubtfull hope, for feare to be enforced to giue over the assault to be begun; and the other, with the due regard of his honour, life, and state, all subject to that danger; and therefore in person himselfe performed all the parts of a woorthie cheefetaine and courageous souldior. But at length the defendants wearied with the fierce assault of the enemies, and for most part wounded, Techellis continually sending in fresh men, and withdrawing such as were hurt, by plaine force brake into the citie in two places ouer the heapes of the dead bodies: and hauing repulsed the defendants, burst open one of the gates, and thereby brought in his whole armie. Then began a miserable slaughter of the souldiours and poore citizens in euery house and corner of the citie: At which instant, the pallace whether the viceroy had retired himselfe with his familie, was also taken: The viceroy himselfe, with his wiues and children were there also taken prisoners, and the stately pallace built of marble, in a trice consumed with fire.

The rich citie of CYTAIE, the seat of the great commander of the Turkish empire in ASIA; thus taken by Techellis, and his whole armie both beautified and enriched with the spoile thereof: he perswaded himselfe, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the citie of PARSA also, the antient seat of the Turkish kings in BYTHINIA, and so to endanger the whole state of the Turkes empire in ASIA, if he should now without delay carrie the terror of himselfe thither, before the Turkes could in that country make head against him, or the citizens be able in so sudden a feare to make any sufficient prouision for the defence of themselves and their cities; and so in the course of his good fortune to vse the courage and cheerefulness of his souldiours: Wherefore appointing a day when he would set forward, he commaunded all things necessarie to be made readie for the taking of that rich citie, being neither strongly walled neither furnished with any good garrison for the defence thereof.

But whilest hee was making this preparation, a new armie, lately shipt ouer the Hellesponte from CALLIPOLIS into ASIA, enforced him to change his former determination. For Baiazet the sonne of Alis Bassa against Techellis, out of EVROPE, awaked at the name of Techellis, and the fame of the new superstition now generally received in PERSIA, had long before giuen commaundement to his sonnes, nephewes, and the viceroy of ASIA, That they should with all carefullnesse prouide, that that part of his kingdom tooke no harme thereby. But after he saw Techellis of a poore hermit become a great capitaine, and backt also with the Persian king, and all his dominions in ASIA now in danger of some great alteration, he sent Alis Bassa ouer with his European armie. This Alis an eunuch, borne in MACEDONIA (yet for his courage comparable with the greatest capitaines) had for his many and worthy desert, in the time of the great emperour Mahomet, Baiazet his father, got vnto himselfe both the honour and name of a most famous cheefetaine. He hauing made choice of the principall horsemen of EPHROS, MACEDONIA, SERVIA, ILLYRIA, and THRACIA, and joyning vnto them seuen thousand Ianzaries (the most assured hope of the Turkes in all their expeditions) passed ouer from CALLIPOLIS into PHRYGIA, and vpon the way directed his letters vnto Achomates and Corcutus, Baiazet his sonnes, and to all the other Sanzackes and Gouernours of the Turkes provinces in ASIA, That they should with as much speed as they could raise their forces, and meet him in GALATIA. But Techellis aduertised of his comming, thought it best for him to depart out of PONTVS, and to retire to some place of more safetie, least by longer staying he should be enclosed by his enemies, repairing thither wards on euery side; or els vpon some great disadvantage be enforced to joyne battaile: for he saw, that if he stayed neuer so little, he should find no safe passage or place of refuge to retire vnto, hauing left such large and spacious countries, so many enemies cities, so many great riuers, so many discontented people behind him; all which the first fauour of the vulgar sort, and speedie course of his victorie, had a little before laid open vnto him. Wherefore calling together his capitaines and most pertinen of warre to consult vpon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meeke madnesse, or els of extreame necessitie, with so small a power of vnskillfull souldiours, without any sufficient strength of horsemen, to joyne battaile with such an enemy as better knew the country than he, and farre exceeded him both for the number and expertnesse of his souldiours. Wherefore Techellis trussing vp the rich prey he had before gotten, began now with speed to retire backe againe with his followers through GALATIA. But the Bassa hauing intelligence almost euery houre by letters and espials both of the retiring of Techellis, and the way hee held, passed ouer the riuer Sangarius; and coasting the countrie, came and encamped betwixt the cities of CYTAIE and ANCYRA, which way it was supposed the enemy would passe. Where when hee had there a while rested his wearied souldiours, and was certainly aduertised, that the rebels had taken another way; he set forward againe; and after five dayes march in the plaines of GALATIA, ouertooke the straglers of the enemies, who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the armie: all whom the Bassa commaunded to be cruely put to the sword. And Techellis to terrifie the great Bassa, or at leastwise with a most horrible spectacle: to stay his pursure, caused Caragofes the viceroy, whom hee had carried along with him in chaines, to be cruely empaled by the high way side vpon a great sharpe stake set fast in the ground; and so left him stinking for the Turkes to wonder at. But Alis Bassa nothing dismayed with the horrible death of so great a personage, held on his way with more hast than good speed, exhorting his souldiours patiently to endure the painfullnesse of the long march, and to straine themselves to take reuenge of those rebellious theues and robbers, who destroying the countrey before them, spared not so much as the Turkes children and the temples of their religion: and so the day following came into the plaines of ANCYRA. The same day also Achomates came vnto the Bassa with ten thousand souldiours. Alis Bassa perceiuing that he could not possibly with his whole armie ouertake his enemies marching with greater speed before him, and greeued at the heart to see them escape out of his hands, resolved to proue if hee could with his horsemen ouertake them: where vpon leauing his footmen with Achomates, hee himselfe with eight thousand horse following the enemy vpon the spurre, ouertooke the rereward of their armie at the mountaine OLYGA, little from the cite of ANCYRA, vnto whom he gaue an hot skirmish.

Techellis which a little before had taken a fit place for his campe, vpon the rising of the hill, although he saw his men faint with long trauell and the scorching heat of the Sunne, yet quickly perceiuing that he should haue to doe onely with horsemen, and that in a place of aduantage; turning his armie, and orderly placing his souldiours, as the ground and the shortnesse of the time would giue leaue, valiantly receiued the impresion of the Turkes, and with their long pikes and arrowes at the first repulsed them: so that it seemed, they would neither haue giuen ground vnto the bragging horsemen, neither haue done any thing not becomming their former victories, had not Alis Bassa sent in a thousand Carbines, who in troups orderly following one another, deliuered their shot as thicke as haile vpon the enemy: with which storme many of them being slaine, and moe wounded, their ranks began to be somewhat disordered: whereupon the other horsemen breaking in, with great slaughter ouerthrew the vauntguard of Techellis battaile: in which conflict Chafan Chelife himselfe was slaine. Techellis alwayes at hand where most need was, euen in the midst of the slaughter of his men, set in order a new battaile of his most ready and best armed souldiours, the onely remedie in so great a distresse; and bringing them on into the front of the battaile, opposed them against the horsemen, now (as they thought) in possession of the victorie: commaunding them by little and little to retire vnto the mountaine, to the intent that they might seeme to doe that by commandement of the generall, which they were like ynough to haue done of themselves for feare; hoping that it would so come to passe, That the Turkes finding the disaduantage of the place, would leaue so hardly to assaile them. But the Bassa encouraged with the first successe of the battaile, exhorted his souldiours to vrge the victorie, now almost as good as gotten, and not to giue the enemy space to recouer the strength of the mountaine, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little short paines that day to end all that warre, to the honour of Baiazet their soueraigne, and worthie commendation of themselves in generall. In this sort encouraging them, he with a troupe of his best horsemen (to animate the rest, and to shew his owne valour) brake through the enemies battaile: which thing he in the same heat, with more courage than discretion, attempting to performe the second time, was enclosed by his enemies and slaine: vpon whose fall the fortune of the battaile was in a moment changed. For the Turkes, which erst fought courageously, hauing beaten backe and almost ouerthrowne their enemies, now dismayed with the death of their Generall, began to fight but faintly, and by litle and litle to giue ground, and at last turning about their horses, fled. On the other side, Techellis his souldiours, who but a little before had reposed greater hope in the strength of the place and the mountaine, than in their weapons and valour, now encouraged with new hope, and taking heart in the faint charge of their enemies, began to thrust forward, and with a most terrible noise crying victorie, put to flight the Turkes horsemen, before wearied with long trauell, when as they had by the rashnesse of their Generall lost a notable victorie almost already gained. Techellis although he knew that the enemy could neither refresh his horses, nor yet with any assurance keepe the field, if he should haue pursued him; yet hauing lost many of his best souldiours, and the rest of his armie sore weakened with trauell, fasting and fighting, determined to refresh his wearied followers vpon the mountaine OLYGA. From whence after a few dayes he marched ouer the riuier Halys vnto the cite of TASCIA, his old dwelling place; and so to the cite of CAIENIS, which the riuier Marfya (much spoken of by the Poets) runneth thorow, and is now called by the name of MARAS, but as then the regall seat of the mountaine king Adadenles. The Turkes horsemen hauing thus in some small sort rather reuenged the injuries done by the rebels, than obtained any victorie, returned to Achomates, who was then coming on with the footmen. Not long after Baiazet vnderstanding of the death of Alis Bassa his Generall, sent Iomfesi Iomfesi Bassa Bassa, a warlike capitaine, and of great experience (borne in EPYRVS) in his stead. Who as soon as he had receiued the charge of the armie from Achomates, marching forthwith into CAPPADOCIA, and keeping the way on the right hand towards the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, came in few dayes vnto the cite of TASCIA, the place of Techellis his abode: where burning and destroying the countrey all about, he came and encamped with his armie at the foot of the mountaine. The Bassa had in his armie about fortie thousand horse and foot, well appointed with many field peeces, and plentie of victuals which he brought with him, for feare of want in that bare country. Techellis terrified with his coming, hauing of late receiued no aid from Hyfmaell the Persian king, and wanting also great artillerie; and besides that, seeing his souldiours greatly both deminished and discouraged with the late battaile at OLYGA; determined not vpon so great disaduantage to meet his enemy in the plaine field, but to keepe the rough mountaine and thicke woods, hoping that if he could be able any time to keepe those strong places, hee should either receiue some aid from Hyfmaell, or by the heat of the Turkes leaders take them at some notable aduantage. In the meane time many notable skirmishes passed betwixt the souldiours on both sides: for the Turkes fetching a compasse oftentimes about the mountaines, and seeking for the best passages, by the easie rising of the hills, came to skirmish with their enemies: and Techellis his souldiours on the other side, fallying many times out of the woods and abrupt places of the mountaines, valiantly assailed the Turkes. After they had a long time in this sort, as if it had bene in disport, rather proued their forces one vpon another than done any great matter, the Turkes plying into euery corner, at length perceiued two wayes whereby their whole armie with ensignes displayed might without any great difficultie bee brought vnto the top of the mountaine, and so into their enemies strength. The Bassa hauing well viewed and considered the places, caused the Ianizaries at one instant to march vp to the mountaine by one of the aforesaid wayes, and the rest of his armie by the other: who with soft pace climbing vp the steepe mountaines, with their targuets defended themselves as well as they could against their enemies darts and shot. For Techellis his souldiours hauing before taken the high mountaines and places of aduantage, cast downe vpon the Turkes great stones and shot without number, as if it had bene out of some strong forts. But the Turkes bending certaine small field peeces against the places which most annoied them, easily draue them from their standings; the harquebusiers still following their ensignes, shrouded close vnder the targuets, and deliueing their deadly shot as showers of raine vpon their enemies. Whose desperat approach Techellis perceiuing, caused a retreat to be founded, and with all his armie retired farther off into the high-er mountaines and rougher woods. The night following, perceiuing that by the euill successe of the former skirmish hee had lost a great part of his credit and strength, hee with great silence forsooke the woods, and passing quite ouer the mountaines fled into ARMENIA, then part of the Persian kingdome. Neither did the Turkes perceiue their departure vntill it was light day, and that their scouts entering the thicke woods, and finding the enemies baggage with some wounded souldiours not able to flie, brought newes vnto the Bassa of the enemies departure and of his speedie flight into ARMENIA. Which thing when hee by them which were taken, vnderstood to be certainly true, fretting and chafing like a mad man, that hee had not presently vpon the enemies retreat beset the wood round, hee sent his horsemen forthwith to pursue them: but all in vaine, for Techellis was by direct and knowne wayes gone into ARMENIA. Some few straglers not able to make so much hast as the rest, were ouertaken by the Turkes horsemen, and brought backe to the Bassa.

Techellis thus put to flight, Iomfesi caused strait inquisition to be made through all the cities of the lesser ASIA, for all such as had professed the Persian religion: and them whom he found to haue borne armes in the late rebellion, hee caused to be put to death with most exquisite torments, ments, & the rest to be burnt in their foreheads with an hot yron, thereby for euer to be knowne; whom, together with the kinsfolkes and friends of them that were executed, or fled with Techellus, he caused to be transported into EVROPE, and to be dispersed through MACEDONIA, EPYRS, and PHLOPONESVS: for feare least if Techellus now fled into the Persian kingdome, should from thence returne with new forces, they should also againe repaire vnto him, and raise a new rebellion. This was the beginning, course, and ending of one of the most dangerous rebellions that euer troubled the Turkish empire: wherein all, or at leastwise the greatest part of their dominions in ASIA might have been easily surprised by the Persian king, if he would thoroughly haue prosecuted the occasion and opportunitie then offered.

The remainder of Techellus his followers, flying into PERSIA, by the way lighting vpon a Carauan of merchants laden with silkes and other rich merchandise, tooke the spoile thereof: for which outrage comming to TAVRIS the captaines were all by the commandement of Hysmaell executed, and Techellus himselfe to the terror of others burnt aliue.

The next yeare (which was the yeare 1509, the fourteenth day of September) chanced a great and terrible earthquake in the cite of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the countiees thereabouts: by the violence whereof, a great part of the wals of that imperiall cite, with manie stately buildings both publike and priuat, were quite ouerthrowne, and thirteene thousand people ouerwhelmed and slaine. The terror whereof was so great, that the people generally forsooke their houses, and lay abroad in the fields: yea Baiazet himselfe, then verie aged and sore troubled with the gout, for feare thereof remoued from CONSTANTINOPLE to HADRIANOPE; but finding himselfe in no more safetie than before, he left the cite and lay abroad in the fields in his tent. This earthquake endured by the space of eightene daies, or (as the Turkes histories report) of a moneth, with verie little intermission; which was then accounted ominous, as portending the miserable calamities which shortly after happened in the Othoman family. After this earthquake ensued a great plague, wherewith the cite was grievously visited, and for the most part vnpeopled. But after that the earthquake was ceased, and the mortalitie assuaged; Baiazet caused the imperiall cite to be with all speed repaired, and to that purpose gaue out commissions into all parts of his dominion for the taking vp of workmen: so that there were at once in worke eightie thousand workmen, who in most beautifull manner, in the space of foure moneths againe repaired the ruines of that great cite.

Baiazet had by his manie wiues, eight sonnes and six daughters, which liued to be men and women growne, and the sonnes all gouernours in diuers prouinces of his large empire: whom the Turkish histories reckon vp in this order, Abdullah Zelebi, Alem Schach, Tahan Schach, Achmet, Machmut, Corcut, Selim, and Muhamet. Yet Antonius Vtrius a Genoway, who long time liued in Baiazet his court, and (as he of himselfe writeth) waited in his chamber at the time of his death, reckoning vp the sons of Baiazet, maketh mention but of these six, Sciemschia, Alemscia, Achomates, Mahometes, Selymus, and Corcutus: naming the forenamed by names something differing from the other. Sciemschia the eldest, gouernor of CARAMANIA, for his towardlinesse most dearly beloued of his father, died of a naturall death before him, and was of him and his subjects greatly lamented. Alemscia died in like manner, of whose death as soone as he was aduertised, by mourning letters written in blacke paper with white characters (as their manner of writing is, in certifying of heauie newes) he cast from him his scepter with all other tokens of honour, and caused generall mourning to be made for him in the court, and through all the cite of CONSTANTINOPLE, by the space of three daies; during which time all shops were shut vp, all trading forbidden, and no signe of mirth to be seene: and for a certaine space, after the manner of their superstition, caused solemne sacrifices to be made for the health of his soule, and 7000 Aspers to be giuen weekly vnto the poore. His dead bodie was afterward with all princely pompe conuained to PERVA, and there with great solemnitie buried. Tahan gouernor of CARIA, and Mahomet gouernor of CAPHA, vpon their fathers heauie displeasure, were by his commandement both strangled.

Of his other foure sonnes, Achmet, otherwise called Achomates; Machmut or Mahomet, Corcut or Corcutus, and Selymus; the second (namely Mahometes) was of greatest hope and expectation, not giuen to sensuality or voluptuous pleasure as Achomates his eldest brother, neither altogether bookish as was Corcutus, nor yet of so fierce and cruell a disposition as Selymus: but of such a liuely spirit, sharpe wit, bountifull disposition, and princely carriage of himselfe, that in the judgement of most men, he seemed alreadie worthie of a kingdome. Which immoderat fauour of the people, caused his elder brother Achomates, yea and Baiazet also himselfe to haue him in no small jealousy, as if he had affected the empire; and was in short time the cause of his vntimely death. Which thing he nothing doubting, hastened (as fatal things are) by such means as hee least feared might haue procured anie such mortall distrust or danger.

Most of Baiazet his children were by diuers women, yet Achomates and this Mahometes were by one and the same mother: for which cause, Mahometes tooke greater pleasure in him than in any his other brethren, although it were not answered with like loue againe. Achomates was lord and gouernour of AMASIA, and this Mahometes of MAGNESIA; who desirous to see the manner of his brothers life and gouernment, disguised himselfe with two of his familiars and faithfull friends, as if they had been religious men, of that order which the Turkes call Imailer. [These men are for most part comely personages, borne of good houses, who in cleanly attire made after an homely fashion, doe at their pleasure wander vp and downe from towne to towne, and countrey to countrey, noting the disposition and manners of the people; whereof as fitteth best their purpose, they make large discourses afterwards to others: they commonly carrie about with them siluer cymbals, whercon they play most cunningly, and thereunto sing pleasant and wanton ditties: for which idle delight, they receiue money of the people, as an almes giuen them of deuotion. These are the common corrupters of youth, and defilers of other mens beds; men altogether giuen to ease and pleasure, and are of the Turkes called, The religious-bremen although giuen to ease and pleasure, and are of the Turkes called, The religious-bremen threaten of Loue: but might of right better be tearmed, Epicurus his hogs, than professors of anie religion at all.] Mahometes and his two consorts, as men of this profession, trauelled vp and downe the countiees of PONTVS and CAPADOCIA, where Achomates commaunded, and so to the cite of AMASIA, receiuing for their merrie glee by the way as they went, the almes and deuotion of the foolish countrey people. And being at the length come to AMASIA vpon a solemne holiday, they awaited the comming of Achomates to the church: who passing by, staied a while listening attentiuely vnto their pleasant and alluring harmonie; which was for that purpose most curiously and skilfully before deuised, and by them both with their instruments and voices, performed. When they had ended their musicke, and according to the manner of their idle profession expected his deuotion: Achomates being a man of a spare hand, commaunds fife Aspers to be giuen them in reward [which is about six pence of our money.] Mahometes disguised as if he had before determined; but taking horse, returned with speed to MAGNESIA: from whence hee writ taunting letters vnto his brother Achomates, scoffing at his good husbandrie (no praise to a prince) and in contempt sent him backe againe his fife Aspers: which thing Achomates tooke in so cuill part, as that he was neuer afterwards friends with him. The report of this fact was in short time dispersed throughout all parts of the Turkish empire, diuers men diuersly deeming of his purpose therein.

Not long after Mahometes had in this sort plaid with his brother Achomates, he attired himselfe with certaine of his trustie followers as if they had beene seafaring men, and with a small bark came to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there landing as aduenturers from sea, tooke diligent view both of the imperiall cite and of the cite of PRA standing opposite against it, curiously noting how all things were by his fathers appointment ordered and gouerned. It happened whilest he was thus staying at CONSTANTINOPLE, that Baiazet had appointed a solemne assembly of all his chiefe Bassaes at the court; which Mahometes was desirous to haue the sight of, as also of the fashion of his fathers court: but as he with his companions pressed to haue entred in at the court gate, they were by their base apparell taken of the porters to haue beene rude mariners, and so bygate, they were kept out. Wherefore consulting what to doe in that case, he went and presently bought a most beautifull Christian captiue boy, and the next day comming againe to the court with two of his companions (as if they had been aduenturers at sea) requested to be let in, for that they had brought a present for the emperour. So finding means to be admitted vnto the presence of Baiazet, one of his consorts (as if he had been a sea captaine) boldly stept forth, and with due reuerence offered the present vnto the emperour; which he thankfully tooke, and in token thereof gaue him his hand to kisse, and commaunded a rich garment wrought with gold to be giuen vnto him, with two other of lesse valour vnto Mahometes and his fellow, supposed to be the said captaines followers: who all this while stood a farr off, as if it had beene for reuerence of the empeemperor, but in deed for feare to be discovered. As these counterfeit guests were returning from the court in their garments of fauour, they happened to meet with three courtiers which knew Mahometes; who dismounting from their horses, had done him honour and due reuerence, as to the sonne of the great emperor, had he not by secret signes forbidden them, as one unwilling to be knowne. When he had thus scene his father, the court, and the imperiall citie, he went againe aboard, and so with speed returned to MAGNESIA.

The report of this his doing, had in short time filled both the citie and the court, and was at last brought to Baiazet his cares: which raised in his suspicious head manie a troublefome thought, greatly fearing, that in these lye practises lay hidden some secret and desperat conspiracie, dangerous to himselfe and his other children. Wherefore after long discourse had with the three great Bassaes then of his secret counsell, concerning the matter; to rid himselfe of all feare, he resolved in anie case to take him away. And therefore caused them in his name to write vnto Asmehemadi, a gallant courtier, and alwaies neere vnto Mahometes, to poison him with a secret poison, for that purpose inclosed in those letters sent vnto him: with promise of great rewards and preferments for that his seruice, to be afterwards received from the emperor: Charging him withall, that if he could not effect the matter, he should so conceale it, as that Mahometes should haue no distrust thereof; the least suspicion whereof, would tend to his vtter destruction. This Asmehemadi for some vnkindnesse bare a secret grudge against Mahometes; which Baiazet knowing of, made choise of him the rather: And he on the other side, partly to performe the old tyrants commaund, and partly to reuenge his owne priuat; vigilantly awaited all opportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuneth, that Mahometes hauing disported himselfe in his gardens of pleasure, and being thirstie after his exercise, called for drinke: Asmehemadi alwaies at hand, in a gilt boule fetcht him such drinke as he desired, whereinto he had secretly couaied the deadly poison sent from Baiazet. Mahometes hauing drunke thereof, in short time began to feele himselfe euill at ease, and presently sent for his phisitions: who thinking that he had but something distempered himselfe with drinking too much cold drinke in his heat, perceiued not that hee was poisoned, vntill that within six daies after he died. Of whose death Baiazet aduertised, could not abstaine from mourning, although he himselfe had bene the onely author thereof: and the more to manifest his heauinesse, commaunded all the court to mourne with him, and prayers to be made in their temples after their superstitious manner, and almes to be giuen to the poore for the health of his soule. His dead bodie was afterwards carried to PRUSA, and there honourably buried with his auncestors. Asmehemadi the traitour in reward of his vnfaithfulnesse towards his master, was by the commaundement of Baiazet cast into prison, and neuer afterwards scene, being there (as it was thought) secretly made away.

Mahometes poisoned by Asmehemadi.

Asmehemadi iustly rewarded for his treachery.

Now had Baiazet but three sonnes left, Achomates, Selymus, and Corcutus. Achomates gouernour of AMASIA, was a man both politike and valiant; but much giuen to pleasure and delight: him Baiazet and most part of the great men of the court fauoured above the rest of his brethren; except such as were before corrupted by Selymus. Corcutus for his mild and quiet nature was of most men beloued, but not thought so fit for the gouernment of so great an empire especially by the Ianizaries and souldiours of the court, for that he was (as they thought) altogether drowned in the studie of philosophie, a thing nothing agreeing with their humour. Yet might Baiazet seeme to doe him wrong, if he should not according to his promise againe restore him vnto the possession of the empire, which he had almost thirtie yeares before received at his hands; as is before in the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more haughty disposition than to brooke the life of a subject vnder the commaund of either of his brethren, and altogether giuen to marriall affaires; fought by infinit bountie, fained courtesie, subtile pollicie, and by all other meanes good and bad, to aspire vnto the empire. Him therefore the Ianizaries with all the great souldiours of the court, yea and some of the chiefe Bassaes also (corrupted with gifts) wished above the rest, for their lord and soueraigne: desiring rather to liue vnder him which was like to set all the world on a hurle burle, whereby they might increase their honour and wealth, the certaine rewards of their aduentures, than to lead an idle and vnprofitable life (as they termed it) vnder a quiet and peaceable prince.

Whilist men stood thus diuersly affected towards these princes of so great hope, Baiazet now farre worne with yeares, and so grievously tormented with the gout that hee was not able to helpe himselfe: for the quietnesse of his subjects and preuenting of such troubles as might arise by the aspiring of his children after his death, determined whilest he yet liued (for the auoiding of these and other such like mischeefes) to establish the succession in some one of his sonnes; who wholly possessed of the kingdom, might easily repress the pride of the other. And although he had set downe with himselfe, that Achomates should be the man, as well in respect of his birthright, as of the especiall affection he bare vnto him; yet to discover the disposition of his subjects, and how they stood affected, it was giuen out in generall tearmes, That hee meant before his death to make it knowne to the world, who should succeed him in the empire, without naming any one of his sonnes; leauing that for euery man to deuine of, according as they were affected: which was not the least cause, that euery one of his sonnes with like ambition began now to make small account of their former preferments, as thinking onely vpon the empire it selfe.

First of all Selymus, whom Baiazet had made gouernour of the kingdom of TRAPAZOND, 1511 rigging vp all the ships he could in PONTVS, sayled from TRAPAZOND ouer the Euxine (now called the Blacke sea) to the citie of CAPHA, called in auncient time THEODOSIA, and from thence by land came to Mahometes king of the Tartars called Præopenes, a mightie prince, whose daughter he had without the good liking of his father before married: and discovering vnto him his entended purpose, besought him by the sacred bonds of the affinitie betwixt them, and not to shrinke from him his louing sonne in law in so fit an oportunitie for his aduancement: and withall shewed vnto him; what great hope of obtaining the empire was proposed vnto him by his most faithfull friends and the souldiours of the court, if hee would but come neerer vnto his father (then about to transerre the empire to some one of his sonnes) and either by faire means to procure his fauour, or by entering with his armie into THRACIA, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other brethren for his successour. The Tartar king commending his high deuotion, as a kind father in law with wonderfull celeritie caused great store of shipping to bee made readie in the Ponticke sea, and Mæotis, but especially at the ports of COPA and TANA, vpon the great riuier of Tanais, which boundeth EVROPE from ASIA; and arming fifteen thousand Tartarian horsemen, deliuered them all to Selymus, promising forthwith to send him greater aid if he should haue occasion to vse the same. These things being quickly dispatched, Selymus passing ouer the riuier Borysthenes, and so through VALACHIA, came at length to Danubius, and with his horsemen passed that famous riuier at the citie of CHELIA: His fleet hee commaunded to meet him at the port of the citie of VARNA, called in auncient time DIONYSIOPOLIS, in the confines of BVLGARIA and THRACIA: he himselfe still leuying moe men by the way as he went, pretending in shew quite another thing than that he had indeed intended: which the better to couer, he gaue it out as if he had purposed to haue inuaded HUNGARIE.

But Baiazet a good while before aduertised, that Selymus was departed from TRAPAZOND, and come ouer into EVROPE, maruelling that he had left his charge in ASIA (the rebellion of Tchellis and the Persian warre yet scarce quieted) and that vpon his owne head hee had entertained forraigne aid to make warre against the most warlike nation of the Hungarians; and farther, that with his armie by land, he had seized vpon the places neere vnto THRACIA, and with a strong naue kept the Euxine sea, hee began to suspect, as the truth was, That all this preparatiue was made and entended against himselfe: for the craftie old fire had good prooffe of the vnquiet and troublefome nature of his sonne, especially in that without his knowledge hee durst presume to take a wife from amongst the Tartars, and afterwards with no lesse presumption of himselfe raise an armie both by sea and land: VV hereby he easily perceiued, that he would neuer hold himselfe contented with a small kingdom, so long as hee was in hope by desperat aduerture to gaine a greater. Yet thinking it better with like dissimulation to appeale his violent and fierce nature, than by sharpe reproofe to moue him to farther choller, he sent vnto him embassadours to declare vnto him with what danger the Turkish kings had in former times taken vpon them those Hungarian warres: for example whereof he needed not to goe further than to his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding losse had made prooffe of the Hungarian forces: wherefore he should doe well to expect some fitter opportunitie, when as he might with better aduise, greater power, and more assured hope of victorie, take those wars in hand. Whereunto Selymus answered, That he had left ASIA, enforced thereunto by the iniuries of his brother Achomates, and was therefore come ouer into EVROPE, by dint of sword and the helpe of his friends, to win from the enemies of the Mahometane religion a larger and better prouince for that little barren and peaceable one which his father had giuen him, bordering vpon HIBERIA and CHOLCHOS, bare and needie people, liuing as conies amongst the rockes and mountaines. As for the Hungarians, whom they thought to be a people inuincible, and therefore not to be dealt withall, he was not of that base mind to be daunted with any danger, were it neuer so great: and yet that in his opinion the warre was neither so difficult or dangerous, as was by them pretended; for as much as the ancient prowesse of that warlike nation was now much changed, together with the change of their kings; and their discipline of war not onely much decayed, but almost quite lost, after that Vladislaus, farre vnlike in policie and prowesse, had succeeded the renowned Matthias in that kingdom. Neither had he (as he said) from his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chances of warre, as knowing that neither God nor man would bee wanting to him, who with an honourable resolution did aduention vpon vertuous and worthie attempts: and that therefore hee was fully resolved for his owne honour (which his father had in some sort blemished by the immoderate aduancement of his brethren) either to die honourably in the field in battaile against the enemies of the Mahometane religion, or els gloriously to extend the bounds of the Turkish empire: and that he would not (though one of the yongest in the Othoman familie) bee accounted inferiour to any of his brethren in vertue and prowesse. Thus was the Hungarian warre neuer by Selymus intended, notably by him pretended; and with no lesse dissimulation by Baiazet dissuaded. The embassadours, although Selymus in all his speeches shewed no token of peace: yet in his fathers name presented vnto him diuers gifts, therby if it might be to appease his fierce and cruell mind. Vnto his old gouernment they adioyned SAMANDRIA, which the Hungarians call SCHENDEROVIA, a strong cite of SERVIA vpon the borders of HUNGARY, with many other strong towntes in the same countrey: they gaue him also threescore thousand ducats, besides a thousand garments of cloth and silke: with good store of prouision wherewith to relieue and content the souldiours by him entertained; least that they drawne farre from home in hope of spoile, should take it in euill part if they should be sent away empty handed. Selymus in a happie time hauing receiued these gifts, returned the embassadours vnto his father, with more doubtfull answer and vncertaine hope than before: yet changing nothing in himselfe of his former resolution, secret messengers and letters from his friends in the court still whetting him forward (too much already enflamed with desire of souerainetie) perswading him to make halt and to repose his greatest hope in his quick speed; for that they vnderstood, that about the time of his setting forward, his brother Achomates was comming with a great power, being sent for out of CAPADOCIA by his father.

Baiazet would appoint his successor as he list he yet liued.

In the meane time Baiazet, moued the rather with the feare of Selymus, resolved vpon that, whereof he had long before in his mind deeply considered, and now said openly, That he would appoint his successor, who in stead of himselfe, spent with yeares and sickenesse, should bring with him the flower of youth and strength of bodie, fit to gouerne so great an empire. But when these things were propounded vnto the souldiours of the court by the foure great Bassas (who in all things both of peace and warres had next place vnto the emperour himselfe) it was forthwith gainesaid by those martiall men, crying aloud with one voice, That they would know no other emperour but Baiazet, vnder whose conduct and good fortune they had now serued above thirtie yeares: and therefore would not suffer him to liue a priuate life in obscuritie, who with so many victories and strong cities taken, had brought the Othoman empire vnto that height of renowne and glorie. They said moreover, that there was in him yet strength ynough, if he would but with the reuerend honour of his age retain the maiestie of his place, and the glorie he had gotten with his long and happie raigne, and most famous victories: and that of his children, such a one should vndoubtedly in his due time succeed in the empire, as of right ought: only they wished, that the old emperour might in the meane time liue in health with a long and happie raigne: neither needed he (as they said) to feare that after his death any controuersie should arise amongst his sonnes about the succession; for that the Othoman progenie vsed to attaine the imperiall seat, according to the old custome of their auncestours the Othoman kings, by right and order onely, and not by corruption or faction. But if hee would needs vpon his owne priuate good liking, or as it were by new adoption proceed to make choice of such a one, as the people and the men of warre (his most loyall and faithfull subjects) could not so well like of, it would be

be an occasion of much more trouble, and happily the meanes to bring in that confusion of the state, which he thought thereby to eschew. For then, beside the dislike of the people, the other brethren would neuer endure so notable an iniurie, or euer be at quiet, vntill they had (as men wrongfully cast off and disinherited) by strong hand and endangering of all, recouered their honour lost by the headstrong will of their aged father.

The souldiours thus before instructed by the friends and fauourites of Selymus, who with money and large promises had corrupted their captains and cheefe officers, spake these things frankly to haue deterred the old emperour from his purpose. But he thinking that they had (as he himselfe did) especially affected Achomates his eldest sonne; for that they had generally protested, that they would against all iniuries defend his honour vnto whom the empire should of right appertaine: said he would make choise of Achomates, if it should stand with their good liking. But the cheefe of the souldiours, who corrupted by Selymus, had together fold both their faith and themselves, cunningly commended Achomates, and seemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their soueraigne, Baiazet yet liuing, they said was not agreeing with the ancient custome of the Othoman kings, neither for the behoofe of the men of war, neither yet good for the state of the empire: for as much as neither his brethren Corcutus and Selymus, neither the souldiours of the court, could with patience endure the least touch of the suspicion of infidelitie; which they must needs doe, if he as a suspicious father should doubt either of the loue or loyalty of his most dutifull sonnes, or of the faith or constancie of his most faithfull seruants, whereof he had made so many trials. Besides that, it seemed vnto them all vnreasonable, that by the odious prejudice of that fact, the souldiours should be defrauded of the rewards vsually graunted vnto them during the time of the vacancie of the empire, arising of the spoile taken from them which are of religion different from the Turks. For it is a custome, that immediately vpon the death of the Turkish emperour, all the Iewes and Christians which liue at CONSTANTINOPLE, PERA, HADRIANOPLE, THESSALONICA, and PRVSA, especially marchants, exposed vnto the injuries of the Turks, are by the Ianizaries and other souldiours of the court spoiled of all their wares and goods, and become vnto them a prey: neither will they giue their oath of allegiance vnto the new emperour, vntill he haue graunted vnto them all that prey, as a bountie, and haue solemnely sworne by his owne head (the greatest assurance that can by oath be giuen amongst the Turkes) freely to pardon all the offenders, and for euer to forget all the outrages before committed. When Baiazet saw his men of war thus generally to oppose themselves against the translation of the empire to Achomates, he of purpose to corrupt the minds of them which were already before corrupted, promised to giue them five hundred thousand ducats, if they would stand fauourable to Achomates and accept him for their soueraigne: which masse of money his customers and receiuers vnderooke to leuie of the same marchant strangers and Iewes, and to pay it as Baiazet had promised. Yet the ouerthwart frowardnesse of these men of warre ouercame the good fortune of Achomates, although the reward proposed, were great: For why, they had in their martiall minds conceived farre greater rewards and preferments, if instead of a peaceable and quiet prince, a monstrous tyrant of restless nature (as was Selymus) might by their helpe and meanes aspire to the empire. Thus Baiazet driuen from his hope, thought it best for the present to dissemble the matter; and concealing his griefe, with patience to put vp that dishonour vntill a fitter opportunitie were offered for the effecting of that he so much desired.

Selymus aduertised from his friends, with what affection and fastnesse the souldiours of the court had in the secret fauour of him openly withstood the earnest desire of Baiazet for the ferment of Achomates, because he would not longer frustrate the expectation of his fauourites by lingering and delay, or seeme to distrust the readie good will of the men of warre towards him, lest the borders of HUNGARY; and with his armie marching through THRACIA, encamped at length vpon the rising of an hill not farre from HADRIANOPLE, from whence the neighing of his horses might easily be heard, and his tents from the high places of the cite discovered. From thence he sent a messenger vnto his father then lying in the cite, to certifie him, That for as much as he had not of many yeares before seene him, he was now therefore desirous to come vnto his presence to visit him, before hee crossed the seas backe againe by his appointment to TRAPEZOND: and the rather, because it might chance that he should neuer see him againe, being now become both aged & diseased: besides that, it much concerned (as he would haue had him to beleue) the quietnesse of his kingdome in Asia, and the vnitie of his children, if the controuersies betwixt him & his brother Achomates, which could not safely be committed to messengers, might by themselves be discovered to him their father, as an indifferent hearer and decider of the same. Wherefore he humbly besought him, to appoint him a time and place to giue him audience in, and not to denie him leaue to come and kisse his hands; which thing his ancestors neuer refused to graunt vnto their poore friends, much lesse vnto their children. Baiazet who a few dayes before vnderstanding of the comming of Selymus, and thoroughly seeing into his deuises, had called vnto him certaine of his Sanzackes or cheefe captaines, with their select companies out of the neere parts of Græcia, and had also set strong watch and ward through the citie: fearing least vnder the colour of parley his souldiours attending about his person, corrupted by Selymus and his friends (who euen then loded with gifts and promises, were secretly vpon the point of reuolt) should be quite drawne away from him, and so he himselfe at length bee either by open force oppressed, or secret trecherie circumvented, thought it best to cut him off at once from all hope of conference or access vnto his presence. Wherefore feriously blaming him, that he had vpon his owne head brought his armie into another mans prouince, that he in armes required audience, and last of all so insolently abused his fathers lenitie and patience; hee by the same messenger sent him farther word, That he should not presume to approach any neerer vnto him, or expect any thing appertaining to peace: who guarded with forraigne power, had without his fathers leaue entered into armes, and spoyled the countries of his friends: and that therefore he should doe well with all speed to depart out of Thracia, yea and out of Europe also, and disbanding his forces, againe to retire himselfe vnto his owne charge in Pontvs; in which doing he should find greater fauour and kindnesse with him his father, than euer he had before: but if he would needs proceed in the course by him begun, that then he would no more take him for his sonne, but for his enemy; and before it were long, sharply chastise him for his malapert insolencie, little differing from vnnaturall treacherie. The messenger with this answer dismissed, it was not long after but that Baiazet was by his espials aduertised, that Selymus the night following was risen with his armie, and marched directly towards Constantinople: whether he was sent for by his friends, in hope that vpon his approach with his armie, some suddaine tumult and vprore would to his auaille arise in that so great and populous a citie. Whereupon Baiazet fearing least in staying at H Adrianople, hee might loose the imperiall citie of Constantinople, early in the morning by breake of the day departed from H Adrianople towards Constantinople: vpon whose departure Selymus peaceably entered the citie of H Adrianople, the citizens fearing, that if they should haue made any resistance, their vnreasonable faithfulness towards Baiazet might haue turned to their vtter destruction. Selymus after he had a while refreshed his armie with the plentie of that citie, according to his former determination set forward againe, of purpose by long and speedie marches to haue prevented his fathers comming to Constantinople. Baiazet was yet scarcely come to Chivrlvs, or rather Tzurylv, an ancient ruinous citie almost vpon the mid way betwixt H Adrianople and Constantinople, when warning was giuen him of them that followed his armie, that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the straglers of his armie, and with hot skirmishing stayed and troubled his reuerward. The aged emperor more moued than terrified with the strangenesse of the matter, because his marching should not seeme as if it were a flight or chase, commaunded his standerd to be set vp, and all his armie to make a stand, of purpose, that if Selymus should so fiercely come on to giue him battaile, he might find him in readinesse. The great captaines and noblemen then present with Baiazet, whether it were for old acquaintance, or vpon some new inclination of their affection, or els vpon hope of new alliance and preferment, wishing well vnto Selymus, and therefore indirectly and cunningly fauouring him, seemed not to like of Baiazet his resolution, to be so farre moued (as they said) with the youthfull heat and lightnesse of his sonne, as to seeke reuenge by battaile, whereas the victorie it selfe could yeeld him nothing but sorrow, but the ouerthrow threatened destruction both to himselfe and all them that were with him: the imminent euent whereof seemed to bee so much the more dangerous and fearefull, by how much hee was at that time inferiour vnto his sonne both in warlike prouision and number of men. Wherefore it were good for him (they said) to moderate his anger, and not now in the winding vp of his life to make too much haile by a miserable death in a wofull battaile to staine the whole glorie of his former life. There was (as they would haue persuaded him) but one onely course to bee taken full of wholesome policie and safetie, and that was, That he should with such speed as he had begun, march on forward to Constantinople; that so Selymus excluded out of the citie (his chiefest hope) and then not knowing which way to turne himselfe, should either of his owne accord, or for feare of his fathers greater forces thinke of returne: and so with his rascall followers more honestly perish by the hands of them whose countries he had spoiled, and vpon whom he must of necessitie liue in his retire, than by the sword of his father. The author of this counsell was Mustapha, the most auintient Bassa of those which being in greatest authoritie about the emperor are onely of his priuie counsell, and sway all matters of importance concerning either peace or warre: he then vpon an vnthankfull and malicious mind loathing Baiazet, as one that had too long reigned, hated him also for certaine priuat displeasures conceiued of the emulation of the other younger Bassas by him promoted: and secretly bare great affection to Selymus, both in condition and fauour resembling his grandfather the Great Mahomet, by whom he was brought vp himselfe, and him of all the sonnes of Baiazet he thought most worthy of the empire. This Mustapha was borne in the towne of Seres (neere vnto Amphipolis) the sonne of a Greeke priest, a man of a litle craftie and subtile wit, alwaies subiect to corruption: which diseases of mind were in him well to haue been discovered by his froward looke and squint eyes, the certaine notes of a nature to bee suspected. Next vnto this Mustapha was Bostanges Bassa, borne of the honourable familie of Ducagins in Ætholia, and thereof called Ducagimogli: a man for his couetousnesse, ambition, and treacherie, infamous; as the foule and miserable end of his life afterwards declared: Vnto this man Selymus had by secret promise betrothed one of his daughters now marriageable, as a reward of his corrupted faith. By which slight, he had also allured Aga (or capitaine of the Janizaries, and great master of the household) to promise his aid for the obtaining of the empire; whereunto he said he was by destinie called: and by his meanes drew other inferiour captaines secretly to fauour his quarrell, vnto whom hee spared not to promise whatsoeuer might please them. Yea the captaines almost generally either corrupted with reward, or for feare following the inclination of the greater commaunders, of themselves leaned that way. Of all the rest, onely Cherseogles Bassa (whom the Turks histories call also Achmet Herteez-ogli) a faithfull, constant, and vpright man, free from all double dealing and deceit, a fast and assured friend vnto Baiazet his father in law, was of opinion, That the immoderat pride and insolencie of Selymus, was euen there by force of arms and strong hand forthwith to be repressed, before he should approach any neerer vnto the imperiall citie, for feare of raising some farther trouble and tumult there than were well to be appealed; which was the thing that Selymus his friends most of all desired. Neither was it to be thought (as Cherseogles said) that the naked Tartarian hostmen, although they were in number moe, would euer be able to abide the first charge of Baiazet his well armed pensioners. As for the Janizaries, of whose approoued faith and valour tried in manie dangers, hee had before had good experience: there was no doubt but that they would now to the vttermost of their power, defend the person and honour of their aged and victorious emperor, who had of long time so well of them deserued; and also reuenge his quarrell vpon disobedient Selymus, who neither fearing God the iust reuenger of such vngratious dealing, neither the infamie of men, had most vnnaturally lift vp his sword against his father, wickedly to depriue him of life of whom he had receiued life. Wherefore he perswaded him in his owne just quarrell, to go forth vnto his souldiours with cheerfull countenance, and putting them in remembrance of the benefits they had from time to time most bountifullly receiued at his hands, as also of their allegiance and due tie; to make them to vnderstand, that reposing his trust in their fidelitie and valour, hee had resolutely set downe with himselfe, in that place before he went any farther, by their faithful hands to chastise the presumptuous insolencie of his vnnaturall sonne, together with his rebellious followers.

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherseogles, it shall not be amisse both for the honour of the man, and the great loue he alwaies bare vnto the Christians, to step a litle out of the way, to see the cause why he being a Christian borne, turned Turke. For hee was not (as almost all the rest of the great men about Baiazet were) of a child taken from his Christian parents, and so brought vp in the Mahometan religion; but being now a man grown, turned Turke: yet so, as that he neuer in heart forgot either the Christian religion or loue toward the Christians; a thing not common among such renegates. He being the sonne of one

Cherse-

Cherseogles Bassa, is the only great man faithfull to Baiazet, perswades him to giue battaile to Selymus

Chersecinus a small prince of ILLYRIA, neere vnto the Blacke mountaine; and going to be married vnto a ladie whom he most entirely loued, and vnto whom he was already betrothed, honourably descended of the house of the Despot of SERVIA: his intemperat father, with lustfull eye beholding the young ladie of rare feature and incomparable beautie, desired to haue her for himselfe; and regarding more the satisfying of his owne inordinat desire, than his owne honour or the fatherly loue of his sonne, tooke her in marriage himselfe: all his friends labouring in vaine to dissuade him, and with open mouth crying shame of so foule a fact. Wherefore the young man, moued with the indignitie of so great an injurie, and driuen headlong with despair, fled first to the Turkes garrisons which lay not farre off, and from thence to CONSTANTINOPLE: where the fortune of the man was to bee wondered at: For being brought before Baiazet, who with cheerefull countenance entertained him for that he was honourably descended, and well liked both of the man and of the cause of his reuolt: smiling vpon him said, Be of good cheer noble youth, for thy great courage is worthy of farre greater fortune than thy fathers house can afford thee; now in steed of thy loue wrongfully taken from thee by thy father, the kinde man of a poore exiled prince, thou shalt haue giuen thee in marriage the daughter of a great emperor, of rare and singular perfection. And not long after, abjuring his religion, and changing his name of Stephen to Achomates and Chersecogles, hee married one of Baiazet his daughters, a princeesse of great beautie: and desired to haue a place amongst the Basses of greatest honour in the court. Yet still retaining the remembrance of his former profession with a desire to returne thereto againe: insomuch, that he kept in his secret closet the image of the crucifix, which he shewed to Io. Lasarus as to his trustie friend, as he himselfe reported. This man at such time as the citie of MODOON was taken by the Turkes, and a multitude of poore Christian captiues cruelly put to death in the sight of Baiazet, by earnest entreatie saued the Venetian Senators there taken: and afterward by earnest sute deliuered Andreas Gritti, being prisoner at CONSTANTINOPLE and condemned to die, who not manie yeares after was chosen duke of VENICE. He was the chiefe meanes whereby the Venetians to their great good obtained peace of Baiazet. He also by his great authoritie and of his owne charge, redeemed innumerable Christians from the seruitude of the Turkes, and set them at libertie. Neither is his kindnesse towards the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten: for at such time as the aforesaid Io. Lasarus, the notable and learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the Tenth sought for the ancient works of famous writers, he procured the Turkish emperours letters patents, that he might freely at his pleasure search all the libraries in GRACIA, to the great benefit of good letters. Now Baiazet encouraged by this mans perswasion (as is aforesaid) and hearing as hee lay in his pavilion the alarm of the enemy, with the tumult and clamour of his owne souldiours, as if they had been men afraid; and sundrie messengers also at the same time coming vnto him with newes, that Selymus with his Tartarian horsemen had almost enclosed the reareward of his armie; and already taken some of his baggage: grinding his teeth for verie madnesse and griefe of mind, with teares trickling downe his hoarie cheekes, got him out of his pavilion in his horse-litter (for hee was at the same time so troubled with the gout, that he was not able to sit on horsebacke) and turning himselfe vnto the pensioners and Ianizaries standing about him, as their manner is, said vnto them:

Baiazet to the Ianizaries and souldiours of the court.

Will you (foster children, valiant souldiours, and faithfull keepers of my person, who with great good fortune haue serued me in field above the space of thirtie yeares; and for your faithfull and good service, haue both in time of peace and warre, of me receiued such rewards, as by your owne confession and thanksgiving farre exceeded your owne expectation; and the measure of our treasures) will you I say suffer the innocent father to be butchered by his gracelesse sonne? And your olde emperor tormented with age and diseases, to be cruelly murdered by a companie of wild Tartars, little better than arrant rogues and theues? Shall I be now forsaken in this my heauie olde age and last act of life? and shall I be deliuered vnto mine enemies by them, by them I say, who many yeares ago with great faithfulness and inuincible courage defended mine honour and right against my brother Zemes? and haue manie times since, not onely valiantly defended this empire against most warlike nations, but also most victoriously augmented the same? But I will not so easily beleeeue that which to my no small griefe is brought vnto mine eares, concerning the reuolting of mine armie: neither if I did beleeeue it, am I so fearefull as to be therewith discouraged, or to seeke to make shift for my selfe.

For to what purpose should I thinke of flight? as though I could in anie other place find more faithfulness or surer defence than with you? And concerning your selues, what should be your hope by this so infamous treacherie? If anie of you (for I cannot beleeeue that you are all so mad) without regard of faith, of worldly shame, or the feare of God, haue polluted your minds with the pernicious conceit of so foule a treason; doe you thinke to gaine greater rewards and preferments by your treacherie and villanie, than by your fidelitie and constancie? There be manie which carefull of my person, perswade me to reserue this my sicke and feeble bodie vnto my better fortune, and to commit my selfe to flight: so rather to saue my life with shame and infamie, than to end my daies with honour and glorie: which is so farre from my thought for the apprehension of anie feare to doe, that I will to the contrarie forthwith giue the fierce enemy battell; and in this my last danger make prooffe of all your fidelitie and valour, and of euerie one of your good wils in particular: and so by the conduct of the highest, either defeat the power and breake the strength of this gracelesse man, or else hauing raigned about thirtie yeares an emperor, end my daies together with them which shall vnto the end continue with me in their faithfulness and loyaltie, although I should be most shamefully and dishonourably betrayed and for saken of some of mine owne guard: which thing though lying same would make me beleeeue, yet will I not feare it untill I see the prooffe thereof.

The common sort of the Ianizaries, vnto whom the great commaunders and captaines corrupted by Selymus, had not for their leuitie and multitude communicated their purpose of transferring the empire to Selymus: began to crie out as if it had been with general consent, That he should not doubt to joyne battell with his enemies, and so to make prooffe of their constant fidelitie and wonted valour. Which was done with such a cheerefulness and desire expressed by great shouts, clapping of hands, and clattering of armour, that it seemed they would play the parts of resolute souldiours, and that as guiltlesse men they tooke it grieuously to be once suspected of treason or infidelitie. Others also who secretly and in heart were well affected to Selymus, for fashion sake followed them with like crie: but especially the great commaunders both of the armie and of the emperours court, now changing their affection (whether it were for shame of the fact, or for feare of discouering themselves out of season, is vncertaine.) Wherefore according to the manner of such men, which through their mutabilitie and mischieuous disposition, feare to be conuincid and discouered, add vnto the present a second and new treason or treacherie, to couer the former: so Mustapha and Bostanges (not daring now to shew themselves for Selymus) to make a great shew of their fained loyaltie towards Baiazet, departed themselves out of his pavilion, to encourage the souldiours and to martiall the battell.

Baiazet sicke in his chariot, by the aduise of Chersecogles the faithfull Bassa, placed his battell in this order: The Sanzakes (which are the gouernors of prouinces) with their horsemen, in number about six thousand, he set in the front of the battell: The Spachi-ogians and Siliphcars, which are the chiefe horsemen of the court (and as it were the emperours pensioners) were placed as two wings on each side of the great squadron of the Ianizaries; in the middest whereof was old Baiazet himselfe. Other foure thousand horsemen (seruants to the great men of the court) were left in the reareward, and to guard the baggage. These slaues (for so indeed they are) for their apparel and furniture, yea and valour also, are little inferior to their masters, by whom they are so sumptuously maintained both for strength and ostentation. The battell thus ordered, Baiazet commanded the trumpets to sound, and a red ensigne in token of battell to be displayed. On the other side, Selymus placing his Tartarian horsemen in both wings, and his Turks in the middest in manner of an halfe moone, for that he in number of horsemen farre exceeded his father, did almost on euerie side enclose him, and so charge him. The Tartars when they were come within an hundred paces of their enemies, casting themselves (after the manner of their fight) into great rings, emptie within in manner of a crowne, and so running round, that they might both backward and forward deliuer their arrowes, cast vpon their enemies whole showers of shot as if it had bene haile, to the great annoyance of the Turkes: when as in the meane time, the other Tartarian archers farther off, shooting their arrowes not right forth, but more vpright towards heaven, which falling directly downe fore gauled the Turkes horses also. But the old souldiours (taught by the example of their captaines) serred close together, and casting their targets ouer their heads, as if it had bene one whole rooffe or penthouse, receiued their arrowes with lesse harme, and halted with as much speed as they could to come to handie blowes. The pensioners also at the same instant brauely charged the middle of Selymus his battaile, where his Turkish horsemen stood: and Atax (captain of the Ianizaries) drawing out seven hundred readie harquebusiers out of the Squadron of the Ianizaries, with them assailed the hindmost of one of the wings of the Tartars: and the foure thousand seruants left in the reareward, as desirous as the rest to shew their forwardnesse, with great slaughter repulsed the other wing of the Tartars, which came to haue spoiled the Turkes carriages. This fierce battaile betwixt the father and the sonne, with doubtfull euent endured from noone vntill the going downe of the Sunne: Selymus in many places still restoring his declining battaile, and fighting himselfe, as for an empire. But after that the Tartars, hardly charged by the harquebusiers, were not able to abide the shot, especially their horses being with the vnwonted noise thereof wonderfully terrified, and so carrying backe their riders whether they would or no, began to flie; the rest of the horsemen could neither by commaundement, threatening, or wounds, be enforced to stay, but turned their backs and fled. The footmen also whom Selymus had attired and armed after the manner of the Ianizaries, being forsaken of their owne horsemen, were now by Baiazet his horsemen compassed about and almost all slaine.

Selymus his armie thus ouerthrowne, and himselfe hardly beset, was by certaine troupes of his Turkish horsemen which yet stayed with him, deliuered from the present danger; and being wounded, was mounted vpon a fresh horse, and so with all the speed he could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be pursued and ouertaken by his fathers speedie horsemen, he changed his horse, and tooke another of a wonderfull swiftnesse: and so reseruing himselfe to his future fortune, with a few of his followers fled to Varna, and from thence by sea to CAPHA.

The horse whereon Selymus fled, was all eole blacke, called Carabulo (that is to say, a Blacke cloud) whom Selymus as a good seruitour euer after exempted from all seruice: and had him in such estimation, that couered with cloth of gold, hee was as a spare horse without a rider led after him in all his great expeditions, first into PERSIA, and afterward into EGYPT, where he died at CAIRE, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexanders horse, had a monument erected for him: wherein Selymus shewed himselfe more kinde than to his owne brethren, whom he cruelly murdered, and hardly afforded to some of them so honourable a sepulture.

In this battaile of fortie thousand which Selymus brought into the field, escaped not about eight thousand, but they were either slaine or taken prisoners. Of Baiazet his armie were lost about seven hundred, and three thousand hurt with Tartarian arrowes: which losse he presently reuenged, with extreame crueltie causing all such as were taken prisoners, to be without mercie put to the sword in his sight; whose heads were laied together by heapes, and their dead bodies as if they had beene towers. Of this notable battaile betwixt the father and the sonne in the year 1511, CHIVRLVS, called in antient time TZVRVLVM, before an obscure old ruinous citie (or as Iouius calleth it, a village) became famous; but much more afterwards by the fatall destinie of Selymus: who not many yeares after (stricken with a most loathsome and incurable disease) ended his dayes in the same place with an vntimely and tormenting death, God (as is to be thought) with reuenging hand in the same place taking just punishment for his former disloyaltie towards his aged father, as shall hereafter be in due time and place declared.

Three dayes Baiazet lay still in the same place where he had obtained the victorie, vntill such time as all his souldiours were againe returned from the chase of the enemy: after that, hee held on his way to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there bountifully rewarded his souldiours. In the meane time Achomates hearing of all the trouble which had happened betwixt his father and his brother Selymus, with the euent thereof, came with an armie of twentie thousand from AMASIA, through the countries of GALATIA and BITHYNIA, vnto the citie of SCVTARI, called in antient time CHRISOPOLIS (though some suppose it to haue beene the famous citie of CHALCEDON) which citie is situated vpon the strait of Bosphorus directly against the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE. In this place Achomates encamped his armie, neere vnto the sea side, expecting what course his father should take after so great a victorie. For beside the prerogative of his age, and the especiall loue of his father towards him, the generall affection of the vulgar people, with the good opinion he had of himselfe, had already filled his mind with the hope of the empire: wherefore he ceased not night and day to send messengers over that narrow strait to CONSTANTINOPLE, & earnestly to sollicite Baiazet his father in so fit an occasion to make hast to dispatch what he had so long before determined, concerning the resignation of the empire. He also importuned his friends and familiars in best manner he could to commend him to his father, and in most ample sort to extoll his graue purpose for translation of the empire, and to doe the vttermost of their deuoir, that seeing God and good fortune had justly ouerthrowne the rash attempt and force of his brother Selymus, he by their good means might the sooner obtaine the empire, whereof he was the vndoubted heire.

Baiazet, who of himselfe and according to his old good liking was altogether desirous of the preferment of Achomates, was by their persuasions easily entreated to hasten the performance of that he had before determined for the transferring of the empire. And making no great secret of the matter, commaunded certaine gallies to bee made readie for the transporting of Achomates from SCVTARI to CONSTANTINOPLE. But the great Bassaes with the souldiours of the court (the secret fauourits of Selymus) vnderstanding the matter, began againe openly to resist and impugne his purposed determination, and to allege the same reasons they had before at HADRIANOPOLE alleged: in fine they said plainly, That they would by no meanes suffer him so farre to disable himselfe as an insufficient man to resigne the empire, who of late had with so valiant and courageous an heart fought for the honour of his crowne and dignitie; and that therefore so long as hee liued, they would acknowledge no other soueraine but Baiazet: yet for all that as they meant not thereby to cut off Achomates his hope, so neither ought he to distrust the good will of the men of warre; but that he being a man of most approued & known valour, might in due time with their generall good liking enjoy his right, which should then without all question be due vnto him as the eldest sonne of their emperour. They said moreover, that they had in the late battaile against Selymus sufficiently declared what minds they were of both towards their emperour and Achomates, and what confidence they were to repose in the fidelitie of their souldiours; who to manifest their faithfulness and loyaltie, had not refused to offer themselves vnto the hazard of a most vnequall battaile, yea their liues vnto death it selfe. O foule dissimulation, the couert maske of all mischeefe, vnder which, meere trecherie is here pretended for great loyaltie, the aged emperour too too much flattered, Achomates shamefully deluded, and (the man that might not as then without some addition of disgrace bee named) Selymus, euen bloodie Selymus, secretly sought for about all men to be preferred!

Baiazet by this offwardnesse and insolencie of the souldiours againe disappointed of his purpose, or els (as some thought) delighted with the sweetnesse of soueraignie: for that after the late victorie he seemed (as one growne young againe) neither to feele himselfe old or vnable still to gouern so great an empire; sent word to Achomates, how the matter stood, and that he should forthwith depart from SCVTARI to his old charge at AMASIA, from whence he would againe call him at such time as he had with new bountie wooen the minds of the souldiours, and procured the good liking of other the great men in court, whereby so great a matter and not vsuall, might the better and with more securitie be effected.

Achomates thus deceived of his hope and expectation, greuously complaining that he was so mocked of his father, and contemned of the souldiours of the court, began to mix his new requests with words of heat and discontentment, and to inueigh against his father, for making him a byword (as hee termed it) and a laughing stocke vnto the world, after hee had taken the paines to come so faire, and that by his speciall appointment. But if hee proceeded so to doate, and to make so great reckoning of the souldiours of the court, that in respect thereof hee neither regarded his promise, nor that was right and iust, he would himselfe by force of arms take vpon him the defence of his owne honour and right, so light esteemed by his father, and reuenge the disgrace offered vnto him by others.

Whereunto Baiazet answered by the Cadelescher (which is a man of greatest place and authority amongst the Turkes in matters concerning their superstition, and therefore of them honoured about others, as the sacred interpreter of their law) that hee did neither well nor wisely without iust cause to fall into so great rage and choller, as by his speech and force to thinke to extort that good which was onely by loue and loyaltie to be gained: whereas all things should be surely kept for him, and the empire vndoubtedly descend vnto him, if by vntimely hast hee did not marre that hope which hee ought by sufferance and patient expectation to cherish: hee might (as the Cadelescher told him) learne by the late example and fortune of his brother Selymus, what might be for his owne good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger, despe-desperately to thrust himself headlong into such an action as hee could not possibly see the end of, than moderating by reason his hot passions, to expect with patience the oportunitie of time, and fitness of occasion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good.

Achomates enflamed with anger and griefe of the repulse, all the while the Cadeleſcher was deliuering his fathers meſſage, gaue him many ſharpe taunts, and had much adoe to itay himſelfe from offering of him violence; oftentimes threatening him, that in ſhort time both his father ſhould deereſly buy the changing of his purpoſe, and the ſouldiours of the court their trecherous dealing; and ſo ſending him away with this ſhort anſwere, hee preſently riſe with his armie, and paſſing through Bythinia, cruelly ſpoiled the country in his returne to Asia. There dayly more and more enflamed with the griefe and the indignitie of the repulſe before received, hee determined to inuade the leſſer Asia: that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that hee muſt needs by the force of armes trie his right againſt either of his brethren, he might therein vſe the wealth of that rich prouince. Whereby if it ſhould chance that he ſhould by the praetiſe of any faile of the whole empire, yet he ſhould at the leaſtwiſe be poſſeſſed of the one halfe thereof, and be theredier for all euent, hauing all thoſe great and rich prouinces in his power. Wherefore calling vnto him his two ſonnes, Amurathes and Aladin, yong princes of great hope, after he had grieuouſly complained of the vnkindneſſe of his father Baiaſet, and of the injuries done againſt him by his enemies in the court, he declared vnto them, that there was now no hope left for him to obtaine the empire, except they would forthwith enter into armes with him, and ſo together with him defend both his and their owne right and honour, againſt the mallice and injuries of their enemies: which he ſaid, would be an eaſie matter to doe by ſurpriſing the leſſer Asia, if they would courageouſly adventure vpon it; for as much as all Pisidia, Lycaonia, Pamphylia, with the ſea coaſt of Ionica, were not as then kept with any armie or nauie: and as for his brother Corcutus, there was no great doubt to be made of him, who according to his quiet diſpoſition would bee content either to ſit ſtill, or els in regard of his juſt quarrell take part with him; or if he would needs intermeddle his quiet eſtate with the troubled, and ſo enter into arms, might eaſily be thruſt out of whatſoeuer he poſſeſſed: as for the gouernours of the reſt of the prouinces, he doubted not, but that they would alſo yeeld either to his commaund or fortune. Wherefore hee willed them to plucke vp their hearts as men of courage, and to goe into the countries thereabouts to take vp men, and whatſoeuer els were needfull for the warres. Theſe gallants, of their owne youthfull diſpoſition readie ynough for ſuch a matter, and now encouraged with their fathers perſuaſion, did what they were by him commaunded, and had in ſhort time raiſed a notable armie of voluntarie ſouldiours, of whom the greateſt part were of ſeruite condition. But Achomates himſelfe, beſides his old armie which hee had in former time lead againſt the Perſian rebels, leuiſed new forces alſo, and called forth into the field all the able men that were to be found in the cities round about: and ſo running through the prouince, proclaimed himſelfe king of Asia, and ſuch as would not forthwith yeeld vnto him, thoſe he and his two ſonnes in diuers places proſecuted with all hoſtilitie: by which meanes many cities, eſpecially ſuch as were but weakely fortified, partly for feare, partly by conſtraint were deliuered out vnto him.

After that, he entered with his armie into LYCAONIA, and the borders of CILICIA, where by embassadours and often letters he requested Mahometes his brothers sonne (who then governed those countries) to aid him in his just quarell against them, who by craftie and sinister persuasions had to his dishonour and disgrace withdrawne his fathers good will from him, and so farre seduced him, as that hee was determined to appoint another successeur in the empire, than him his eldest and first begotten sonne: which their mallice he would (as he said) prevent, & by force of armes recover his right, which his father knowing to be due vnto him, was about to have put him in possession of: whilest he yet liued, had he not by the sinister practise of others bene hindered: for the recouerie whereof, if Mahometes would out of his prouince aid him with men and victuall, and so further his just cause, he promised that he should find a farre better vncle than he had found a father; and that his present friendship should in time be most amply and bountifullly requited.

Wherunto Mahometes answered, that he could not do what his vncl^e had required, except he were so commanded by his grandfather Baiazet, whom alone he acknowledged for his dread soueraign: & that it was not for him to judge, whether he did right or otherwile, That he would not in his lifetime resigne the empire to his sonne. But this (he said) he was not ignorant of, that he was not to yeeld his obedience to anie other, so long as he liued possessed of the empire: to whom both his father Taihan Shach whilest he liued, and himselfe also had giuen their oath of obedience and loyaltie. ¶ Wherefore it were good for him to pacifie himselfe, least in seeking vntimely reuenge of his enemies, he should to the offence of all men wrong his father: and by too much heat and hast ouerthrow both his hope and honour; which of right should be moost great, if he could but in the meane time haue patience, and stay himselfe a while: Achomates, who expected nothing lesse than such an answer, but thought that Mahometes would either for loue or feare haue presently come vnto him: and now finding his requests to bee with greater grauntie and consideration denied by his nephew, than they were by reason of him demanded; entred with his armie into the borders of his prouince, and with fire and sword began to destroy the countrey before him: ¶ Which Mahometes with such power as he had thinking to remedie, was by the way encountered by his vnckle not farre from LARBANA; and there ouerthrowne: and taking that citie for reuenge, was there certaine daies besieged by Achomates; and at last together with his brother (then but a child) deliuered into his hands, at such time as the citie was by the fearfull citicens by composition yeelded vnto him: Achomates hauing taken the citie with his two nephewes, caused Mahometes his counsellors, with his foster brother, by whose persuasion it was supposed that he had so answered his vnckle and endangered himselfe, to bee all put to death.

Their proceedings of Achomates filled Baiazet with griefe and indignation, that he should in so great yeares be set vpon by two of his owne fonnies, one after the other. Yet to proue if those troubles might without more bloodshed be pacified, he sent his embassadours vnto him to re-proue him for his disloialtie; and to command him forthwith to set at libertie his two nephewes; Mahometes and his brother, and so without more stir to get him againe to AMBSIA: which if he should refuse to doe, then to denounce vnto him open warre. But he, which by how much the more he had after his repulse ambitiously affected the empire, had resolved with himselfe to deale so much the more cruelly in his proceedings: hauing received this message from his father, caused the chiefe embassador (for that he had in franke speech deliuered his message and denounced vnto him wars) to be in his owne presence put to death; and threatned the rest with the like, if before the going downe of the sunne they voided not his campe.

This outrage highly offended Baiazet, and alienated the minds of manie before well affected to Achomates : for that without any reuerence of his father and contrarie to the law of nations, he had violated the embassadours sent to him for peace . Vpon the first brute hereof, the souldiours which then waited at the court gate, in the hearing of Baiazet exclaimed, that the infolencie of Achomates was not longer to be suffered, but forthwith by force to be repressed ; that by sufferance and delay he would grow from euill to worse ; and that if Baiazet should prolong the time, and in fatherly sort seeke by faire means to reclaim him, hee should afterwards in vaine craue the aide of his best souldiours against his rebellious sonne strengthened by his owne long sufferance. Mustapha also the chiefe Bassa, with Bosfanges and others of great place (who secretly fauoured Selymus, and had cunningly caused these things by fit men to be dispersed amongst the souldiours) began at the first to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the strangenesse and hauioues of the fact ; in such flie sort, as if they had condemned the deed done, but not the doer . But afterward, when they saw that Baiazet was thoroughly heated, both by his owne angrie disposition and the speech of the souldiours , and vpon the confidence of his former victorie against Selmus, now readie to seeke reuenge ; they began then to heape fresh coles vpon the fire, and bitterly to inuay against Achomates , as a traitour to his aged father and the state ; and withall highly commended the fidelitie and courage of the Ianizaries and souldiours of the court, who for the safetie and honour of their aged emperour, were most prest and readie to expose themselves, their liues, and whatsoeuer else they had, vnto new dangers .

So was Achomates by the craft and subtiltie of these great men, by the anger of his father, and the judgement of the fouldiours, proclaimed traitour; and order taken, that the souldiours of the court with the European horfemen, shoud with all possible speed be sent against him into ASIA. But when choise was to be made of some valiant and worthie Generall that might take vpon him so great a charge, which seemed especially to appertaine vnto some one of the great Bassaes: it was strange to see, how they all began to straine courtesie at that presentment, and eueric one to refuse the place and disable himselfe, saying, That it were a great indignitie, that the emperours armie should be led against his sonne by anie of his seruants: and the souldiours (hauiing their lesson before hand) said plainly, That they durst not, nor would not draw their swords or lift vp their hands against the sonne of the emperour, and heire apparant of the empire, except they were conducted and commaunded by some of the Othoman bloud in person present with them: for so had his brother, long before when he rebelled in CILICIA, and now of late Selymus his rebellious sonne, bene both ouerthrowne and vanquished, euen by the conduct of Baiazet himselfe, and not by anie of his seruants. These things all tended to this purpose, that Selymus might by indirect meanes be reconciled to his father (whom they secretly favoured, although for feare of displeasure they durst not so much as name him but by way of disgrace) and by this verie meanes to make way for his returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, and so consequently, to giue him power to seaze vpon the empire. For it was probably supposed, that neither Baiazet himselfe, being verie aged and diseased; neither Corcutus, altogether buried in his studie, would vndertake the managing of those wars: so that of the Othoman family onely Selymus was left to whom that charge might be committed; all the nephewes of Baiazet by reason of their tender yeares, as yet vniuers for the same. At these speeches of the Bassaes and the souldiours, Baiazet as a man perplexed and in a chafe, flung away into his pallace, excusing himselfe by his great yeares and diseased bodie: but complaining deeply, that Corcutus in following the vaine title of learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the meane time neglected other studies and honourable qualities, better befitting his princely birth and calling. As hee was thus reasoning with himselfe, and deuising what course to take; Mustapha the old Bassa, who all the time of his raigne had vsed to disburden him of his cares, hauing by way of talke drawne him into a full discourse concerning the proceeding in the intended warre, set vpon him with this craftie and premeditated speech, framed of purpose for his destruction.

The craftie craftie-tration of the great
E. the Mustapha to Baiazet, for the bringing home of Selymus

Your Maiestie may not (most dread Soueraigne) although by yeares and strength of bodie you were neuer so well able, you may not I say, either transport your armie, or your selfe passe ouer in person into ASIA; least whilst you are there, from place to place chasing Achomates, you leaue a far more dangerous enemy behind you in EUROPE; who may in your absence seaze vpon THRACIA, GRECE, CILICIA, yea and the imperiall citie it selfe, destitute of sufficient defendants. Doe we not heare, that Selymus is raising of new forces about VARNA? to expect a new supply of horsemen from the Tartar king his father in law? and already as it were hovering ouer our heads? Is he not of greater spirit and courage, than to be daunted or dismayed with the misfortune of one battell? Or if you shall send ouer your old beaten souldiours into ASIA, and call Corcutus into EUROPE with the forces he leuied the last yeare, who in time of your sicknes may withstand the attempts of Selymus: will he feare these fresh water souldiours of ASIA, or their philosophicall Generall, which feared not the souldiours of your court, the pickt and chosen men of the world, and your selfe a most worthy and victorious emperor? You are deceiued, and (if I may be bold so to say) you thoroughly see not into the doubtfull ends of things, if you thinke not that you must at one time wage warre against two dangerous enemies, euen in the remotest parts of your empire, in ASIA and EUROPE: For whilst you shall go about to expulse Achomates out of CAPADOCIA, Selymus neerer at hand, and waiting all opportunitie; will by and by at your backe, raise a most dangerous warre in the verie heart and chiefe strength of your empire. But if you moued with the greatnesse and due consideration of the danger, shall go about to defend THRACIA, and for that purpose retaine with you the most approoued and faithfull souldiours of the court, you shall see all ASIA on a fire before your face: neither will Achomates make an end of wile and warre, untill such time as he haue drawne the empire of ASIA to himselfe. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault, but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your selfe, should by your selfe and the consent of all men be aduised traitours vnto your crowne and dignitie; whereof the one through rashnesse, the other vpon pride and vaine discontentment, hath risen up in armes against you: why doe you not in so doubtfull and perplext a matter, preferre safe and sound aduise before that which masketh vnder the shew of maiestie and honour? and whom you cannot both at one time correct and be reuenged vpon, to set vpon them as occasion shall serue when they are together by the cares betwixt themselves? This is the onely hope of your Asiaticke, this is the onely way, if you shall resolve (as the common proverbe saith) to drue out one naille with another, and so to ouercome your enemies. Moderate a while your heat desire of reuenge, and for the present dissemble your griefe; griefe; graunt vnto one of them pardon, and in shew take him into your grace and fauor, imploy him against the other: so shall you without danger, howsoeuer it fall out, persecute the one whom you loue not, with the hazard of the other whom you trust not: and at your pleasure oppresse him; to whom you shall commit your ensignes and armie; the hands of your faithfull and trustie souldiours being euer at your appointment ready to take reuenge. So shall you with securitie make an end of this warre, exposing vnto the danger him whom you had rather to overcome (as your enemy) by him whom you wish also to perish.

Mustapha had scarce made an end of speaking, but the other Bassaes (as they had before agreed amongst themselves) began where he left, and with all their cunning laboured to persuaade Baiazet to call home his sonne Selymus, and to make him Generall of his armie against his brother: saying, That he had already endured sufficient punishment for his former disloyaltie, and that therefore it was like that he as a well corrected child would from thenceforth containe himselfe within the compasse of his most dutifull obedience: whereas Achomates proud of his birth, hauing of late violated his fathers embassadours, and filled all ASIA with rebellion, was not like to bee brought to any reasonable conformitie, vntill hee were by force of armes plucked downe, and so made to know himselfe, in like manner as was his brother Selymus of late. Baiazet seeing that in resolving of a matter of so great consequence, Cherseogles Bassa (his sonne in law, and the onely faithfull counsellour then about him) sat all silent, hanging the head, as a man not of the same opinion with the rest, stood a great while in doubt what to resolve vpon: he could not so easily forget the late injuries done against him by Selymus, it was yet fresh in memorie, how that he had out of ASIA inuaded EUROPE, surprised HADRIANOPLE, giuen him battaile, endangered his person with his Tartarian horsemen, and that onely by the goodnesse of God he had obtained the victorie: on the other side, his Maiestie contemned, his nephewes imprisoned, his embassadours violated, the cities of ASIA ransacked, and all those goodly countreys presently smoking with the fire of rebellion, so filled his old heart with anger and indignation, as that he desired nothing more than to be reuenged. Whilst hee was thus struggling with his owne thoughts, and doubtfull what to doe, the vnfaithfull Bassaes by deepe deceit and treacherie (Cherseogles most instantly persuaading the contrarie) ouercame him so farre, as with his owne hand to write letters to Selymus, promising him, that forgetting all injuries past, he would vpon the hope of his loyaltie, receiue him into his former grace and fauour, and make him Generall of his armie, if hee would without delay repaire to CONSTANTINOPLE, and so passe ouer into ASIA against his rebellious brother Achomates.

Whilst these things are in doing at CONSTANTINOPLE, Corcutus aduertised by letters from his friends of the weake estate of his aged father, and by what persuaasions he had bene induced (after Achomates was proclaimed traitor) to call vnto him Selymus, and to make him Generall of his armie; came downe out of MAGNESIA to PHOCIS, and there embarking himselfe in his gallics, sailed to CONSTANTINOPLE: where being arriued, hee went presently to the court, attended vpon with a great number of his friends and fauourites; and entering into the priue chamber, humbled himselfe before his father, and kissed his hand: and after much talke had betwixt them of diuers weightie matters, is reported to haue spoken vnto him as followeth.

eth to Constantinople.

It is now about thirtie yeares past (most reuerend father, and dread Soueraigne) since that I (being chosen and proclaimed emperor by the prerogative of the souldiours of the court, by generall consent of the citizens of this imperiall citie, and by the graue iudgement of the wise and graue Bassaes of the Court) haue cheerefully and willingly, and as I may truly say, with mine owne hand deuoured from my selfe vnto your Maiestie the possession of this most glorious kingdome and empire: which thing what worldly wight would haue done? but either a mad man, or els a most kind and loving sonne? Vnto which so rare an example of a religious and loving heart, I was not by any feare or constraint enforced, but onely by regard and contemplation of your owne sacred person, and the due consideration of my dutie. Neither did it in the course of so many yeares, euer repent me of that my singular kindnesse and dutie done, when as I contenting my selfe with such things as you had vnto me assigned, and with the generall commendation of my well doing, as well as with a kingdome, thought this your great estate and highest type of worldly honour, not to be compared with the quiet contentment of my pleasing studies: when as I accounted it a vaine thing, and not befitting the resolution solution of a settled and quiet mind, to long after these wordly things, which being had and enjoyed to the full, worke no full contentment in the insatiable desire of man: and that surmounting vertue and the sweet, & most sweet meditation of heavenly things promised vnto my contemplatiue and rauished mind, things of farre more worth and maiestie than all the kingdomes and monarchies of the world. But whilest I was tracing this path, little regarding worldly honour, or the glorie of an empire, and was for pure deuotion and desire of knowledge traueilling into the furthest part of ARABIA, vnto the altar of our most sacred prophet Mahomet, and so to the Indians, as to men of a more exact knowledge and sincere profession; you in the midst of my trauell drew mee out of ÆGYPTE by the long hands of the Egyptian Sultan, backe againe into PARYGIA; commaunding mee, that eschewing the manifold dangers (which in my long trauell I must needs haue fallen into) I should from thenceforth haue more regard of my life and health, and to expect the fruit both of my loyaltie towards you, and of your fatherly loue towards me: as if you had bene then of opinion, that the time would come, when for the euill disposition of some, an innocent man, deuoted vnto the studie of wisdom and learning, might be a stay both to your selfe and the whole Othoman familie. Since which time I haue euer both dutifully obeyed your commaund, and with as much care and integritie as I possibly could, discharged my charge: and in the late Persian warre raised and brought into the field mine armie, wherewith I defended the frontiers of my prouince from the incursions of the Barbarians. But after that they were vanquished, and by your forces driuen out of the lesser ASIA, and that my vnaturall and gracelesse brethren, the one of them in EUROPE, as a most desperat recreant, had in plaine battell assailed the person of your most sacred Maieslie (his reuerend father, sarre spent with age, and then greuously tormented with the gout) of purpose to haue at once deprived you both of your life and empire: and the other in ASIA seeking by like disloyaltie and most horrible treason there to possess himselfe of a kingdom, had besieged and taken prisoners his brothers sonnes your nephewes, young princes of great expectation, your faithfull and louing subiects; and proceeding further, had set all that part of your empire on a broile: I thought my selfe in dutie bound to repaire heither vnto your imperiall Maieslie, for that I saw it came to passe, not without the providence of the most mightie, that I might at such time especially request the iust reward of you my most reuerend and louing father, the most religious obseruer of equitie and iustice: when as you hauing had too great prooffe of the infidelitie of my vnaturall brethren, might most fitly and most commodiously performe that which you vpon great reason might now graunt vnto me your dutifull and obedient sonne, although my former defects had merited no such thing. Wherefore most gracious, I humbly pray and beseech you by all your fatherly loue and affection towards me, and my knowne loialtie towards you, to vouchsafe before the coming of Selymus, to haue regard of mine honour with the state of your empire: for when he shall once in armes breake in, wee will at a trice cut off all hope of pacification, and supported by the men of warre, confound all things at his pleasure: for I heare, that the very guarders of your person, and chiefe commanders of your armies, altered in disposition towards you; doe but expect the good offer of time, when they may willingly salute for their emperor and soueraigne, him, whom your good fortune of late full sore against their wils, ouerthrew in open field. Wherefore that empire whercof I was sometime possessed, and for the rare desert of mine antient loialtie towards you, is of good right due vnto me, restore to me againe whilest you may, and whilest it is yet in your power, in this suddaine and momentarie occasion now presented. For your Maieslie shall in vaine fauour my most iust and vpright claime, after that you (hauing once receiued into the imperiall citie a most desperat and ambitious man) haue for euer lost your libertie, together with your selfe.

Baiazet commaundeth Corcutus, and promiseth to restore him the empire, after that Selymus shall be put into ASIA.

Corcutus with teares standing in his eyes hauing ended his speech, the aged emperor moued with a fatherly affection, and the reasonable persuation of him, his onely loyall and most kind sonne, comforted him vp with good words, and willed him to bee of good cheere; and whichall discouered vnto him the very ground of his resolution, in calling home of Selymus: telling him farther, That he could be well content to resigne vnto him againe the empire, but that it was not in his power so presently to doe, for feare of the souldiours of the court; who had (as he said) of late withstood him in the like motion, and would againe with tooth and naile gainesay it, if he should but giue the least occasion for them to suspect any such matter: but that by the plot now laid, Selymus should vnder the title of honour be drawne out of EUROPE, together with the souldiours of the court, into ASIA against Achomates, both barres vnto his present desire for transferring of the empire; in whose absence it should bee in his power freely to dispose thereof at his pleasure: which he promised presently to resigne vnto him, so soone as they were once passed ouer into ASIA. Which thing once done, although it were not altogether to their liking, yet feared he not that either the capitaines or souldiours, who had of late so honorably and faithfully defended him against Selymus, should now for his sake dislike of Corcutus, or attempt anie thing not becoming the glorie of their late desert: but rather hoped, that if his two vnaturall and rebellious sons Achomates and Selymus, should once ioine in battell (as it was most like they would) that either the one or both should by the iust judgement of God perish for their so great disobedience, murdered by the hands one of another: Corcutus not much misliking of his fathers purpose, and resting himselfe wholly vpon his fauour, thought it not good farther to argue the matter his father had so well considered of: but taking his leaue returned to his lodging, notwithstanding his hope of obtaining the empire, and so remained many daies: after at CONSTANTINOPLE during which time he sought neither by gifts nor golden promises to procure the loue and good liking of the great Bassaes, or souldiours of the court; for that he as a plaine vpright man, thought it not good by fute and corruption (the great promotores of the vnworthie) to seeke for that at their hands, which was of right due vnto him by his fathers fauour and promise.

In the meane time Selymus his fast friends, aduertising him of the coming of Corcutus to the court, aduised him to make hast, and with all speed possible to come to CONSTANTINOPLE; for that it was to bee feared, least Baiazet being verie aged, and withall easie to be drawne away, might by the persuation of Corcutus be endued to alter, yea and perhaps quite breake off the course before well set for his most readie preferment. Vpon which newes, Selymus attentively waiting vpon nothing more than to haue access vnto his friends in court, and before resolved at his first coming thither, not to spare for anie cost in corrupting the men of warre, and so to possess himselfe of the empire: made now no stay, but with certaine troupes of horsemen commaunding the rest to follow after, came with wonderfull sceleritie to CONSTANTINOPLE. Corcutus with the great Bassaes and courtiers, and most part of the souldiours of the court, going to meet him at the gates of the citie: at his entrance receiued him with a kisse (as is the manner of the Turkes) and brought him through the midst of the citie, all the people running out by heaps to haue a sight of the man; of late in euerie mans mouth for his desperat rebellion, but now welcomed with much thundring shot in token of triumph, and the joyfull acclamation of men, women, and children, and people of all sorts. So that it easily appeared, that all the hatred before conceiued against him, for his late outrage against his father, was now quite forgotten; and that he would in short time before his other brethren aspire vnto the empire.

The next day after Selymus came to the court, and hauing access to his father, fell prostrate before him and kissed his feet, and with the greatest shew of humilitie possible, craued of him pardon for his disloyaltie. O deepe dissembler, and traitor of all others most treacherous! of late in field with sword drawn to haue slaine his aged father, but now prostrate at his feet; and within an houre, mounted perforce into his imperiall seat!

The old emperor smiling vpon this Crocodile, in most kind manner tooke him vp, and courteously said vnto him:

Thy faults sonne Selymus are so much the lesse, for that they haue found speedie repentance. The crueltie wherfore I doe the more willingly grant thee pardon: but from henceforth endeavour thy selfe, that God who hath giuen thee a notable spirit and courage, may also be thought to haue endued thee with Selymus. a good and well disposed mind. There is a martiall matter readie worthy thy hardinesse, wherein thou maiest sufficiently manifest vnto the world thy forwardnesse and courage: there when time serueth let it appeare.

Shortly after was called a counsell for the warres, but especially for the chusing of a General to go against Achomates: the honor of which place, when many would haue giuen to Selymus, he began with great dissimulation to refuse, making as though he would not in any case be preferred before his brother Corcutus, to whom he would (as he said) willingly giue place; both in respect of his years and learned discretion, who could no doubt with greater authoritie and wisdom manage that warre: as for himselfe, now he had obtained his fathers gracious pardon and fauour, he could well content himselfe with any corner of the empire, were it neuer so little.

But Corcutus and his friends, who had reposed all their hope and all their deuises in the departure of Selymus with the souldiours of the court; as if they had with great modestie contented on both sides, againe persuated him, yea and instantly requested him not to refuse that honor, nour, by generall consent without anie disgrace to his brother, giuen to him as to a worthy chief taine of greater experience in martiall affaires. So Selymus with wonderfull cunning deluding Corcutus and his fauourits, whilest he seemeth craftily to refuse the thing he most desireth, is by the generall consent of all parts, chosen Generall of the armie to go against his brother Achomates. Which was no sooner made knowne vnto the soldiours, especially the Tamizaries and other souldiours of the court; but they before instructed, with lowd acclamations saluted him; not for their Generall onely, but for their soueraigne lord and emperour also: and so without farther delay put themselves in armes to defend and make good that they had done, if anie better disposed should seeme to withstand them or dissent from them.

Selymus by the souldiours thus saluted emperour, at first made shew as if he had beene halfe vnwilling to take vpon him the empire; and so began faintly to refuse it, as moued so to doe by the due reuerence and regard of his father, yet liuing. But after a while he suffered himselfe to be entreated: and then commending himselfe and his cause wholly to the men of war, to bind them vnto him the faster, promised beside the particuler fauors he ought them, to bestow a right great and generall larges amongst them: which he afterwards accordingly performed.

After that, he requested the chiefe Bassaes and commanders of the armie there present, to go forthwith vnto his father, and to take such order (seeing it was the mind of the whole army it should be so) that the empire might by his goodwill without farther trouble or tumult, be forthwith transferred vnto him.

Mustapha the great Bassa, in whose wily head all this matter was (to his owne worthy destruction) first hammered; whether it were vpon a new fineness of his owne, or that Selymus (as it was giuen out) had threatened to kill him except he would go and shew all the whole proccesse of the matter to his father: comming as a man dismayed to Baiazet (who awaked with clamour and tumult of the souldiours was come out of his chamber into the open roomes of his pallace) in few words deliuered vnto him this most vnwelcome message as followeth:

Emperour (said he) the men of warre haue in their counsell saluted Selymus both their Generall and Emperour: which their choise they require thee to ratifie; being readie presently to breake into the court to kill vs both, if thou shalt refuse forthwith to resigne the empire. They all with one consent request that of thee, which they haue already put into the hand of another. Wherefore it is a thing of farre more danger to seeke to reuer that thou hast already lost than willingly to yeeld that which is already taken from thee, seeing it is not by anie force or pollicie to be regained. They in arms, in surie, and now entred into rebellion, thinke vpon some greater mischiefe.

Baiazet troubled with feare and choller, and then too late perceiving the treacherie of the Bassaes, and how he had been by them betrayed; pausing a while at the strangeness of the matter, afterwards in furie brake out into these words:

False and forsworne, doe you thus betray me? and with such monstrous villanie requite mine infinite bountie? Why doe you not also as murderers take away my life, which could not endure for a while to expect the dissolution of this my weake and aged bodie? but deposing your iust & lawfull soueraigne, must needs in post haste set up a most wicked and gracelesse man to raigne ouer you. But much good doe it you with your desired emperour, the contemner of God, and murderer of his father: to whom ere it be long, you shall full dearly pay the price of this your perfidious dealing and treacherie against me. And he himselfe beginning his empire of most unnaturall treason, murther, and bloodshed, shall not (I hope) escape the heauie hand of God, the vndoubted and seuerer reuenger of so great impietie and treason.

Mustapha, with Bostanges and Aiax as false as himselfe, returning backe againe to the souldiours speaking not a word of the sorrow and indignation of Baiazet; told them how that he was well content to resigne the empire, and so had appointed Selymus (vnto whom both God and the generall consent of the men of warre had already deliuered the empire) to succeed him in the empire. When this their speech was generally reported, they whom Selymus had before corrupted, began now to hold vp their heads, and looke big on the matter: and others who before stood doubtfull what to doe seeing now no other remedie, in hast joyned themselves vnto the same faction. Whilest all things were thus disorderly carried by the vnruely souldiours, Selymus was by them mounted vpon a couragious horse, and so with all pomp conducted vp and downe most of the faire streetes of the imperiall citie: and with the generall voice and clamour of the people (how soeuer their minds were for most part otherwise affected) saluted emperour. And the the same day both the great Bassaes and the soldiours in generall, were all solemnly sworne vnto Selymus, as their onely lord and emperour.

Corcutus, whether it were for greefe of his hope now lost, or for feare of his life, although Selymus had promised to giue him the citie of MYTILENE, with the Island of LESBOS, secretly embarked himselfe, and so returned to MACONESSIA.

Baiazet of late one of the greatest monarchs of the world, but now thus thrust out of his empire by his sonne, detesting both him and the treacherie of his subjects, and ouercome with sorrow and melancholie, determined of himselfe, before hee were thereto enforced by Selymus, to forsake CONSTANTINOPLE, and to retire himselfe to DIMOTICA (a small citie wholely situate in THRACIA, not farre from HADRIANOPL; where in former time he had for his pleasure bestowed great cost, & now as he thought best fitted his present estate.) Wherefore causing great store of treasure, plate, jewels, and rich furniture to be trussed vp, he with five hundred of his household seruants, full of heauinesse and sorrow, with teares trickling downe his aged cheekes, departed out of the imperiall citie towards HADRIANOPL, with purpose from thence to haue gone to DIMOTICA. Selymus brought him about two miles vpon his way, and so returning againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, tooke possession of the pallace.

Baiazet being then about seuentie six yeares old, or as some report full fourescore; and beside his old disease of the gout, fore weakened with heauinesse and greefe of mind, was not able to trauell aboute five or six miles a day, but was constrained by the extremite of his paine and weakenesse, to stay sometimes two or three dayes in a place. Whilest hee was thus trauelling, Selymus no lesse carefull of the keeping of his estate, than he had before beene for the obtaining of the same, began now to doubt, That if hee should depart from CONSTANTINOPLE, and with all his forces passe ouer into ASIA against his brother Achomates, Baiazet in the meane time might in his absence returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, and so againe possesse himselfe both of the citie and the empire. Wherefore to rid himselfe of that feare, he resolved most viper like before his going, to kill his father, and so most vnnaturally to deprive him of life of whom hee had first receiued life: such is the cruell and accursed nature of ambition, that it knoweth neither father, mother, brother, wife, kindred, or friend, no, sometimes not her owne children: the furie whereof was neuer in any one more pregnant, than in this most monstrous and cruell tyrant Selymus.

The readiest and most secret way he could deuise for the effecting of this his damnable deuise (which without great impietie could not bee so much as once by him thought vpon) was to worke it by poyson: vpon which resolution hee secretly compacted with Hamon a Iew, his fathers cheefe physition, to poyson him; promising him for his reward a pension of ten duckats a day during his life. And for that men are oftentimes with terour and feare, as well as with reuward, enforced to bee the ministers of mischeefe; hee to bee the more sure of this Iew (prone ynough for gaine to doe euill) threatened him with most cruell death, if hee did not both secretly and speedily worke this feat, commanding him so soone as he had done it to return vnto him to CONSTANTINOPLE.

The deceitfull Iew moued both with the feare of death, and hope of reuward (two great motives) comming shortly after to Baiazet, and finding him very weake, seeming to be very carefull of him, told him, That he would prepare for him a potion, which should both restore to him his health, and also strengthen his weake bodie, if it would please him to take it the next morning his health, and also strengthen his weake bodie, if it would please him to take it the next morning early lying in his bed. Baiazet nothing mistrusting his old physition: whom he had so often & so long trusted, said hee would gladly take it. Early the next morning commeth the Iew with the deadly potion in a cup of gold, Baiazet yet sleeping, which he set downe in the chaire of estate, and so stood waiting vntill the aged prince should of himselfe awake. But Baiazet still sleeping soundly (as oftentimes it chanceth when men sleepe their last) and withall somewhat longer than that the time to take the potion was almost past, and asked him if it were his pleasure then to take it. Baiazet doubting no treason, willed him to bring it: whereof when the Iew had taken the sey (hauing before himselfe taken a preseruatiue against that poyson) he gaue it to Baiazet to drinke, who cheerefully dranke it vp: the physition commanding them that waited in his bed-chamber, and attended on his person, to keepe him well couered with warme clothes, and not to giue him any thing to drinke vntill hee had well sweate. This cursed Iew hauing thus poysoned the aged prince, to auoid the danger of the fast, and to carrie the first newes thereof to Selymus, secretly conuayed himselfe away, and fled in hast to CONSTANTINOPLE. But Baiazet attained with the force of the poyson, began first to feeble most greuous gripings in his stomacke, the strong paine whereof appeared by his miserable complaining and heauie groning; in the midst of which torments he gaue vp the ghost in the yeare 1512, when he had reigned thirtie yeares. The Turkes report that he died a naturall death: but Antonius Virius, a Genoway, who at that time serued in Baiazet his chamber, and was present at his death, reporteth, That vpon his dead bodie the euident tokens of poyson were to bee scene. His dead bodie, with all his treasures were presently brought backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, and deliuered to Selymus, who caused the bodie of his father to be with the greatest solemnitie that might be, buried in a most sumptuous tombe, in a chappell neer vnto the great Mahometane temple, which he had before built for himselfe at CONSTANTINOPLE, which monument there remaineth at this day to bee scene. His seruants were all by Selymus restored to their places which they before held in the Court in the time of their old master, excepting fise of the pages of his chamber, who lamenting the death of their master about the rest, had atired themselues all in mourning apparell: for which cause, they were by the commaundement of Selymus cast in prison; where two of them were put to death, the other three at the sute of Solymán, Selymus his sonne, and of other two Bassas, were saued: but being stript of their rich apparrell, and whatsoever els they had gotten vnder Baiazet, they were enrolled for common souldiours vnder Sullustares Bassa. Of these three this Antonius Virius the Genoway (before spoken of) was one, who after ten yeares miserable captiuitie amongst the Turks, at last escaped, at such time as Selymus was by the Persian discomfited: and with much adoe returning againe into ITALIE, writ the historie of all such things as hee himselfe had there scene, with the calamities of Baiazet his house, and a great part of the tyrannous raigne of Selymus.

Hamon the false Jew (as the same author reporteth) comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, and expecting some great reward for his foule treason, by the commaundement of Selymus had his head presently stricke off: with this exprobaton of his trecherie, That oportunitie seruing, hee would not sticke for reward to doe the like against Selymus himselfe. Of this Baiazet, Iannus Vitalis writeth this Elogium:

In English thus.

Whilest that thou Baiazethest seekes of things the hidden cause,
And faine wouldst bring the Hunne and Russe vnder thy Turkish laws:
Thy sonne at home steps vp in armes against thy royall crowne,
And by false treason and deceit finds meanes to plucke thee downe.
Whereto he addeth mischeefe more, and straight without delay,
By poyson strong in glittering boule, dorth take thy life away:
The cruell viper so brings forth her foule vntimely brood,
Which eat and gnaw her bellie out, their first and poysoned food.
What things may princes hold for safe, that do great kingdomes sway?
If of their children they must stand in dread and feare alway?

Turc. Hist. lib. 1.

*En Selymus, scelere ante alios immanior, omnes: In patria, & fratrum, dirigit arma necem.
In Persas mouet inde ferox: Memphisitica regna Destruit: & Syros Æthiopsq; domat.
Hinc in Chisticolas irarum effundere fluctus, Ipsumq; imo uertere regna parat.
Cum diro victus prostermitur ulcere: Christus Scilicet est populi portus & aura sui.*

Lo Selymus, in cruelty exceeding others farre,
His father, and his brethren both, destroies with mortall warre.
The Persian fiercely he assailes: and conquers Ægypt's land:
The Sirian, and the Moore likewise, he tam'd with mightie hand.
But purposing in his mad mood, the Christians to confound,
And the memoriall of their name to roote from off the ground;
A loathsome Canker eat him vp, and brought him to his end:
Christ is to his the safest port, when he will them defend.

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE THIRD AND MOST WARLIKE EMPEROVR OF THE TURKES.

His Selymus, by fauour of the great Bassaes and men of war whom he had before corrupted, hauing depriued his father Baiazet first of the empire, and shortly after of his life also, and now fully possessed of the empire himselfe; first tooke view of the treasures which the Turkish kings and emperors his auncestors had before of long time heaped vp in great abundance: out of which hee gaue vnto the souldiours of the court two millions of duckets; and for a perpetuall remembrance of his thankfulness towards them augmented their daily wages, allowing vnto euerie horseman four aspers a day, and to euerie footman two, aboue their wonted allowance. By which exceeding bountie, he greatly assured vnto himselfe the minds of the men of warre.

Shortly after he passed ouer with a great armie into ASIA, leauing the gouernment of the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE vnto his onely sonne Solyman: and marching into GALATIA came to the citie of ANGYRA, in hope there to haue oppressed his elder brother Achomates. But he vnderstanding before of his comming, withall wisely considering how vnable he was to withstand his forces, fled before into the mountaines of CAPADOCIA vpon the confines of ARMENIA, taking vp men by the way as he went, and praying aid of all sorts of people, yea euen of such as were but of small abilitie themselves, and vnto him meere strangers; that so hee might in best manner he could, provide such strength as might serue him to make head against his brother, and for the recouerie of ASIA.

Selymus hauing spent that sommer without doing anie thing worth the speaking of, and considering that he could not well winter in that cold country neere vnto the great mountaine TAVRVS, by reason of the deepe snowes and extreame cold there vsually falling; and that to go farther was to no purpose, forasmuch as Achomates flying from place to place and mountaine to mountaine was not to be surprised, he retired backe againe into BITHYNIA, and sending his European horsemen downe towards the sea coast, and the Ianizaries to CONSTANTINOPLE; re-solued to winter with the rest of his army at PRUSA. At which time being wholly bent against Achomates his competitor of the empire, he for certaine yeares continued the league which his father Baiazet had before concluded with Vladislaus king of HUNGARIE, Sigismundus king of POLONIA, and the Venetians. And thinking no care (no not of children) superfluous which might concerne the establishing of his empire, he called vnto him fure of his brothers sons, Orchanes the sonne of Alem Schach; Mahometes the sonne of Tzihan Schach; Orchanes, Emir of Musa, the sonnes of his brother Mahometes; all young princes of great hope, of yeares betwixt sixteene and twentie, excepting Musa who was not past seauen yeares old: of all these Mahometes (whom his vnckle Achomates had a little before taken prisoner at LARENDA, as is before declared, and vpon the death of Baiazet had againe set him at libertie) being about twentie yeares old, was for rare feature and princely courage accounted the paragon and beautie of the the Othoman family: Which great perfection as it woon vnto him the loue and fauour of the men of warre, and also of all the people in generall: so did it hasten his speedie death; onely Selymus his cruell vnckle enuying him life. After he had got these poore innocents into his hands, he sent for diuers of his great doctors and lawyers, demanding of them, Whether it were not better that some five, eight, or ten persons should be taken away, than that the state of the whole empire should with great effusion of blood be rent in sunder, and so by ciuile warres be brought in danger of viter ruine and destruction? Who although they well perceiued whereunto that bloodie question tended, yet for feare of displeasure they all answered, That it were better such a small number should perishe, than that the whole state of the empire should by ciuile warre and discord be brought to confusion; in which generall calamitie those few must also of necessitie perishe with the rest. Vpon colour of this answer and the necessitie pretended, he commaunded these his nephewes before named, to be led by five of his great captaines into the castle of PRVSA, where they were all the night following most cruelly strangled. It is reported, that Mahometes with a penknife slew one of the bloodie executioners sent into his chamber to kill him; and so wounded the other, as that he fell downe for dead: and that Selymus being in a chamber fast by, and almost an eyewitnesse of that was done, presently sent in others, who first bound the poore prince, and afterward strangled him with the rest: whose dead bodies were buried at PRVSA amongst their auncestours. The crueltie of this fact wonderfully offended the minds of most men, insomuch that many euen of his martiall men filled with secret indignation, for certaine daies absented themselves from his presence, shunning his sight as if hee had beene some fierce or raging lyon.

Selymus seeketh after the liues of Amurat and Aladin, the sons of Achomates his brother.

Of all the nephewes of old Baiazer, onely Amurat and Aladin (the sons of Achomates) yet remained, whom he purposed to surpriſe vpon the sudden, and so to rid himselfe of all feare of his brothers children; hauing then left none of the Othoman familie, but them and his two brethren vpon whom to exercise his further crueltie. These two young princes had a little before recouered the cite of AMASIA, from whence they were the Sonimer before expelled by their vnckle Selymus, at such time as Achomates their father was glad to flie into the mountaines of CAPADOCIA. Selymus fully resolved vpon their destruction, sent Vfegi one of his Bassas with five thousand horsemen, who by great iourneys traueilling to AMASIA, might vpon the sudden come vpon these two young princes, and take them altogether vntrouided and as then fearing no such danger: which was thought no great matter for the Bassa to doe, forasmuch as he might with his light horsemen easily preuent the fame of his comming; and the cite of AMASIA where they lay, was neither well walled, nor as then furnished with any sufficient garrison for defence thereof: beside that, Achomates himselfe was at that time absent, busied in taking vp of souldiours vpon the frontiers of CARAMANNIA. But Mustapha the old Bassa, by whose especiall meanes Selymus had obtained the empire (as is before declared in the life of Baiazer) being priuie vnto his wicked purpose, and now in mind altogether alienated from him, detesting his most execrable tyrannie, both for the vnworthy death of Baiazer his father, and the guilefull bloud of so many young princes his nephewes by him shed without all pitie; and hauing compasſion of the imminent danger whereinto these two brethren were now like also to fall; by secret and speedie messengers gaue them warning of the comming of the Bassa, and of all that was intended against them. Who vpon such knowledge giuen, presently aduertised Achomates their father thereof, and laid secret ambush themselves for the intercepting of their enemies. So that within few daies after, the Bassa comming with his horsemen towards AMASIA, fell before he was aware into the midst of his enemies: at which time also Achomates following him at the heeles, so shut him in with his armie on euery side, that most of his men being slaine, he himselfe with diuers other captaines were taken prisoners and brought to Achomates, and by his commaundement committed to safe custodie.

Now it fortuned, that some of Achomates souldiours scoffing at the prisoners whom they had taken, told them how they had beene deceiued, and how all the matter had beene carried (so hard a thing it is to haue euen the greatest counsels in court kept secret) boasting that they wanted not their friends, euen of such as were most inward with Selymus, who secretly fauoured the better cause, and would not long suffer the cruell beast to rage further: All which things Selymus his souldiours reported againe after they were rauensomed and returned home. But Vfegi the Bassa lying still in prison, and getting certaine knowledge of the whole matter, by secret letters gaue

Selymus to vnderstand, that Mustapha the great Bassa whom he most of all trusted, had secret intelligence with Achomates, and had beene the only cause of the losse of his armie.

Selymus of late enuying at the great honour and authoritie of Mustapha, and wishing him dead (whose desert he was not able, or at leastwise not willing to requite) caused him vpon this accusation without farther triall to be secretly strangled in his owne sight, and his dead bodie (as Mustapha Bassa shamefully murdered) to be cast out into the street for euery man to gaze vpon. This was the shamefull end of this traiterous Bassa, who had of long time at his pleasure commaunded all things in the Turkish empire, and was for riches, power, and authoritie, next vnto the emperours themselves: but now lieth as a dead dog in the street, no man daring for feare to cast earth vpon him. A rare spectacle of the vncertaintie of worldly felicitie, and a worthy example of disloyaltie. But Achomates hearing what had hapned to Mustapha, in reuenge thereof in like manner executed Vfegi Bassa his prisoner; and according to his curcious nature set all the rest of the prisoners at libertie.

Vfegi Bassa put to death.

Selymus thirsting after nothing more than the guilefull bloud of his brethren and nephewes, vpon whom he had against all right vsurped the kingdome, whereof he neuer thought himselfe sufficiently assured so long as any of them breathed: began with the first of the Spring, to deuise with himselfe how he might first take away his brother Corcutus, who then liued at MAGNESIA, and hauing cast off all hope of the empire, gaue himselfe wholly to the studie of philosophie, which he (seduced with ambition) had in euill time a little before forsaken; but now retiring himselfe thereto againe, as to his greatest contentment, spent his time in quiet contemplation, not attempting any thing against his cruell brother vsurping the empire. Selymus resolved vpon the destruction of this harmlesse prince, suddenly commaunded his captaines to make choise often thousand horsemen to be in readinesse within three daies, giuing it out that hee would make an inroad vpon the sudden into CAPADOCIA. In the number of these horsemen Antonius Marinus a Genoway, author of this historie (as he reporteth of himselfe) was one.

All things being in readinesse against the appointed time, Selymus in person himselfe set forward with his armie from PRVSA, still keeping the way on the right hand; so that the souldiours who thought they should haue marched directly into CAPADOCIA and so to AMASIA, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceiue by the contrarie course they held, that they were to go for LYDIA and IONIA. When a valiant souldiour among the rest, who had sometime serued one of the Bassas in Corcutus his court, by diuers circumstances gathering the intention of Selymus, secretly conuained himselfe out of the armie; and being excellently well mounted, taking the neereſt way, came to MAGNESIA and gaue Corcutus warning of the comming of his brother. Corcutus considering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the messenger; and leauing his house in such order as it was wont to be, fled with two of his seruants to the sea side, in hope to haue found passage either into CRETE, or else to the RHODES.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the morning came Selymus to the castle of MAGNESIA before the rising of the sunne, in hope to haue found Corcutus yet in his bed: but being deceiued of his expectation, he fell into a great rage, and with cruell torments examined all his brothers seruants & eunuchs, What was become of him and where he had hid himselfe: and with much adoe got it out of them, That he had warning of his comming by a fugitiue souldiour, and was thereupon fled; but whither they knew not. Wherefore Selymus staid there six daies, and was thereupon fled; but whither they knew not. Wherefore Selymus staid there six daies, during which time he caused diligent search to be made all ouer the countrey, and alongſt the sea coast for to haue apprehended him. But when after much search he could heare no tidings of him, he caused all his brothers treasure and rich furniture to be trussed vp, and to be sent by sea to CONSTANTINOPLE. So leauing one of his captaines with a thousand horsemen in garrison at MAGNESIA, he returned againe to PRVSA with as much speed as he came from thence: verily supposing that his brother was for safegard of his life, by sea fled into ITALIE. All this while Bostanges, Selymus his sonne in law, lying with a fleet of gallies vpon the coast of IONIA, had taken from Corcutus all hope of escaping by sea: so that he was faine to hide himselfe in a caue neere vnto the sea side not farre from SMYRNA, liuing in hope that after a few daies the fleet would depart, and so he should find some opportunitie to escape.

After he had thus a great while in feare most miserably liued with countie crabs, and other like wild fruit (a poore diet for a man of state) and was with extreame necessitie enforced to send his man for reliefe to a poore shepherds cottage therby, he was by a country peasant discouered to Casumes, who with too much diligence sought after his life: and being by him apprehended, was carried towards the tyrant his brother at P R V S A.

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking: who as soone as he vnderstood that he was within a daies journey of P R V S A, sent one Kirengen-ogli (who of his squint looke was called Chior Zeinall) to strangle him vpon the way, and to bring his dead bodie to P R V S A.

This captaine comming to Corcutus in the dead time of the night, and awaking him out of his sleepe, told him his heauie message; how that he was sent from his brother Selymus to see him executed, which must as he said presently be done. Corcutus exceedingly troubled with these heauie newes, and fetching a deepe sigh, desired the captaine so long to spare his life, vntill hee might write a few short lines vnto his brother Selymus. Which poore request being granted, he called for pen and paper, and readily in Turkish verse (for he had spent all his time in studie) reprooued his brother of most horrible crueltie; vpbraiding him, that he had not onely most disloyally thrust his father out of his empire, but also most vnnaturally deprived him of life, of whom he had before receiued the same: and not so content, had most tyrannously slaine his brothers children; and now like an vnmmercifull wretch thirsted after the guiltlesse blood of himselfe, and Achomates his brethren. At last concluding his letters with many a bitter curse, he besought God to take of him iust reuenge for so much innocent blood by him most vnnaturally spilt. And when he had thus much written, he requested the captaine, that it might together with his dead bodie be deliuered vnto Selymus. So without any farther delay he was according to the tyrants commaund presently strangled. The next day after, when the dead bodie was presented vnto Selymus, he vncouered the face thereof to be sure that it was he, and seeing a paper in his hand, tooke it from him: but when he had read it (for all his cruell nature and stony heart) he burst out into teares; protesting, that he was neuer so much grieved or troubled with any mans death as with his: for which cause, he commaunded generall mourning to be made for him in the court, and with princely solemnitie buried his bodie. Three daies after, he caused fiftene of those diligent searchers who first found Corcutus, to haue their heads struck off, and their bodies to be flung into the sea, saying, That if he were by any extremitie driuen to flie and hide his head, they would not stick to serue him in like manner as they had done his brother.

Now of all the posteritie of Baiazet remained none aliue to trouble the cruel tyrants thoughts but only Achomates and his two sons: who vpon the approach of the Spring, set forward with his armie from A M A S I A, excited by the often letters of his friends, who assured him that Selymus might vpon the sudden be easily oppressed, if hee would with all expedition come to P R V S A; forasmuch as the Ianizaries and European horsemen, the vndoubted strength of his armie, were at that time absent, and he himselfe as one hated both of God and man, could not in so sudden and v unexpected danger tell what he were best to doe, or which way to turne himselfe: wherefore they willed him without delay to hasten his comming, and not to expect the milder weather of the Spring, least in the meane time Selymus should call together his dispersed forces: God (they said) did oftentimes offer vnto men, both the opportunitie and means to doe great matters, if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he should do well now by celeritie & courage to seeke to better his euill fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his fathers kingdom: for if Sommer were once come on, he must either gaine the victorie by plain battell, which would be a hard matter, or else get him packing out of C A P A D O C I A and all A S I A the lesse.

Achomates, who before had promised vnto himselfe better successe, as well for the great strength he had of his owne, as for the new supply of horsemen he had procured from Hysmaell the Persian king; but especially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late crueltie, should in the time of the battell be forsaken of his owne fouldiours; yeelded to the persuasion of his friends, who with many pleasing words set before his eies glorious things, easie to be spoken, but hard to be effected. Wherefore, when he was come into G A L A T I A with somewhat more than fiftene thousand horsemen, hauing for hast left his footmen by easie marches to come after him: Selymus aduertised of his comming, by speedie messengers sent for his horsemen to P R V S A. In the meane time whiles he is leuying other common fouldiours, and respecting the rest of his forces; fortune, which alwaies fauoured his attempts, did then also auert the danger prepared for him by the vnfaithfulnesse of his followers, and shewed vnto him the open way to victorie. For Achomates secret friends which were in Selymus his campe, continuing sinne in their good will towards him, did earnestly by letters perswade him (being already set forward, ward, and now come as farre as P A P H L A G O N I A) to make hast, and to come before Selymus his forces were come together: for that he had sent for the Ianizaries and European horsemen, and did with all speed and diligence make all the preparation hee could possibly; which for all that would all come too late, if he should vpon the suddaine come vpon him before hee were provided. Which letters being by chance intercepted, gaue Selymus certaine knowledge both of his brothers purpose and comming, together with the treason entended against him by his owne seruants: wherefore executing them who had writ those letters, he in their names caused others to the same effect to be written to Achomates, perswading him with all speed possible to come still on, and not to stay for his footmen, for that Selymus might easily bee oppressed with a few troupes of horsemen, if Achomates would with speed but come & shew himselfe vnto his friends and fauourites: who vpon the first signall of battaile would raise a tumult in the armie, and vpon the suddain kill Selymus, vnaduisedly going too and fro in the battaile. Which letters so written, Selymus caused to be signed with the seales of them whom he had before executed, & found means to haue them cunningly deliuered to Achomates, as if they had been sent from his friends: who giuing credit to the same, and presuming much vpon his owne strength, doubted not to leaue his footmen, who followed easily after him, vnder the conduct of Amurath his sonne; and came and encamped with his horsemen neere vnto the mountain H O R M I N I V S, vpon the bank of the riuer Parthemius. Selymus also departed from P R V S A, and hauing receiued into his armie ten thousand Ianizaries (but a little before come ouer the strait) sent before Sinan Bassa, Gemie tenthousand Ianizaries (but a little before come ouer the strait) sent before Sinan Bassa, Gemie tenthousand Ianizaries, to know & make prooue of the strength of his enemies. The Bassa nerall of his Asian horsemen, to know & make prooue of the strength of his enemies. The Bassa not knowing as yet where Achomates lay, neither of what force he was, being deceived by the darkenesse of the morning, fell into a place of disaduantage, where he was set vpon by Achomates, and hauing lost seuen thousand of his men, was glad with other eight thousand which were left, to flie backe vnto Selymus.

For all this losse, was not Selymus discomfited, or doubtfull of the victorie, but forthwith marched on forward to the riuer Elata, which runneth directly out of the mountaine H O R M I N I V S into P O N T V S, watering most large fields vpon the right hand, which at this day are called the plaines of the new land. So did Achomates also, who although he knew his brother to be every way too strong for him: yet being encouraged with the late victorie, and in hope that in his friends in Selymus his armie (whom he vainely supposed to haue bene yet liuing) would in the very battaile doe some notable matter for him, and that victorie would follow his just quarrell; resolved neither to retire backe, neither to expect the comming of the rest of his armie. The riuer was betwixt the two campees, and the number of both armies certainly discovered: yet could not Achomates (to whom the open fields offered a safe retreat vnto the rest of his armie) possessed with a fatall madnesse, be perswaded (considering the greatnesse of the danger) in time to provide for the safetie of himselfe and his armie, carried headlong (as it seemed) by incuitable destinie to his fatall destruction, which presently after ensued.

Selymus a little before the going downe of the Sun, with his armie passed ouer the riuer Elata, and gaue generall commaundement through all his campe, that euery man against the next day should bee readie for battaile: and in a wood not far off placed a thousand horsemen in ambush, vnder the leading of Canoglis his wiues brother, a valiant young gentleman, whom his father had a little before sent from T A V R I C A vnto his sonne in law with a chosen companie of Tartarian horsemen: vnto him Selymus gaue in charge, that when the battaile was joyned, he should shew himselfe with his horsemen vpon the backe of his enemies, and there to charge them.

As soone as it was day, Selymus in a great open field put his armie in order of battaile, placing his horsemen in two wings, so that all his pearemen were in the right wing, and the archers and carbines in the left: in the maine battaile stood the Ianizaries with the rest of the footmen. On the other side Achomates, hauing no footmen, deuided his horsemen into two wings also.

Whilest both armies stood thus ranged, expecting but the signall of battaile, a messenger came from Achomates to Selymus, offering in his masters name, to trie the equitie of their quarrell in plaine combat hand to hand: which if he should refuse, he then tooke both God & the world to witnesse, that Selymus was the onely cause of all the guiltlesse blood to be shed in the battaile, and not he: whereunto Selymus answered, that he was not to trie his quarrell at the appointment of Achomates: and though he could be content so to doe, yet would not his soldiors suffer him so to aduenture his person and their owne safetie: and so with that answer returned the messenger

Achomates hauing receiued this answer, without further delay charged the right wing of his brothers armie, who valiantly receiued the first charge: but when they were come to the sword, and that the matter was to be tried by handie blowes, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Persian horsemen; who being well armed both horse and man, had before requested to be placed in the foremost ranks, by whose valour the right wing of Selymus his armie was disordered, and not without great losse enforced to retire backe vpon their fellows. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all meanes to encourage them againe, and presently brought on the left wing with their arrowes and pistols, in stead of them that were fled: and at the same time came on with the Ianizaries also, who with their shot enforced Achomates his horsemen to retire. Achomates himselfe carefully attending euery danger, with greater courage than fortune came in with fresh troupes of horsemen, by whose valour the battell before declining was againe renewed, and the victorie made doubtfull: but in the furie of this battell whilst he was bearing all downe before him, and now in great hope of the victorie, Canoglu with his Tartarian horsemen rising out of ambush, came behind him, and with great outcries caused their enemies then in the greatest heat of their fight to turne vpon them: at which time also the footmen standing close together assailed them afront, and the horsemen whom the Persians had at first put to flight, now moued with shame, were againe returned into the battaile: so that Achomates his small armie was beset, and hardly assailed on euery side. In fine his ensignes being overthrowne, and many of his men slaine, the rest were faine to betake themselves to flight. Where Achomates hauing lost the field, and now too late seeking to saue himselfe by flight, fell with his horse into a ditch, which the raine falling the day before, had filled with water and myre: and being there knowne and taken by his enemies, could not obtaine so much fauour at their hands as to bee presently slaine, but was referred to the farther pleasure of his cruell brother. Selymus vnderstanding of his taking, sent Kirengen (the same squint-eyed captain which had before strangled Corentus) who with a bow string strangled him also. His dead bodie was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterwards by his commaundement in royall manner buried with his ancestors in PRVSA.

Now Amurat, Achomates his sonne, vnderstanding vpon the way by the Persian horsemen (who ferred together, had againe made themselves way through the Turkes armie) of the losse of the field and the taking of his father, returned backe againe to AMASIA: and there after good deliberation, resolved with his brother to betake themselves both to flight: he with the Persian horsemen passing ouer the riuer Euphrates, fled vnto Hysmaell the Persian king: but Aladin the younger brother passing ouer the mountaine AMANVS in CILICIA, fled into SIRIA, and so to Campson Gaurus the great Sultan of ÆGYPT.

After this victorie, Selymus hauing in short time and with little trouble brought all the lesser ASIA vnder his obedience, and there at his pleasure disposed of all things, determined to haue returned to CONSTANTINOPLE: but vnderstanding that the plague was hot there, hee changed his purpose, and passing ouer at CALLIPOLIS and so traueilling through GRECIA, came to HADRIANOPLE, where hee spent all the rest of that Summer, and all the Winter following: and afterward when the mortalitie was ceased, returned to CONSTANTINOPLE; where it was found, that an hundred and threescore thousand had there died of the late plague.

Hysmaell the Persian king, whose fame had then filled the world, hearing of the arrivall of Amurat, sent for him, and demanded of him the cause of his comming. The distressed young prince, who but of late had lost his father, together with the hope of so great an empire, &c. now glad for safeguard of his life to flee into strange countries, oppressed with sorrow, by his heauie countenance and abundance of teares, more than by words, expressed the cause of his comming: yet in short strained speech, declared vnto him, how that his father, his vncle, with the rest of his cousins, all princes of great honour, had of late beene cruellly murdered by the vnnmercifull tyrant Selymus: who with like furie sought also after the life of himselfe and his brother, the poore remainders of the Othoman familie, who to saue their liues, were both glad to flee, his brother into ÆGYPT, and himselfe to the feet of his imperiall maiestie.

Hysmaell moued with compassion, and deeming it a thing well becomming the greatnesse of his fame, to take the poore exiled prince into his protection and to giue him releefe, willed him to be of good comfort, and promised him aid. And the more to assure him thereof, shortly after gaue him one of his owne daughters in marriage. For it was thought, that if Selymus for his tyrannie become odious to the world, should by any means miscarie (as with tyrants it commonly falleth out) that then in the Othoman familie, sore shaken with his vnnaturall crueltie, none was to be preferred before this poore prince Amurat: besides that, it was supposed, that if hee should inuade him with an armie out of PERSIA, that vpon the first sight, all the lesser ASIA, mourning for the vnworthie death of Achomates, would at once reuolt from him, who for his crueltie and shamefull murders had worthely deserued to bee hated together both of God and man.

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hysmaell furnished Amurat his new sonne in law with ten thousand horsemen, willing him to passe ouer the riuer of Euphrates at ARSENAGA, and to enter into CAPADOCIA, as well to make prooue how the people of that countrey were affected towards him, as of the strength of the enemy: after whom he sent Vsta-Ogli, the most famous cheefestaine amongst the Persians, with twentie thousand horsemen more, with charge, That he should still follow Amurat within one dayes journey: and he himselfe with a farre greater power stayed behind in ARMENIA, doubting to want victuall if he should haue led so great an armie through those vast barren and desolate places, whereby hee must of necessity passe.

Amurat marching through the lesser ARMENIA, and entering into the borders of CAPADOCIA, had diuers townes yielded vnto him by his friends; some others hee tooke by force, which he either sacked or els quite rased; and brought such a generall feare vpon the inhabitants of the province, that the people submitting themselves vnto him all the way as he went, it was thought he would haue gone directly to AMASIA, had not Chendemus (an old warlike captain) whom Selymus had left for his lieutenant at ASIA, with a great armie come to meet him at SABASTIA, which at this day is called SIVAS. This Chendemus had also long before aduertised Selymus both of the preparation and comming of the Persians, as soone as hee had learned by his espials that they were passed the riuer Euphrates. Vpon which news Selymus came presently ouer into ASIA, and commaunding all his forces to meet together at PRVSA, had with wonderful celeritie leuied thereabout fortie thousand common souldiours. Which so soone as Amurat vnderstood, as well by such prisoners as he had taken, as by aduertisement from his friends, although he was very desirous to haue fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus should with his wonted celeritie come against him, he should be entangled in the straits of the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, he retired backe againe to Vsta-Ogli. But Selymus who all that yeare had in his haughtie thoughts been plotting some such notable exploit as were worthie his greatness, standing in doubt whether he should by sea and land inuade HUNGARIE, the RHODES, or ITALIE, at that time sore shaken with ciuile wars: hauing now so fit an occasion giuen him by the Persian (to the great joy of all Christendome) conuerted himselfe wholly vnto the East, and in thirte dayes march came to ARSENAGA. Where joyning his armie with Chendemus, and in thirte dayes march came to ARSENAGA. Where joyning his armie with Chendemus, when he vnderstood that his enemies hauing harried the countrey, were againe retired; prickt forward with the greefe of the iniurie, and desite of reuenge, with hope of victorie hee resolved to follow after them foot by foot, and forthwith to enter into ARMENIA the greater, the principall province of the Persian kingdom.

But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in counsell propounded by them which had best knowledge of those countries, were great and many, all which by his owne good hap and inuincible courage, hee himselfe afterwards overcame: for the souldiours which had in short time already marched by land out of ILLYRIA, EPHRS, and MACEDONIA, into CAPADOCIA, must of necessity in this long expedition take vpon them new labours: they were to endure the sharpe and pinching cold of the huge mountaine TAVRVS, and by and by after the most vehement and scorching heat in the plaines of ARMENIA the lesser, with extreme thirst, hunger, and most desperate want of all things; and well the more, for that the Persians in their retreat spoiling the countrey as they went, had vtterly destroyed all that might serue for the vse of man, of purpose to leaue nothing vnto their enemies, but want of all things, if they should pursue them: besides that, his most expert captaines stood in no small doubt of the pettie princes of ARMENIA the lesse, and the mountaine king Aladenles, whom they were to leaue be- hind them at their backs, without any great assurance of their friendship, who they well knew would faile them, if any thing should happen otherwise than well to Selymus, either in battaile, mountaine PERIARDO. This great mountaine, famous by the rising of two great and notable rivers out of it, is for the wonderfull fertilitie of all things, of the barbarous people called LI PRVS, which is to say, fruitfull: for Euphrates and Araxis there running out of two diuerse and contrarie marshes, with many armies, water and enrich that champaine and drie country: Selymus hauing made so great a journey, and yet not able so much as by report to vnderstand what was become of Hyfmaell his great and populous armie, which he knew was but a little before departed out of CAPADOCIA: as a man in doubt, and halfe afraid, stayed and encamped his armie at the head of the riuer Euphrates: and from thence sent out his scouts euery way, if happily they could intercept some which might giue him knowledge of his enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for feare of the comming of the Turks, or that Hyfmaell their king had so commaunded, were all before fled out of that part of the countrey whereby Selymus was to passe with his armie, and hauing forsaken their houses, had carried away with them, or els by fire destroyed whatsoeuer might serue for the vse of man.

Selymus sendeth out his scouts, who returne with bad news.

The Turkish scouts after they had by the space of two dayes scoured vp and downe the countrey, returned backe againe to Selymus, not hauing taken so much as any one mans shewing vnto him; that all things were destroyed before him, and nothing left but wide fields and a most desolate countrey, without any appearance of man or beast: and that they were of opinion, that either their Armenian guides were deceived in the way, or els had of purpose brought them into such desert places, whereas wanting pasture for their horses, and food for men, they must needs together perish with hunger. Which their present feare was greatly encreased by the weak kings whom they had left behind them at their backes; but especially Aladeules, who either for shame or feare had a few dayes at the first holpen the Turks with victuals, but after they were further entered into ARMENIA, performed nothing of that hee had before most faithfully promised: seeking therein the fauour of Hyfmaell, who hee thought would with the same good fortune vanquish the Turks, that he had not long before the greatest part of the East. Selymus perplexed in mind, began now to suspect treason, to feare famine, to dread the deserts and forsaken places, and with greefe of mind to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithfull counsellour had before most truly told him: for all that, he shewed himselfe vnto his souldiours with cheerefull countenance, as a man nothing dismayed: which his firme constancie seemed to promise vnto their discouraged minds good successe, with speedie victorie. Wherefore calling vnto him his guides, and such as best knew the countrey; and vnderstanding by them, that on the right hand beyond the mountaine PERIARDO lay the most fruitfull countrey of all ARMENIA, hee with his armie, and compassing the hill toward the North, turned downe toward the riuer Araxes, and about the citie of COY passed his armie ouer the riuer, his footmen by little bridges, and his horsemen by foords: for Araxes, vntill it haue receiued such riuers as fall into it out of the marshes of the PERIARDO, runneth but with a small streame, and is in some place easie to be passed ouer.

Selymus passeth ouer Araxes.

Selymus had scarcely well got ouer the riuer, and encamped his armie; when Vsta-Ogli, who hauing joynd his forces with Amurath, lying encamped not farre off; and fearing least the citie of COY and the vnprovided citifens should by the sudden comming of the enemy be oppressed, quickly rife with his armie, and set forwards to meet with the Turks: for that citie of all others in that countrey, for fresh fountaines and riuers most pleasant, wherein the Persian kings for the great plentie of all manner of fruit, and wholesomenesse of the aire, leauing TAVRIS, were wont to spend most part of the Summer, had then in it many rich citifens and sumptuous buildings; which Vsta-Ogli thought good betimes to rescue, and not with dishonour to loose that rich citie, looking as it were vpon it, and leauing it vnto the enemy, to suffer him there to refresh his hunger-starued souldiours with plentie of all things: Cassinus an Armenian boine, and present in those warres, did by many probabilities (as Iouius writeth) shew vnto him, that this citie of COY was in ancient time that most famous citie called ARTAXATA, which Domitius Corbulo destroyed. Neither did Hyfmaell himselfe (although he had but a little before sent the greatest part of his forces against the Coraxeni, who were then risen vp against him in rebellion; as he made no great reckoning of the Turks, or euer thought that they durst haue come so farre into ARMENIA) make any delay, but forthwith, as soone as he had heard of the comming of Selymus, came also in person himselfe vnto his armie.

By chance Vsta-Ogli (who contrarie to all mens expectation had vntill then shunned to fight, or come in sight of his enemies, of purpose with lesse danger and losse of men, to ouerthrow them afterwards, being sore weakened and almost spent with long trauell and want of victuals) lay then encamped neere the citie, when as the Turkes scouts, vpon the comming of Hyfmaell, perceiued by the great rising of the dust, and by the neighing of the Persian horses, that some greater power was at hand. Which so soone as it was noised in the Turkish campe, they began to reioice exceedingly, and to conceiue the first hope both of their safetie and victorie; glad, that now meeting with their enemies, they should either by victorie turne their labour, toile, famine, and extremities wherewith they had of long time stricken, into ease and plentie of all things, or els by honourable death end all their miseries at once: for many of the horsemen, especially of them that came out of EVR OPE, whose horses were starued for want of forrage, and the common footmen spent with long trauell, & greuously troubled with the flix (who traueilling in the extreame heat of the Sunne, had for most part liued vpon crabs and other wild fruits, with a bad supping made of meale and vineger, and almost despairing to get the sight of their enemies) began now to die in euery corner.

Hyfmaell as soone as he was come within sight of his enemies, reposing great confidence as well in the valour of his souldiours as in his owne rare fortune, the more to terrifie them, thought it good forthwith to giue them battaile: whereupon he sent an herald vnto Selymus, accompanied with certaine skilfull souldiours, which should in best sort they could take view of the number and force of their enemies, of their artillerie, and in what sort they lay encamped: and to tell him, That for as much as hee had no title vnto ARMENIA, nor that the Turkes had at any time claimed any interest therein, he could not but maruell, why he had against all right entered with his armie into his dominion: but if hee happily vpon a vaine presumption, to the imitation of Alexander of MACEDON, should thinke so much of the world his owne as hee could by the sword and his owne fortune win, hee should then make himselfe readie against the next day to make proofe of his owne fortune and the forces of others, not inferiour to his owne.

Whereunto Selymus answered, That the fresh remembrance of the manifold injuries done to the Turkes by the Persians, was such, as might giue him just cause to take vp armes: for as much as long agoe both his grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his vnckle Cassimes, and euen of late his father Baiazet, and he himselfe also in his warres against his brother Achomates, had receiued great wrong and dishonour from the Persians. All which things, although they were of themselves important, yet he esteemed not of them as sufficient causes of warre, but only sought after his enemy Amurath, his brothers sonne, who had of late spoiled CAPADOCIA: whom if he would quietly and friendly deliuer vnto him, as the mutuall lawes of amitie and friendship amongst princes for the maintenance and preseruacion of their estates and kingdomes required, then hee would withdraw his forces, and peaceably returne into his kingdom: otherwise, hee threatened with fire and sword to destroy, not the frontiers of ARMENIA, but euen the heart of PERSIA. And so dismissing the herald, both the armies for that day lay still in their trenches, expecting the dreadfull euent of battaile.

The next day Selymus by perswasion of his captaines brought his armie into the open field, and in order of battaile set forward against his enemies, which lay about two miles off, thinking that Hyfmaell, a prince of so great name, would without delay accept of battaile: yet what strength the Persian king was of, what number of men he had, what manner of horsemen, how armed, and with what weapons, hee could not certainly learne: for beside that the Persians are by nature ingenious and subtil, the souldiours generally so reuerenced and loued Hyfmaell their king, that no one was found to haue gone from him to the Turke; whereas many reuolted from Selymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Persian captiues.

Selymus, who had at that time fourescore thousand horsemen vnder his ensignes, placed Cassinus his lieutenant Generall of EVR OPE, with his European horsemen in the right wing; and Sinan Bassa with his Asian horsemen in the left: and before them both, the Acanziz (which are voluntarie horsemen, the forerunners of the Turkes armie) who in hope of spoyle follow the Turkes warres out of all countries: in the middle battaile hee placed the Asapi or common souldiours; which bare and halfe-naked people, as men of little worth or estimation, are commonly thrust into the front of the Turkes battailes, to receiue the first furie of the enemy, and to blunt their swords, more than for any other good seruice: directly behind them he bestowed his great artillerie, guarded with foure thousand horsemen: last of all followed himselfe with his his chosen pentioners and Ianizaries compassed about with small field-peece and his carriages, as with a double trench: for hee had (as their manner is) so enuironned himselfe round with his saddled cammels, made fast one to another with long chaines, that they stood him in stead of a strong trench, from whence he might speedily relieue any part of his distressed armie; and in case of extremitie, being in the middle of his strength, he might as out of a sure fortresse represse the furious assault of his enemies. Hee also commaunded his footmen in the vauward of his battaile, that vpon the approach of the enemies horsemen they should speedily withdraw themselves aside into two parts, leauing space for the great ordinance which was placed behind them to play in the middle betweene them. On the contrarie part, Hyfmaell, who by the Turkes fugitiues vnderstood all the deuises of his enemies, calling vnto him the cheefe commanders of his armie, shewed vnto them, that there was no doubt of the victorie, so that they could shun the furie of the great artillerie: which he assured them would easily be done, if when they saw the Turkish footmen deuide themselves, they would also in like manner withdraw themselves into two parts, and giue place to the furie of the great ordinance: for which purpose hee caused two great ensignes to be displayed, wherunto they should at the time appointed retire, the one for himselfe and those whom he conducted, the other for Vita-Ogli, and the rest of his armie.

Hyfmaell (as Iouius reporteth) had in his armie about thirtie thousand horsemen, without any footmen, amongst whom were ten thousand men at armes, resolute gentlemen, of great experience, all gallantly mounted vpon courageous barbed horses, and themselves brauely armed both for the shew and the terrour of the enemy; their weapons were a good lance, a sure scimitar, and a horsemans mace: the rest were armed with strong cuirasses and headpeece, and were either archers on horsebacke, or else vsed light horsemens stauces, made of Ash after the Spanish fashion, wherewith they ferued at the halfe staffe. As for gunnes they had none, in which thing onely, and number of men, they were inferior to the Turkes. But such was the inuincible courage and noble minds of the Persians, that condemning the huge multitude of their enemies (who were in number about three hundred thousand) & making no great reckoning of the great artillerie, they doubted not with so few to giue them battaile.

Hyfmaell hauing giuen the signall of battaile, came on with his armie, exhorting his souldiers then to remember the honour they had long before gotten in many battailes, and courageously to follow him their soueraigne, whom they by their worthie seruice and many victories, had made the greatest monarch of the East, telling them, that they should haue now to do but with naked men, whose weapons were but weake stauces and light targuets, and their horses little poore jades, almost dead with hunger, neuer able to abide the first charge of his valiant men at armes.

On the other side, Selymus perceiuing the comming of his enemies by the rising of the dust, caused knowledge to be giuen through his armie by his captaines and officers, that the time of battaile which they had so long wished for, was now come; wherein if they would worthily acquite themselves against those their proud enemies, they should to their immortall fame extend the Turkish empire from the Persian sea vnto the mountaine Caucasus: but if they cowardly forgetting their ancient prowesse, should faint in the time of the battaile, they were not then to thinke by any meanes to escape by flight backe againe through those great plaines and desolate countries; where they should by the way either shamefully perish, or else to their perpetuall infamie be taken prisoners, and as base slaues, during their liues be enforced to serue the Persian women: for as much as beside the great distance of the place, both the great river Euphrates, and the huge mountaine Taurus, and the faithlesse king Adadenles, who had shut vp all the passages, did cut off all hope from them, if they should be overcome, by any meanes possible to escape backe againe into Capadocia.

When Hyfmaell was come neere with his armie, and the Asapi vpon signe giuen deuiding themselves, made place for the great artillerie to play, as was before appointed; hee also presently deuiding his horsemen, charged the right wing of the Turkes armie, with such force, that after a most terrible fight betwixt the halfe armed Turkes, and the valiant Persian men at armes, Casim Bassa the great commander of the European horsemen, with the formost of that wing, being slaine, and many more after them, hee enforced all that wing to retire vnto that place where Selymus himselfe with the Ianizaries stood. On the other side, Vita-Ogli hauing receiued no little harme by the Turkes great ordinance, because he had not so speedily cleered himselfe and his followers of that danger, as had Hyfmaell; charged the Asian horsemen in the left wing, and there in bloudie battell made great slaughter of the enemy, but not with like good hap as did Hyfmaell: for whiles he most courageously in the formost rankes assailed his enemies, he was stricke with a small shot and slaine. With whose fall the Turkes were greatly encouraged, insomuch as that they which but now were glad to giue ground, and had lost the third part of that wing, began a fresh to renew the battell, and valiantly to withstand the Persians; and with their harquebussiers (wherewith the Persian horsemen were wonderfully terrified) draue them headlong vpon the Turkes common footmen. The Persians whether it were forced by necessitie for that they had lost so great a commander, and not well able to gouerne their horses terrified with the thundring shot, or else for that the open side of the footmen presented vnto them greater place of aduantage, setting themselves together brake through the middle of the battell of those Turkish footmen, and bearing them downe before them with a mightie slaughter, came to the great ordinance and there slew the canoniers, who discharging their field peece at all aduentures, in that great medly made a foule slaughter, as well of their owne men as of their enemies. And so without stop (as victorious conquerours) made way through the midst of their enemies; vntill they came to the right wing: where Hyfmaell was still hardly charging the European horsemen, who hauing before lost Casim their Generall, and being many of them slaine or wounded, were already enforced to retire; but now charged afresh vpon the side, had much adoe to endure the furie of their enemies, but as men in extreame danger, were glad to crie to Selymus for helpe.

In this hard distresse, Selymus in two places opened his carriages, wherewith he stood as it were entrenched, and presently sent out part of his horsemen. And by and by turning himselfe vnto his Ianizaries, said, This daies victorie is referred (most worthie souldiours) vnto your valour and labour: wherfore now valiantly set forward, and as fresh and courageous men, assaile your wearied enemies; their horses are all on a water with sweat, and the men themselves faint vnder the weight of their armour. But yet for all that Selymus could say, the Ianizaries were not verie forward, but stood still, as men willing in so great a danger to keepe themselves within the safegard of their munition. Wherefore whilest they at their leisure set forward, the Persians in the midst of the heat of this victorie, compassing in the European horsemen, slew them downe right, Selymus looking on and wishing in vaine to helpe them. Fabritius Carrelius great master of the Romanes, who of all these things had certaine intelligence, writ to Leo the Tenth then bishop of Rome, that the Ianizaries refused to be commaunded by Selymus, and were not by any persuasion or entreatie to be enduced to relieue the distressed European horsemen; but as men distrustful the euent of the battell, chose rather in their strength to expect the successe thereof, than with most manifest danger to expose themselves vnto the violence of the Persian horsemen, which had as a tempest ouerborne the vanguard of the Turkish footmen.

The Persians were now readie on euerie side to haue assailed Selymus in his greatest strength: when Sinan Bassa, although the wing he led was sore rent and weakned, yet following the Persians through the midst of the heaps of the slaine footmen, came in, in good time for Selymus; and with certaine fresh troups which had escaped the furie of Vita-ogli, restored the battell before almost lost: but especially by the inuincible courage of Alus-beg and Mahomet his brother, disceded of the honourable familie of the Molcozzij, which for nobilitie amongst the Turkes is accounted next vnto the Othomans; both of them for courage resembling their warlike father Molcozzius, famous for that wofull expedition he made into F.R.IV.L.I against the Venetians in the raigne of Baiazet. Selymus also not yet discouraged but still in hope, commaunded all the great ordinance wherewith he was enuironed, which he had referred as his last refuge, to be discharged: by the violence whereof, such slaughter was made, as well of his owne men as of his enemies, mingled together, that what for dust, what for smoake, and thundring of the artillerie, hauing on both sides almost lost the vse of sight and hearing; and their horses being so terrified with the thundring report of the great ordinance, that they were not now to be ruled, the battell was broken off, the victorie yet doubtfull. The Turkish histories to expresse the terrour of this day, number it amongst their dismall daies, tearing it The onely day of Doome.

Hyfmaell in this furious battell, hauing receiued a wound vnder his left shoulder with a small shot; by persuation of his friends withdrew himselfe to haue his wound searched: which thing vndoubtedly was the safegard both of Selymus and his army. For the Persians by and by following their king, left the victorie now in all mens opinion almost gotten. But after that Hyssmaell perceived the wound was not deepe, for that the strength of his armour had so broken the force of the shot, that it pierced not farre into his bodie, he was about to haue charged the Turks afresh: but vnderstanding of the death of Vsta-ogli, in whom for his singular experience in martiall affaires, he had reposed his greatest confidence; and his capitaines also perswading him not to make so light reckoning of his wound, the griefe whereof he yet felt not, being warme, but to haue regard to his owne health: he in seemly order softly marched away in such sort, that his departure had no resemblance of flight. And passing by the citie of TAVRIS, willed the chiefe of the citizens to open the gates of the citie to Selymus (if he should come thither) and to receiue his garrisons, rather than by vaine constancie to fall into vtter destruction: and so marched himselfe into the confines of MEDIA.

But the Turkes entangled with many difficulties, hauing no hearts for feare, nor strength for wearinesse to pursue their enemies; yet comming to the Persian tents, tooke them without resistance: where beside the rich paulions wrought with needle worke of silke and gold, and much other pretious furniture, many noble ladies and gentlewomen were found, which after the manner of the Persians had followed their husbands in those warres; whom Selymus caused to be all freely set at libertie vntouched, excepting one of the wiues of Hyssmaell whom he detained and gaue her in marriage to one of his Bassaes. Some which were present at this battell, reported that amongst the heaps of them which were slaine, were found the dead bodies of diuers Persian women, which being armed, and following their husbands, died with them in the battell; whom Selymus caused to be honestly buried.

This was that notable battell fought in the CALDEAN fields neere vnto the citie of COR, betwixt these two great princes, the seauenth day of August in the yeare of our Lord 1514. In which battell Selymus lost about thirtie thousand men, amongst whom was Casan Bassa his great lieutenant in EYROR, seauen Sanzackes, in which were the two Malcoo Zian brethren, who labouring the one to rescue the other were both togither slaine. Beside his common footmen of whom he made least reckoning, he lost most part of his Illirian, Macedonian, Scutian, Epirot, Thessalian, and Thracian horsemen, the vndoubted flower and strength of his army, which were in that mortall battell almost all slaine, or grievously wounded.

Selymus for all this great losse, by the confession of his enemies hauing gotten the victorie, and receiuing embassadours from COR and the cities thereabout, and the great citie of TAVRIS promising to relieue him with whatsoever he needed, and to doe what else he should command: marched directly to TAVRIS, desiring both to see and possesse himselfe of that citie, as one of the chiefe pallaces of the Persian kings. This citie is two daies journey distant from COR where the battell was fought, and is probably supposed to be the famous citie called in ancient time ECBATHANA, about an hundred and fiftie miles distant from the Caspian sea. The citizens were readie at the comming of the Turkes, and brought them great store of victuals out of the gates of the citie, where Selymus had lodged his armie in the suburbs, thinking it no safetie to lodge within that great and populous citie; contenting himselfe to haue the gates thereof deliuered vnto him, which he kept with strong guard. Some report that Selymus durst not trust the Persians, and therefore neuer went into the citie but disguised in the habit of a common souldier. Yet some others say, that he did with great magnificence banquet in the stately pallace of the Persian king, and there had great discourse with them of TAVRIS concerning his late victorie. But whilest he thus staid at TAVRIS, and with himselfe purposed to spend that winter in ARMENIA; he called together his great capitaines and commanders of his armie, to know how they liked thereof: who fearing his displeasure, wholly referred themselves to his owne resolution. Onely Mussapha his chiefe Bassa chanced to say, That it were good that the minds of the Ianizaries and the other souldiours of the court should therein be knowne. Which his speech, Selymus tooke in such euill part, that he presently commanded him out of his sight, and deprived him of his greatest honour: and the more to disgrace him, sent one of his jesters after him, who in great scorne and derision comming behind him, cut off part of his tulipant that hung downe as the fashion was. But the Ianizaries vnderstanding the matter, and much offended with the indignitie offered vnto the great Bassa whom they deereley loued, rose vp altogether in armes, and told Selymus flatly, That they would not in any case winter so far from home in the enemies countrey: and therefore that it were best for him betime to consider of the matter, for that they were resolutely set downe to forsake him if he would needs stay, and not with speed returne. Selymus much troubled with this insolencie of the Ianizaries, and hearing dayly, that Hyssmaell with new supplies out of IBERIA, ALBANIA, and PARTHIA, was comming vpon him with greater power than before; and considering withall, with what difficultie and danger hee had escaped in the late battaile, preferred rather by his good fortune and force of his great artillery, than the valour and prowess of his souldiours; and withall suspecting the multitude and strength of the Taurians, of whose fidelitie he could make no reckoning; he changed his former determination, and resolved to returne againe into CAPADOCIA: whereupon hauing contrarie to his promise exacted a great masse of money from them of TAVRIS, hee departed thence, carrying away with him three thousand families, the best artificers in that citie, especially such as were skillfull in making of armour and weapons, and so with speed retired towards the riuer Euphrates, a longer way than that whereby he came: fearing to returne againe by the head of Araxis and the mountaine PERIABES, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian horsemen, who were reported to be then comming against him.

Hyssmaell vnderstanding of his departure, followed after with as much speed as he could, leaving behind him for hast his carriages and such of his souldiours as were not able to endure so long and speedie a march: yet for all his hast (for so much as Selymus was gone a great way before him) he could not ouertake any part of his armie, vntill he was come to the great riuer Euphrates; where Selymus staying two dayes, and hauing made diuers little boats, was passing ouer his footmen: which because they were not sufficient for the speedie transportation of so great a multitude, many for hast swam ouer the riuer vpon bladders, and some aduentured to get ouer vpon the broken peeces of their carriages, which they had for that purpose burst in sunder. Selymus himselfe got ouer to the farther banke in a little boat, hauing before caused all his horsemen with their horses at once to take the riuer, of purpose to breake the violence of the streame, whereby his footmen and cammels with their burdens got ouer with lesse danger, and some of his field peeces were also with lesse difficultie transported. Yet for all the speed he could make, the Georgian horsemen, the forerunners of Hyssmaell his armie, being come within sight before the Turkes were all got ouer, raised such a feare and a stirre all alongst that side of the riuer, that two thousand of the Turkes were in their hastie passage there drowned, diuers field peeces left sticking in the mud, and much of their baggage carried away with the force of the riuer. The Georgians contenting themselves with such things as were left, pursued them no further: for the wheeles of the Turkes carriages entangled together with the violence of the streame, had staid a great part of the Turkish trash, floating in the riuer: and much more was in diuers places driuen vpon the shore, all which the Georgian horsemen easily drew out. Hyssmaell in the meane time rejoycing at nothing more; than that hauing chased away his enemies, hee had also recouered much of the great ordinance whereby he had before receiued so great hurt.

Selymus by speedie flight thus got out of the hands of the Persians, found his passing much more dangerous at the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, than he had before thought of: For Aladeules the mountaine king hauing now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his prey, had with his savage people before taken all the straight passages of that mountaine country; who euery night in the euish manner assailed the Turkes, as they with their weake and weakie companies passed through those rough and broken wayes: and robbing their carriages, presently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thicke woods and rockie mountains. Aladeules himselfe in the meane time, by whose fraud all this was done, euery day exusing himselfe, as if it had beene done against his will, by the rude mountaine people enured to such desperate robberies, whom neuerthelesse he said he would in short time severely chastise so soon as he could find the authors thereof. In the meane while, for fashion sake sending a little spare provision for certaine dayes, did euery night rob and spoile the Turkes by his souldiours, as they could take them in places of aduantage: Against which mischeefes Selymus could neither by policie, neither his souldiours by industrie prouide any sufficient remedie. Wherefore dissembling the injuries he dayly receiued, purposing to be thereof in time reuenged, together with the foule and trecherous dealing of that faithlesse king; holding on his way, he with much adoe came at length to TRABZOND, and from thence to AMASIA, where he spent that Winter in repairing his sore weakened armie, purposing with the first of the Spring to make warre vpon Aladeules and the mountaine people, who in his returne had done him so great harme and injurie.

In this sort Iouius, one of the great historiographers of that time, reporteth the aforesaid wars betwixt Hyfmaell and Selymus, whose credit in that matter other writers haue since for most part followed. Howbeit, Jo. Ant. Menauinus, a Genoway, who serued in these warres, doth in his booke concerning the Turkish affaires, dedicated to the French king, much otherwise report the same: which to satisfie the desirous reader, I haue thought good here in few words to set down, as it is by himselfe reported.

The former historie as it is reported by Jo. Ant. Menauinus a Genoway, presents as the doing thereof.

Selymus (saith he) with his armie in number about three hundred thousand men, being come to the riuer Euphrates, found the bridge broken downe by his nephew Amurat, and his enemies encamped in conuenient place on the farther side of the riuer, with their forces greatly increased by new supplies lately sent from the Persian king: so that there was then in the Persian armie about ninetie thousand men horse and foot, the horsemen for most part furnished with two horses apeece for seruice: and though Selymus did what hee might, to know whether the Persian king were in person himselfe in the campe, or els (which hee most feared) was raising of greater forces in PERSIA, yet could he by no meanes learne the truth of that he desired. Wherefore repairst againe the broken bridge, he first sent ouer his two great lieutenants of GRÆCIA and NATOLIA, who passing ouer the riuer, encamped themselves as they thought conuenient. The next morning, about two houres before the rising of the Sunne, Amurat suddenly assailed the great commander of GRÆCIA, Casan Bassa, in his trenches, and by plaine force discomfited the Turkes, and by good fortune tooke from them their tents: whereupon such a terrour and feare came vpon the other great commander of NATOLIA, that his souldiours thrusting themselves for feare into the riuer, swam ouer with great danger, and againe joyined themselves with the rest of the armie. Selymus troubled with the great losse thus receiued, caused all his great artillerie to be placed all alongst the hithermost banke of the riuer Euphrates; and because the enemy should not perceiue the same, raunged certaine companies of his souldiours before the ordinance, as if they should presently haue passed the riuer: who vpon signall giuen, should forthwith withdraw themselves and giue place to the great ordinance bent vpon the enemy. But when fire was giuen to these great pieces, many of them being overcharged, burst in sunder, and slew diuers of the Turkes: many also of their horses and mules being neere vnto the riuers side, and terrified with the thundering shot, leapt into the riuer, and were there drowned together with their riders. The Persians also hauing receiued great losse, retired farther off for feare of the great artillerie. So Selymus without resistance passing ouer the riuer, marched forthwith toward the enemy: whom the Persians as men nothing dismayed, notably encountred. The battell was of long time doubtfull, and much blood shed on both sides: and if the approach of the night had not broken off that mortall fight, the Persian armie rather overcharged with the multitude of the enemy, than vanquished by valour, had vndoubtedly receiued a great ouerthrow; but through the benefit of the night, they without further losse escaped the pursute of the Turkes. Vpon this victorie, Selymus left his carriages and baggage with his footmen; and taking with him only his horsemen, set forward, with intention to haue vpon the suddaine surprised the regall citie of TAVRIS, before the fame of the late fought battaile could be carried thither: the Persians in the meane time being no lesse carefull of their affaires. The day before, ten thousand fresh horsemen well appointed, which had not yet bene in the battaile, were comming to Hyfmaell: thefe he craftely laied in the Turkes way, commanding them vpon the approach of the enemy to flie, as if it had bene for feare. Selymus in the morning hauing descried these horsemen at hand, supposing them to be such of his enemies as being overtaken with the night were not able to follow the rest of his armie, exhorted his souldiours courageously to pursue their discouraged enemies.

The Persians seeing the Turkes, of purpose betooke themselves to flight; and they suspecting no deceit, followed fast after them, vntill that about mid day being wearie of the pursute; and comming to a little riuer which was in their way, they there stayed to refresh themselves: and after they had taken a short repast, againe pursued the Persians, still leauing behind them such as were not able so fast to follow, prick forward with hope, that before night they should surpris and ranke the rich citie of TAVRIS. The Turkish horsemen thus drawne farre from the footmen, the Persian horsemen left in ambush, in the meane time set vpon the Turkes footmen, lying (as they supposed) in great securitie, and with a great slaughter ouerthrew them: at which time they also tooke all Selymus his treasure and great artillerie. Which ouerthrow was by

speedie posts, about two a clocke in the night made knowne to Selymus (who now in his mind already conceived the sacking of TAVRIS) and withall, that the fierce enemy was following him at the heeles. Selymus wonderfully abashed with this vnexpected newes and the losse of his footmen, forthwith began to retire: which the ten thousand Persians which had before of purpose fled, perceiuing, now turning themselves vpon the retiring Turkes, charged them hardly: so Selymus enclosed both before and behind by his enemies, receiued a great ouerthrow. And the Turkes thus hardly beset and almost despairing of their liues, and hauing lost their ensignes, brake out sideuaies betwixt their enemies and fled. Selymus seeing all desperat and forlorne, betooke himselfe to flight also with the rest: and passing the riuer Euphrates, brake downe the bridge which he had but a little before repaired, for feare the Persians should further pursue him; and with much trouble and no lesse danger comming at length to AMASIA, assembled thither the reliques of his discomfited armie. Such of the Turkes as remained behind, and were not able in flight to keepe way with the rest, were all slaine by the Persians.

The Genoway authour thus concludeth his historie, That the Persian king did not more rejoyce at this victorie, than did he himselfe for the ouerthrow of the Turkes; hoping in that their so great confusion, to free himselfe of his long and miserable thraldome, and to find a way vnto his native country and parents: as afterwards he did, for flying first to TRAPZONDA and there taking passage into EVROPE, he came to HADRIANOPE, from whence he travelled by land on foot to SALONICA, & there chancing vpon certain ships of Christian merchants which had brought corne thither, he was by them transported into the island of CHIOS; from whence he joyfully returned to GENVA his native countrey, after he had amongst the Turkes endured ten yeares captiuitie: most part wherof he liued as a page in old Baialet his priue chamber, and the rest as a souldiour of the court in the reigne of Selymus; and therefore well acquainted with the fashion of the Turkes court, and manners of that barbarous nation.

Now shall it not (as I hope) be much from our purpose, here with Iouius a little to digresse, in comparing these two great princes Hyfmaell and Selymus together; who in that time had filled the world with the glorie of their fame: that wearied with bloudie broiles, and the wonderfull chances of warre, we may a little repose our selues with matter of a milder vaine, neither vnpleasant nor vnprofitable.

These two mightie princes, as they were for royall descent, strength of bodie, courage of mind, riches, and power, equall, and had thereby obtained like fame and renoume: so in conditions and qualities of mind, and martiall discipline, they much differed. First of all (beside the mutuall hatred of the one nation against the other, deliuered as it were by succession from their grandfatheres and fathers) these two princes, and so likewise their subjects also, were at great odds about an idle question of their vaine superstition, the one preferring and honoring Eubekir, Homaris, and Ottoman, as the most true and rightfull successours of their great prophet Mahomet: the other with no lesse deuotion honouring Haly, and detesting the three former; differing otherwise in few or no points of their most fond superstition: yet did they vnder the colour and zeale of their religion (as they would haue it) both pretend just causes of warre, although their euill dissembled ambitious desires, plainly declared vnto the world, that they both shor at one and the same mark, viz. By confirming their power and strength to extend the bounds of their great empires. For Hyfmaell of purpose affected the same and glorie of Darius and Xerxes, the antique Persian kings; who hauing subdued ASIA, with great boldnesse passed ouer into EVROPE: and Selymus, the greatnesse of Alexander of Macedon, who subuerted the Persian empire. Which their aspiring thoughts, masking vnder the vail of zeale towards their religion, seemed not altogether vaine; fortune with like indifferencie immoderately fauouring their bold ambitious and endlesse desires. But in Hyfmaell appeared such a wonderfull deuotion and grauitie, that his haute thoughts were with the reuerend maiestie therof couered: whereas in Selymus, his inhumane crueltie did blot and obscure all his other princely vertues: for he with reward and punishment retained the maiestie of his empire, but with greater fame of seueritie than bountie. Because it was expedient in the exact discipline of that seruile gouernment, wherof the greatest strength of the Othoman empire consisteth, to vse all rigor and seueritie: Otherwise then it stood with the state of Hyfmaell, who leuied alwaies his armies of his nobilitie and men free borne, with whom temperat iustice, ciuile courtesie, and popular clemencie, are of greatest force, to win their fidelitie, faith, and loyalty: for that there is no man well born, which feareth not more the blemish of infamie than the heauineffe of punishment : so that it was not to be manuell'd, if Hyfmaell by such honourable vertues did mightily defend the glorie of his maiestie and renewme. Vnto these his rare vertues, was also joynd a comelinesse of face (the fairest gift of nature) well becoming so great a monarch : for he was well coloured, quicke eyed, yellow bearded, and that which amongst the Persians is accounted the signe of auncient nobilitie, hooked nosed; and was withall exceeding eloquent : By which good gifts, he wonderfully wooon vnto himselfe both the eyes and hearts of such as beheld him. But in Selymus his sterne countenance, his fierce and piercing eies, his Tartar-like pale colour, his long mustachoes on his vpper lip, like bristles, fild back to his necke, with his beard cut close to his chin, did so expresse his martiall disposition and inextinguishable nature, that he seemed to the beholders, to haue nothing in him but mischief and cruelty. Which diuersitie of countenances was also accompanied with no lesse diuersitie of affections, and so consequently with farre vnlike manner of gouernment. For Hyfmaell was of nature courteous and affable, easie to be seene and spoken withall, doing nothing that becomed his regal function, but in the sight of all men : His manner was to dine openly in the companie of his nobilitie, delighting much in hauking and hunting, accompanied with his noble men, and the embassadours of forraigne princes : He would oftentimes run, leape, and proue masteries with his chiefe courtiers, being himselfe a most excellent horseman and cunning archer : In his exercises he was so popular, that he would not sticke openly to bare himselfe and swim in his princely bathes : His wiues, the beautifull daughters of his nobilitie or neighbour princes, ladies of great chastitie, he neither loathed nor diuorced; after the auncient manner of the Persian kings, who alwaies vsed most tenderly to loue and cherish their wiues, doing them all the honour possible in court, as partakers of all their fortune; and carried them, their children, nurses, and richest furniture into their farthest warres, to their great trouble and charge, by the presence of so deepe pledges the more to encourage their minds in time of battell. Whereas Selymus contrariwise did all things in secret, eating his meat alone without any company, attended vpon with his pages and eunuches onely, and satisfying natures want with some one simple dish of meat : Hee seldome went abroad but to the church, vpon the friday the Turkes chiefe Saboth; and thence beset with his pensioners and other souldiours of the court, that although he vsed to ride alone mounted vpon some couragious horse, yet was it a hard matter by face to know him amongst so many armed men, who with great pride and insolencie kept backe the beholders : He was seldome seene abroad in the citie, chusing rather for his recreation to passe ouer in his gallic into ASIA, and there amongst the sea coast to take the ayre : His wiues he would not suffer to come to court, neither vsed their companie but for procreation sake, and that (as was thought) without any great good countenance or familiaritie; for that he being not greatly giuen to women, but more delighted with vnnaturall pleasure, thought a mans bodie and mind to be not a little weakened with the allurements of women; wherefore hee seldome resorted to the cloister of choise paragons in the midst of CONSTANTINOPLE, shut in on euerie side with high and blind walls. Those daintie pieces, either taken from their Christian parents, or by chance surpris'd by pirats, are there most curiously kept by auncient matrons and old eunuches, by whom they are with all diligence instructed in the principles of the Mahometane law, and to read the Arabian tongue, and withall, cunningly and comely to sing, play, daunce, and sow : But Selymus of all others vsed seldome to see these allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with women, or desirous of many (and oftentimes vnfortunat) children; hauing but one sonne (Solyman) by the daughter of Muhamet a Tartar king, who afterwards by the sufferance of God, proued a great plague to the Christian common weale. Such spare time as he had from his serious and weightie affaires, hee vsed to spend in walking in his gardens with some of his Bassaes or other great courtiers; and in beholding & noting the noble mens children there sporting themselves, would discourse and consult of many things of great importance. Some houres he would spend in the bathes, and in reading the histories of his auncellors and other forraigne princes: imitating therein his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who caus'd almost all the histories of the famous princes of the world to be translated into the Turkish language, and their liuely counterfeits to be with cunning hand drawn, that by their worthy examples he might be the more enflamed to extend his fame and glorie. He would many times scoffe at the great businesse of his father Baiaſet, who (as he said) was so drowned in the studie of Auerrois (determining nothing certainly of the nature of the foule) and the motions of the heauens, that he desired rather the name of a sharpe

disputer amongst the idle professors of Philosophie, than of a renowned cheefetaine amongst his valiant souldiours and men of warre.

One of the Persian embassadours finding him pleasantly disposed, demaunded of him why he did not weare his beard long, as his father Baiaſet and other great princes of that age had done, thereby to seeme vnto their subjects of greater maiestie: to whom he answered, That hee liked not to carrie about with him such an vnneccessarie handfull, whereby his Bassaes might at their pleasure lead him vp and downe the court, as they had done his father: Noting thereby, that Baiaſet whilest he yet liued, had bene too much ouerruled by the Bassaes; which he could by no meanes endure, following no mans aduise but his owne in whatsoever he tooke in hand.

But to come vnto the Persians themselves, they in their warres had great disadvantage of the Turkes: for as they were strong in horsemen, so were they destitute of expert trained footmen, by whose onely meanes the Turkes haue achieued their greatest victories, and performed their greatest warres. Beside this, it was a great want in the Persians, that they had not the vse of guns, against whose furie no sufficient resistance can bee made, or force of man opposed: as appeared by the lamentable example of Vsun-Cassanes at ARSENOL, and now of Hyfmaell in the Caldean fields; whose victorious armies of horsemen were in both places put to the worse by the terror and violence of the Turkes artillerie. For the naked Turkish horseman is not to be compared with the Persian man at armes; who comes into the field armed with a strong cuirass, a sure headpeece, and a good targuet; whereas the Turkish European horsemen, altogether naked, vse onely a square or crooked buckler, wherewith they doe scarcely couer themselves: and the Asian horsemen, bucklers made of soft reeds, wound round, and couered with some kind of silke.

The Persian horsemen also, wearing their pouldrons and gauntlets, and bearing stauces of good ash, armed at both ends, fight with them as occasion serueth at the halfe staffe, after the manner of the Numidians, and with doubling and redoubling their often thrusts from on high, doe easily wound or kill the vnarmed Turkes, with their horses: whereas the Turkish horsemen, after the manner of the Gracians, couching their stauces in their rests, doe at the first course most commonly breake the same, being made of light and brittle firs, and so presently come to their sci-mitars, or horsemens maces, being in all other things farre inferior to the Persian man at armes.

As for the Turkish archers on horsebacke, they are in no respect to be compared with the Persians; who well mounted and surely armed, and vsing both greater and stronger bowes, shoot more deadly arrowes, and so make small account of the Turkes. So that all things well considered, the Persian armie, deuoted to their king as well for the great and firme opinion conceiued of his high courage and diuine spirit, as for that they were to him by faith obliged; although it was in number farre inferior, yet had it bene of the Turkes inuincible, if it had not bene ouerwhelmed by the cruell, cowardly, and murdering artillerie and wonderfull multitude of men. The cause why Hyfmaell out of so many great and large prouinces then vnder his obeisance (able in ancient times with their multitude to couer the face of the earth, and to drinke the riuets drie) brought now so small an armie against the Turkish emperour, breaking into the heart of ARMENIA, was for that Hyfmaell to win the hearts of the people by bountie, had remitted a great part of his customes and tributes, so as then stood best with his policie, hauing but lately aspired vnto the kingdom, and thrust downe his neere kinsmen, the posteritie of Vsun-Cassan and Isacup, the rightfull inheritours thereof: so that his cofers being empirie, and wanting money, the finewe of warre he was not able to raise so great an armie as otherwise he might out of those populous kingdoms and countries, yeelding plentifully all things necessarie for the vse of man. Whereas with Selymus it was farre otherwise: whose horsemen, footmen, captaines, canoniers, both at sea and land, officers of peace and warres, receiued their dayly wages, and monthly payes in ready money, of his treasurers and paymasters: for defraying of which charge hee neuer wanted die money, his yearly tributes and reuenues still exceeding all his charges by a stantinople: and his yearly tributes and reuenues still exceeding all his charges by a fourth part. The strength of the Persian king consisted in three kind of souldiours: the first were they which were accounted souldiours of the court: the second such as were by custome and dutie bound to serue him in his warres: and the third such as were sent vnto him from the princes his neighbours and confederates. Those which were accounted souldiours of his court, had their certaine stipends, and were altogether maintained of the kings charge; of whom according to the old custome of the Persian kings, they at certaine times receiue armour, horses, apparrell, tents, expectation made strong resistance; and valiantly withstood his forces: he drew certaine companies of harquebusiers out of his owne squadrons, and sent them to rebuke their fellows: and at the same instant commanded the Janizaries for all the danger to mount the hill. When the mountaine people terrified with the strangeness of the shot, and not able to abide the force thereof, by and by turned their backs, and by knowne waies fled into their fire haunts in the mountains and woods fast by. Yet the greatest slaughter fell amongst these footmen, who which they saw the horsemen put to flight, and the Janizaries coming up the hills against them, did with much difficultie, by steepe and broken waies, clamber vp the high mountaines: as oftentimes it falleth out, that both the strength of mens legs, and other their wonted forces, faile them most when surprised and overcome, with sudden feare they desire to run and die fastest. The Turkes hauing them in chase, had the killing of them vntill the going downe of the Sunne. The horsemen with the king, vpon their swift horses, well acquainted with those rockes and rough waies, with little losse retired themselves into the further and stronger places of the mountaines.

Aladenles after this discomfiture, finding himselfe in all things farre inferior to his enemy, thought it best by protracting the warre, to wearie him out: wherefore as the Turkes pursued him, and burnt the poore countrey cottages standing in their way, he still fled from mountaine to mountaine, neuer offering battell or shewing himselfe, but in places of great aduantage. And therefore Selymus fearing least in that barren rough and vnknowne countrey, he should either want vitaille or by some other meanes be entraped, if he should still with his whole armie follow after his strong enemies: vpon the seauenth day left off to pursue them any farther. And encamping himselfe in the most conuenient place of that countrey, sent Sinan Bassa with his light horsemen, who carrying with them certaine daies victuals, should still at the heeles follow the enemy, and with all speed and pollicie possible, hunt after the king himselfe. Selymus in the meane time curiously enquiring of the countrey captiues after the strength of Aladenles, and what meanes hee had to maintaine the warre: found, that he had taken with him his best men both horse and foot; and had commanded the countrey people to forsake the villages, of purpose to leaue all desolat to the enemy: and hauing surely entrenched himselfe vpon a certaine strong rocke (whither he had before conuaid great store of prouision) was resolved not to giue battell vnto his enemies, vntill he had drawne them into the impregnable straits of the mountaines, where their huge multitude should little auaille them, but to increase their owne losse. An other cause there was also (as they said) for that he feared to be betrayed by Alis Beg his kinsman, Generall of his horsemen; who first fled in the late battell: whose vnfaithfulness and hatred might seeme to proceed of a just ground, for that Aladenles had in former time treacherously murdered his father, vpon a jealous suspicion of his aspiring to the kingdom.

Selymus vnderstanding all this, caused the captiues to haue their irons struck off, and in stead of their giues lading them with gifts and promises, sent them to Alis Beg with secret letters and rewards, to persuaide him in so fit a time to reuenge his fathers death; which thing if he would performe by some notable exploit vpon Aladenles, he should both purchase vnto himselfe great credit with Selymus, and also the kingdom. These homely messengers according as was giuen them in charge, hauing imparted the matter to Sinan Bassa, within few daies had so wrought, that Alis Beg (whom the desire of a kingdom together with Selymus his rewards prickt forward to seeke reuenge) was easily drawne to joyne hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladenles, who mistrusting all things, warily looked vnto himselfe; he found the means to go ouer to Sinan Bassa, carrying after him a great part of Aladenles his best horsemen: by whose meanes the rest also which remained being with rewards corrupted, one companie after another came at last all ouer vnto the Bassa. Aladenles circumvented with this vnexpected treachery, which neuer before thought it possible that his men should all so suddenly haue forsaken him and reuolued vnto the Turkes; was now glad to repose all his hope in secret flight. But Sinan Bassa and Alis Beg, hardly pursuing him as he fled thorough the mountaines, hiding himselfe in rockes and the thicke woods, at last drew him out of a caue, being betrayed by the countrey peasants. Aladenles being brought to Selymus, was within a few daies after put to death, and his head in great derision afterwards carried about through all ASIA the lesse: and afterward by way of barbarous ostentation, sent by Selymus to the Senat of VENICE, as a loathsome testimonie of his victorie. Aladenles thus dead, Selymus reduced all his kingdom into the forme of a prouince, which he deuided into three parts; and after the manner of the Turkish government, appointed pointed to euerie part a Sanzacke: yet so, that Alis Beg should be chiefe ouer the rest, with such soueraignie as that he wanted nothing of a king but the name only. And for the better gouernment of all things in that new gained kingdom, he left Sinan Bassa there all the rest of that summer; with commandement, that after he had set all things in good order, he should winter at ICONIUM: and he himselfe with a small traine returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, for he had heard, that whilst he was busied in his wars against Hysmaell and Aladenles in ARMENIA, that the Hungarians had made diuers incursions into SERVIA, and spoiled that countrey. Wherefore for feare of losing SAMANDRIA (which standing neere to Danubius, for the conuenient situation thereof is reputed the bulwarke of SERVIA and THRACIA) he sent Iousses Bassa their gouernour of BOSNA with eight thousand horsemen, who passing the riuier Sauis entered into CROATIA as farre as CEBINUM; and at the same time transported an other armie ouer Danubius into HUNGARIE, to the intent that the Hungarians at one instant beset with double danger, should be enforced to feare their owne state; and withall to shew vnto the world, of what strength and power the Othoman emperours were. Deeming it to concerne much, both for the present, and the time to come, to the daunting of the Christians; if hee should by his happie attempts make it knowne, that he could at once easily and readily maintaine so many and so puissant armies, and wage so great warres in diuers parts of the world, and so farre distant one from an other.

In the end of the yeare, when he had thus with double inuasion repressed the Hungarians, he spent the Winter following at HADRIANOPLE & CONSTANTINOPLE, in making of greater preparation for warre than euer he had before from the beginning of his raigne. For he was aduertised, that the great monaches of the North his neighbours, namely Maximilian the emperour, Vladislaus king of HUNGARIE, and Sigismundus king of POLONIA, with the princes of GERMANIE, had combined themselves together to make warre vpon him. But after he had learned by his sure intelligencers (whom he had with great charge sent into all parts of EUROPE, diligently to obserue what was done in the courts of those great princes) that all the great meetings of the Christian princes proued nothing but glorious words and sumptuous banquets; he being rid of that vaine feare (God so appointing) turned himselfe and all those his wonderfull preparations againe toward the East, to the great quiet of Christendome in generall.

Yet least happily in the absence of himselfe and of his armies, the Christian princes might take occasion to inuade his dominions, he strengthened the frontiers of his empire with most strong garrisons: and left his sonne Solyman (who afterward proued the great scourge of Christianity) at HADRIANOPLE with a strong power, and Pyrrhus Bassa his tutor (a man of great stendome) at CONSTANTINOPLE. This great Bassa was of CILICIA, a native Turke borne, which was a thing accounted strange, forasmuch as the great Bassas were alwaies chosen of the Christian blood. After that, he sent Cherseogles (whom of all others he most trusted) with his armie into BYTHINIA, and made Zafferus an eunuch Admirall of his nauie; which he had but a little before built, and with a wonderfull labor and charge rigged forth. Then staying a few daies at CONSTANTINOPLE to see the young souldiours, but then chosen Janizaries; he departed thence and went to his old armie, lying with Sinan Bassa at ICONIUM, purposing to haue againe inuaded the Persian.

When he was come thither, he vnderstood that Campson Gaurus Sultan of ÆGYPT (with a great armie leuied in ÆGYPT and IVDBA) was come into SYRIA, giuing it out that he would aid the Persian king his confederat, and with all hostilitie enter into CILICIA, if Selymus should further proceed to inuade Hysmaell the Sophi his friend and allie. Selymus perplexed with these newes, and fearing that if he should once passe ouer the riuier Euphrates, Campson lying so neere in readinesse, should forthwith breake in at his backe into ASIA by the mountaine AMANS, and so endanger that part of his dominion; staied at ICONIUM, and sent his embassadours with great presents to Campson to pacifie him, if it might be. The chiefe men in this embassage were the Cadelecher, a man of great account amongst the Turks, and of them exceedingly reuerenced for the opinion they had of his great Mahometane superstition, who afterwards wrote the Commentaries of this warre; and Iachus a great captaine. The scope of whose embassage was, to entreat Campson, that he would not hinder or disturbe Selymus from making warre vpon the Persian king; who had so often and so forceably inuaded his dominions in ASIA; and by bringing in a new forme of superstition, had corrupted and altered the most certaine grounds of the Mahometane religion. And if they found him resolutely set downe and not to be by any conditions remoued, then with all possible diligence to learne his strength and farther designes, so farre as by any means they could, and with all speed to make their returne.

The cause moouing Campson to fall out with Selymus.

But Campson now farre spent with age, and liuing in the height of worldly blisse, although he knew it fitter for him at those yeares to giue himselfe ease and quietnesse, than to thrust himselfe into warres and other princes quarrels; yet thought this expedition to be for many causes both good and necessarie. First, he deadly hated the man for his inhumane crueltie, and therefore could neuer be perswaded to renew the league with him which he had in former time made with his father Baiazet: Besides that, he desired to abate and repress his audacious insolencie, grown already by his prosperous successie beyond the bounds of reason: for Selymus hauing taken TAVRIS, ouerthrowne the Persians, and slaine Aladeules; began now to seeme terrible to all the princes that bordered vpon him; and there were many which said he was another Alexander, who whilst other princes fate still as men a sleepe, did in the meane time plot in his victorious mind, the monarchie of the whole world. But aboue all things, the feare of the losse of SYRIA, and consequently the losse of all his kingdome (the quickest motiue for stirring vp of the suspicious minds of the greatest princes) most enforced Campson to take in hand this warre: For as much as the goodly kingdomes of EGYPT, IVDEA, and SYRIA, oppressed with the intolerable gouernment of the proud Mamalukes, and therefore lesse faithfull to the Egyptian kings, were in danger to reuolt to the Turkes, if the Persians should by any mischance or fortune of warre be of the Turkes vanquished. For which cause Campson in the beginning of this warre, solicited by the Persian embassadours, had made a firme league and confederation with Hysmal: and also moued with the miserie of the wofull young prince Aladin the sonne of Achomates, was in mind perswaded, that the cruell Turkish tyrant might by his and the Persian kings forces, easily be thrust out of his empire in ASIA and EVROPE. For Aladin, who after the death of Achomates his father fled to Campson the Sultan of EGYPT (as is before declared) had liued three yeares as a forlorne and distressed prince in the Egyptian court, and by all meanes he could deuise incited the Mamalukes to reuenge the injuries and crueltie of his vnckle Selymus. The eldest sonne also of the late king Aladeules, a goodly young prince, hauing at once lost his father, his kingdome, and whatsoeuer he held else, was in good time fled to the Egyptian king; and had so filled the minds of all men with the indignation and detestation of Selymus his exceeding crueltie, that the princes of the Mamalukes of their owne accord came to Campson, humbly beseeching him to take vpon him so just a warre: and if by reason of his great yeares hee should thinke himselfe vnable to endure the trauell thereof, it would then please him yet to giue them leaue of themselves to take the matter in hand, for the repressing of the insolencie of that great and wicked tyrant.

The Order of the Mamalukes.

These Mamalukes farre excelled the Turkes, not onely in strength of bodie, skilfull riding, and goodly armour, but also in courage and wealth. Beside that, they had not forgotten with what small power they had vnder the leading of Caitbeius their great Sultan, ouerthrowne the Turkes great armies in CILICIA, first at ADENA, and afterward at TARSVS, where they tooke prisoners, Mestes Palcologus the great Bassa, and Cherscogles, Baiazet his sonne in law: by which victorie they grew into such a proud and vaine conceit of themselves, as if they had bene the onely souldiours of the world, able of themselves to vanquish and overcome whomsoever they should set vpon. These so valiant souldiours, were for the most part of the poore people called in auncient time Getae, Zinchi, and Bastarne, borne neere vnto the Euxine sea and the fens of Maotis, especially on that side where the riuer Corax falleth into the Euxine: which countie is of later time called CIRCASSIA, of the people called CERCITAE neere vnto CHOLCHIS. These miserably and wretched people, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolanes and Tartars dwelling by TAVRICA (puld from their mothers breasts, or by other violent means surprised) sold vnto merchants; who culling out the best for strength of bodie, or aptnesse of wit, conuained them by sea to ALEXANDRIA, from whence they were continually sent to the great Sultan of EGYPT: and by his appointment were at CAIRE (after the old manner of that people) deliuered to masters of fence and such other teachers, who carefully instructed them, being shut vp in their schooles, in all manner of feats of actiuitie: where after they were become able to bend a strong bow, and taught cunningly to shoot, leape, run, vault, ride, and skilfully to vse all manner of weapons, they were then taken into pay, and receiued into the number of the kings kings horsemen or Mamalukes: and such of them as proued cowardly or vnapt, were made slaues vnto the rest. So that they seeing all honour, credit, and preferment, laied vp in martiall prowesse, did with all diligence and courage employ themselves to militarie affaires: and therein so well profited, that oftentimes they which at the first were but bate and base slaues, of the meanest of the Mamalukes, by many degrees of seruice rise at length to the highest degrees of honour. All these Mamalukes were the children of Christian parents, from the time of their captiuitie instructed in the Mahometane superstition: for no man borne of a Mahometane father, or of a Jew, could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke horsemen: which was so straightly obserued, that the honour of a Mamaluke horseman neuer descended vnto the sons of the Mamalukes, yet might they by law inherit their fathers lands, possessions, and goods: by which reason the sonnes of the Sultans themselves neuer succeeded their fathers in the kingdome. Hereby also it came to passe, that many Christians of loose life, or condemned for their notorious offences, flying thither, and abjuring the Christian religion, and suffering themselves to be circumcised, being men meet for the warres, grew by degrees to great honour: as did Tangarihardinus the sonne of a Spanish mariner, who by his forwardnesse and industrie grew into such credit and authoritie with Campson the great Sultan, that almost all things were done by his aduice and counsell; and was diuers times by him employed in most honorable seruice, being sent embassadour both to Baiazet the Turkish emperour, and to the state of VENICE, about matters of great importance. Yet his impietie escaped not the hand of God, for at length by the enuie of the court he was brought into disgrace, thrust out of his place, and cast into prison, where he loaded with cold yron, most miserably died. Neither was it to be marvelled if the Mamalukes were growne to that excesse of wealth, for as much as the Egyptians and Syrians being miserably by them oppressed, were not suffered to haue the vse either of horse or armour, neither admitted to any matters of counsell; but being impouerished and brought low with heauie impositions and dayly injuries of the Mamalukes, gaue themselves wholly to the trade of marchandise, husbandrie, and other mechanicall occupations: ouer whom the Mamalukes had power and commaund, as imperious masters ouer their seruants, and would with greater insolencie than is to be beleecued abuse the poore countrey people, beating and spoiling them at their pleasure, and not so contented, rauishing their wiues and daughters without redresse. The Egyptians (a people in auncient time much renowned for their valour and prowesse) were by these masterfull slaues kept in this miserable thraldome and slaueerie about the space of three hundred yeares. For after the declination of the Romane empire, that rich countrey falling into the gouernment of the Constantinopolitane emperours, the Egyptians soone wearie of the proud and auaritious foueraignerie of the Greekes, called in the Saracens, by whose helpe they expelled the Greekes, and after chose the Generall of the Saracens for their king, after whose name the Egyptian kings were of long time called Caliphes, as they had of auncient time bene called by the names of Pharao and Ptolomey.

The last of these Caliphes reigned at such time as the Christians vnder the leading of Godfrey and Bohemund, passing as conquerours through ASIA and SYRIA, erected the kingdome of HIERSALEM. Hee being inuaded by Americus sixt king of HIERSALEM, and finding himselfe too weake, prayed aid of the Sultan of SYRIA, who sent him Sarraco, a valiant captain, with a strong power to aid him: but Sarraco no lesse vnfaithfull than courageous, treacherously slew the Caliphe, in whose aid he came, and tooke vpon himselfe the kingdome. After Sarraco succeeded Saladine his brothers sonne, who vterly extinguished the name and authoritie of the Caliphes in EGYPT, whom Sarraco had yet left as high priests. This Saladine oftentimes vanquished the Christian armies in SYRIA and IVDEA, and at length quite ouerthrew the kingdome of HIERSALEM, as is in the former part of this historie to be seene. Saladine dying, left the kingdome of EGYPT to his brother, whose posteritie successiueley reigned of long time there, vntill the time of Melechfala. This Melechfala (last of the free borne kings, and of the posteritie of Saladine) had great and mortall warres with the Christians, wherein hauing lost most of his best souldiours, and reposing no great confidence in the Egyptians, thought good to strengthen himselfe with a new kind of souldiours, meere slaues bought for money. For at that time the Tartars breaking into ARMENIA and CAPADOCIA, and ouerrunning the people called COMANI joyning vpon CAPADOCIA, made generall spoile of that people, as of prisoners taken by law of armes. Of this base people, Melechfala for a little money bought a great multitude, which

which he transported into ÆGIPTE, and furnished them with armes: by whose prowesse he not onely defended the frontiers of his kingdome, but also besieged Lewes the French king in his trenches not farre from DAMIATA, called in auncient time Heliopolis, or Pelusi, and shortly after in plaine battaile tooke him prisoner, as is long before declared. But in the pride of this victorie, Melech Sala was by the conspiracie of these his new souldiours slaine: in whose place they set vp one Turqueminus, a desperat fellow of their owne companie, honouring him with the title of the great Sultan of ÆGIPTE. Turqueminus of a base slaue now become a great monarch (after the manner of men) forgetting his old companions which had so highly promoted him: and hauing them in great disdain, was by one of them (called Clotho) suddenly slaine; for which fact he was by those base souldiours, his companions, chosen Sultan in his place: who for the short time of his raigne did much for the confirming of that seruile monarchie: yet was he at length slaine also by Bandocader; sometimes one of his fellow seruants, who also succeeded him in the kingdome. After him in long order succeeded many valiant men of the same seruile state & condition, whom for breuitie I wittingly passe ouer. Amongst the rest, Caitbeius (of whom we haue before spoken in the life of Baiazer) was for wealth and marriall prowesse most famous; who according to the manner of his predecessours, did with greater bountie and care maintaine that seruile government, than any of them who had before him reigned in ÆGIPTE: and was for his notable government and noble acts justly accounted amongst the greatest princes of that age. After whose death great troubles arose in that seruile monarchie about the succession. Whereby the Mamelukes drawne into diuers factions, some seeking to prefer one, and some another, had in foure yeares space with ciuile warres sore weakened their estate, and slaine diuers of their greatest princes which had aspired vnto that kingdome. For appeasing of which mischeefes, tending to the vtter ruine of their kingdome, the great courtiers and cheefe men amongst the Mamelukes with one consent offered the kingdome to Campson Gaurus (or as the Turkes call him) Canfaues Gauris, of whom wee now speake, a man of great integritie and courage, and altogether free from ambition. He, terrified with the dreadfull example of so many kings whom hee had seene in short time miserably slaine by the ambitious aspiring of other proud competitors: when he was sore against his will hoist vp vpon the shoulders of the nobilitie and cheefe souldiours, and so carried into the court, as their manner was, began earnestly to refuse the kingdome and to withstand their choice, excusing himselfe as vnfit for so high a place; and with teares standing in his eyes, besought the other great lords his friends, that they would forbear to thrust him, well contented with his priuat life, into that glorious place subject to so many dangers: and the rather, for that he neither had money to giue bountifullly vnto the souldiours of the court, as other the Ægyptian Sultans had accustomed; neither held that sufficiency and authoritie as was requisite for repressing of such violent and seditious tumults as were too ripe in that troublesome time and confusion of all things.

The nobilitie on the other side perswaded him, That he would not vpon a foolish obstinacie or vaine modestie refuse the offer of his present good fortune, but courageously to take vpon him the government of the state, now sore shaken with ciuile discord, together with the regall dignitie, which was with the generall good liking of all men so frankly offered vnto him. At last they all by solemne oath promised vnto him, That they would with all their power, policie, and wealth, maintaine and defend the maiestie of his state; and that the men of war should not demand their wonted largesse, before the same might by his receiuers and treasurers be raised of his customes and other reuenues of the crowne. By which perswasions Campson encouraged, suffered himselfe to be saluted Sultan, and so rooke vpon him the government. Afterwards, when he had giuen vnto the men of warre ten millions of duckats, by the name of a largesse, and by his moderat government had caused men generally to haue his prowesse and wisdom in admiration; he did with such policie and dexteritie reforme the shaken state of that kingdome, before rent in sunder by ciuile warres, taking away by payson and other secret deuices some few, the cheefe authors of sedition, that for the space of sixteen yeares neither tumult nor noise of warre was at any time heard of in all SYRIA or ÆGIPTE. Worthie vndoubtedly the name of a most excellent and fortunat prince, if when he had by singular wisdom and policie established the generall peace and prosperitie of his kingdome, he could haue there contented himselfe to haue liued in quiet, and in the winding vp of his life, not rashly haue thrust himselfe into the dangerous quarrels of other princes.

The moderat
and happy go-uernment of Campson.

The

The Cadeisicher and Iachis (Selymus his embassadours) departing from Iconium, came in few daies to Campson the great Sultan, who then lay encamped neere vnto the riuer ORONTES, at this day called Farear. These embassadours entertained by Campson with greater bountie than courtiesse, and shortly after their comming hauing audience in his pailions: did with most temperat and calme speech deliuer their embassage. To whom Campson answered, That it was the auncient custome of the Ægyptian Sultans (forasmuch as they held the chiefe place in their religion) with all care and industrie to keepe the other Mahometane kings and people in peace and concord amongst themselves; whereof hee for his part had bene alwaies most desirous: and was for no other purpose come with his armie into his prouince of SYRIA, than to perswade Selymus to peace. Who if he would needs wilfully proceed in his intended warres against Hysmaell the Persian king, his friend and confederat, he would then doe what should stand with his honour and place, and not longer suffer all to go to wracke, for the vaine pleasure and furie of one insolent and ambitious man. He said also, That he had of long time before seene into Selymus his insatiable, fierce and troublesome disposition; who hauing most vnaturally procured the death of his good father the old emperour Baiazer, and slaine his brethren, princes of great valour; seauen of his nephewes, princes of no small hope; with many other of his best friends and faithfull counsellors; could make no end of his ambitious tyrannie. Wherefore they should tell Selymus, that one and all the conditions of peace should be, if he would from thenceforth desist from inuading of Hysmaell, and restore to Adadeules his sonne, his fathers kingdome, which had of long bene vnder the defence and protection of the Ægyptian Sultans, as of right and reason he ought to doe: he should in so doing beside his fauour and friendship which might greatly stand him in steed, reape greater fame and glorie by an assured and honourable peace, than by doubtfull and dangerous warre.

The embassadours, although they knew right well that Selymus would not for aty threats giue ouer his enterprise or lay downe armes; yet to the intent they might the sooner be dispatched, and so in time aduertise Selymus of the Sultans sudden comming, seemed wonderfully to like of his motion for peace, and to giue good hope by their reasonable perswasions to induce Selymus to like thereof: Forasmuch as they were of his secret counsell, and men able to doe much with him; whereby they trusted (as they would haue had the Sultan to beleue) it would easily be brought to passe, that those sparkes might be quenched, which all things standing vpright had not as yet kindled the fire of warre. So they being by Campson rewarded, and hauing leaue to depart, travelling day and night, returned to Selymus, who was then come to CASAREA.

Campson also removing from ORONTES, came into COMAGENA vnto the famous citie of ALEPPO, which citie is probably supposed to haue been built of the ruines of the auncient citie HIERAPOLIS, by Alepius the emperor Iulianus his lieutenant; who in that prouince did many notable matters, & called that new built citie after his own name. It is situate neere vnto the riuer Singa, which rising out of the mountaine PIRIVS, with many turnings and windings runneth thorough Comagena, and being but a small riuer, falleth at length into the citie Euphrates. This citie Hyalon king of the Tartars tooke and burnt, at such time as the Christian princes of the West made warre with the Ægyptian kings, for the kingdomes of SYRIA and IERUSALEM. Which calamitie notwithstanding, it was againe repeopled, and is at this day a famous citie, for the commodious situation thereof much frequented with merchants from the furthest parts of the world: It is scarce fife daies journey from TRIPOLIS and BERTVS the great ports of SYRIA, and is also neere vnto the Turkes and Persians: so that the riches of the East are thither commodiously conuaid out of Turkie, ouer the mountaine AMANVS which parteth CILICIA from SYRIA: and so likewise out of PERSIA and MESOPOTAMIA ouer the riuer Euphrates, where the citie BYRTA of late time bounded the kingdome of the Ægyptian Sultans, from the Persian.

Selymus vnderstanding by his embassadours (who had diligently noted all things in the Sultans campe) both of the comming, and of the number of his enemies; and also enformed of the Sultans proud answere, who had so peremptorily prescribed vnto him such vnreasonable conditions as pleased himselfe: thought good to alter his purpose, and now to conuert his forces another way than he had before determined. For that to enter farther into ARMENIA, leauing so puissant an enemy as Campson at his backe, seemed a thing too full of danger: and to giue ouer the

the enterprife he had with so great care and charge vnderaken, at the appointment and pleasure of another man, stood neither with his honour or state. Wherefore in a matter so doubtfull he resolved vpon a notable and necessitie point, well fitting the greatnesse of his mind. He made shew as if he would haue gone directly against the Persian, as he had before determined; and that the more certaine report of this his purpose might be carried to Campson, he sent before part of his armie with his carriages to the citie Svassia, in old time called Svasta (it standeth in the frontiers of the Persian kingdome, where the great river Euphrates pent vp with the rocks of the mountaine Tavrus, breaketh againe violently forth into Mesopotamia; but turning himselfe vpon the right hand, purposed to passe the mountaine Tavrus, and breaking suddenly into Comagena to come vpon the Sultan before he were well aware of his coming. Wherefore calling vnto him his trustie Ianizaries, with the other souldiours of the court, hee openly with cheerefull countenance declared vnto them what he had resolved to doe, with the reasons of the alteration of his former determination: perswading them, that the victorie would easily be achieved, if they as courageous souldiours would with all celeritie (before the Mamelukes could perceiue they were returned) get vp to the top of the mountaines, and recouer those difficult passages; not fearing the vaine names and titles of the Mamelukes. For why (said he) the strength of those horsemen is long since decayed and gone: the old Mamelukes, who in the time of Caitbeius were of some fame and reputation, are all dead. You shall in battell meet but with a sort of gallant horsebreakers rather than souldiours, which can cunningly mannage their horses in sport, to the pleasure of the beholders, but know not how to encounter the enimie, or to endure to be wounded: who as carpet knights offeminate with long peace, and corrupted with excesse and delicacie of their great cities, neuer saw their foes entrenched, or armed enemies, neither euer heard the sound of a trumpet but at plaies or shewes. Wherefore you are to make but small account of them, being furnished with no store of ordinance or strength of footmen. But as the reuerend interpreters of our sacred lawes and religion, haue orderly performed all their obseruances, doe diuine vnto vs all happiness: so you as men full of hope, set forward cheerfully vnto most assured victorie over your proud enemies. For God no doubt fauoureth the quarrell of men iustly prouoked, and offereth means of victorie to such as take vp iust and necessarie armes. Yet to overcome the enimie, and to enioy the victorie in deed, wholly consisteth in the courage and valour of them, which deeme nothing better or more honourable than to spend their liues for the honour of their prince and countrey. Here the Ianizaries shaking their weapons, forthwith cried out with cheerefull voice, That he should lead and conduct them whither soeuer he would: saying, That they were readie as courageous men, to overcome all the difficulties of those hard passages, and patiently to endure all the labours and dangers incident to that warre.

Selymus, by the mountaine people hauing found out the easiest passages, resolved to passe ouer the mountaine with his armie in three places: and so appointing three great companies of the common souldiours and countrey people, for the opening of the straight passages; he commaunded the rough and vncuen waies to bee made plaine and smooth, for the transporting of his ordinance, and the broken passages to be cast euen, that so his baggage and carriages might the better passe: and the more to encourage his souldiours to take paines, he promised present reward to all such as in transporting of his ordinance, should take any extraordinarie pains. Whereby it came to passe, that the same being of the smaller sort bearing bullet of no great height, was in short time by the cheerefull labour of his souldiours, drawne ouer those great hills and dales: so that in fise daies all his armie with his baggage and carriages were got ouer the mountaine Tavrus, and come into the plaines of Comagena. For that mountaine where it taketh the name of Amans, which is almost in the middle where the river Euphrates parteth the mountaine Tavrus, and the bay Issicus, is neither exceeding high, or yet impassable: for as it cometh neerer the sea, it is not so rough as elsewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilled by the mountaine Cilicians, a fierce kind of people accustomed to labour and toile, who are now called Caramannians, which is to say, the inhabitants of the blacke mountaines; for that the burnt rocks of the mountaine seeme a farre off to be blacke.

Alibeg which betraied Aladeules, whom Selymus had a little before sent for, as soon as the armie was come downe into the frontiers of the enemies country, with a strong power of his light hortemen, speedily ouertan all that countrey which is at the foot of Amans and Tavrus: therby to vnderstand of the countrey people and such as they could take prisoners, where Camp-

son lay with his armie; and also by keeping the passages to doe what possibly might be done, that Selymus his coming might not be knowne to the enimie.

But Campson, who with no lesse vanitie than pride had fondly flattered himselfe, onely by the authoritie & greatnesse of his name to haue terrified Selymus, and ouerruled him at his pleasure; could not be perswaded that he was come ouer the mountaine Amans, vntill certaine newes was brought him; that he was encamped with a most puissant armie within two daies march of him. With which v unexpected newes being sore troubled, and in the midst of that danger to seeke counsell, as one which began rightly to consider of his owne strength, and the strength of his enimie; began then to doubt what were best for him to doe, and in great perplexitie sometime hoped well, and by and by was as a man halfe discouraged and dismayed. And now become exceeding carefull both of his honour and himselfe, he began to doubt, whether it were better for him to giue place to so great a danger, and shunning battell to retire with his armie into places of more safetie; or els courageously to abide the coming of his enemies, and to hazard the fortune of a battell, although it were vpon great disadvantage: Forasmuch as he reputed it farre more honourable after the example of his predecessors from whom he had receiued that great kingdome (both gotten and kept by martiall prowesse) to die with honour in the field; than by shamefull and vntoonted flight, either to blemish their militarie glorie continued aboue the space of 300 yeares, or for loue of a small remainder of life, being now 77 yeares old, to seeme willing to referue vnto obloquie and shame his last daies, deprived of all honour and reputation.

There were amongst his chiefe taines many, which preferred wholesome counsell before that which was in shew more glorious: but aboue all others one Iamburd, surnamed Gazelles, (sometimes the follower of great Caitbeius) a valiant man of great honour, for his long experience in martiall affaires, and at that time gouernor of Apamia. He, as he was of opinion, That to fight with the Turkes armie, consisting for most part of expert soldiours, with so small a power, were a thing of desperat danger; so was he also, that it were good speedily to retire, and to chuse the citie of Damasco, as the fittest place for those warres: for as much as the Turkes armie could make no halt after them, by reason of their footmen and carriages, so that they might at ease and with safetie retire; and there calling together all the Mamelukes which were in garrison in Idba and Eoir, and entertaining the Arabians their neighbours, to protract the warre vntill Winter, when as they might easily distresse the enimie for want of victuall. And that it was not to be feared, that Alep, if it were furnished but with a reasonable garrison, could by and by be taken of the enimie, who had but small field peeces not fit for batterie. Beside that, in short time aide would come from the Persians out of Mesopotamia; yea and Hysmaell himselfe hearing of the Turkes expedition into Syria, was like ynough to breake into Asia the lesse: neither would the Christians refuse to furnish them with great artillerie from the Islands of the Rhodes and Cyprus against that common enimie, if they were thereto in time requested. All which things being laied together, hee said the Sultan might afterward vpon each hand, goe into the field, if he should thinke it so much to concerne his honour, to giue his enemies battaile. But for as much as the greatest warres, which at the first had most violent and most furious motions, by the politicke enemies delay did most commonly in time grow calme, hee should not therefore make too much hast to aduenture the fortune of battaile: for that the errors of warre, which many times chanced through the oversight or rashnesse of the chiefe taines, might well of good men be lamented and detested, but hardly or neuer recouered or amended. Gazelles his graue and considerat speech had much moyed both the Sultan and others: yet the cheerefulness of the souldiours, and foolish hardinesse of the Mamelukes did so fill Campson with cares, that he could not hearken to so good and wholesome counsell: for as soone as they heard certainly of the coming of the Turkes, they began to leape and daunce, and to reioyce among themselves, that the time was come wherein they might make prooffe of their valour, and winne themselves honour. For now (as they said) was come that time they had long wished for, where in they would by notable slaughter of their enemies, aduance the honour and maiestie of Campson their Sultan far aboue the fame of Caitbeius. And some euen of the chiefe men about Campson, vpon flatterie and vaine ostentation, alledging how honourably and with what small labour they had before ouerthrowne the Turkes great armie at Tarsus, perswaded him, that the victorie would easily and without any great danger be gotten. But especially Cayrebeius gouernor of

of ALEPPO and of the prouince of COMAGENA (who after his warre ended, was in reward of his foule treason by Selymus vnworthily preferred to the greatest honours of EGYPT) extolling with glorious words the faithfulness, courage and valour of the Mamalukes, and extenuating the strength and power of the enemy, forced his wits to the uttermost to ouerthrow the wholesome counsell of Gazelles.

A secret grudge betweene Camp-son and Cayer-beius gouernour
of Comagena.

For this Cayerbeius for all his faire face bare a grudge in heart against Campson, because he had some few yeares before poysoned his brother, whom he had in ialousie, being a man next to himselfe of greatest power, wealth, and authoritie amongst the Mamalukes, and withall of an aspiring mind. Whereupon Cayerbeius afterwards thinking it good to looke to himselfe, and doubting the like practise to be intended against himselfe; being, as the manner of that kingdome was, summoned to a parliament at CAIR, fained himselfe sicke, and would not come: where with Campson was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it best to dissemble the matter and to await some fitter oportunitie for the taking away of that proud man, so forgetfull of his dutie, and bearing himselfe against his soueraigne, as if he had been an absolute king in his owne prouince. This he thought might most couertly be brought to passe, if he should vpon the occasion of the present warre (as it then fell out) or els vnder the colour of going in person himselfe to the riuier Euphrates, come to ALEPPO: for it was the manner of the antient Egyptian Sultans, not to account themselves worthie of the name of a Sultan or great Generall, before they had as Catbeius had of late done, encamped their armie vpon the side of the riuier Euphrates at the citie BYRTA (which standing vpon the banke of the riuier, retaineth at this day both the antient name and fame) and there with solempne pompe had in the sight of the armie forced their horses into the riuier to drinke: giuing to vnderstand by that ceremonie, the greatnesse of their empire, and that they were readie by force of armes to proue, that all those countries were theirs which lay alongst the riuier Euphrates, from the mountaine TAVRVS vnto the deserts of ARABIA. But the consideration of this war letted that hee did not at his first comming oppresse him, because he deemed it to stand best with his present affaires: and not yet knowing the purpose of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turkes and Persians, and to deferre the execution of his wrath against Cayerbeius, vntill the end of the warre: for feare least the other Mamalukes, dismayed with the hainousnesse of the suddaine fact, should either reuolt from him, or els raise some mutinie or rebellion in that populous citie. For Cayerbeius had by his courtisie and bountie many strong companies in the armie fast bound vnto him: and beside that, was of greatest credit and authoritie with them of ALEPPO, hauing in his keeping a strong citadell, built vpon the rising of an hill in the midst of the citie, which he kept with a strong and sure garrison.

But whiles Campson doth thus slowly and considerately purpose his destruction, many of the Sultans secret friends, to him more officious than faithfull, secretly aduised Cayerbeius to beware of the Sultan, and by some good meanes in time to prouide for his owne safetie. He vnderstanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, sent secret messengers vnto Selymus, discovering vnto him the cause of his greefe, and promising as occasion should serue to come ouer vnto him, and to deliuer into his power the castle with the hearts of the citizens, and all the strength of his owne horsemen; thereby to prouide for his owne safetie, to reuenge his brothers death, and to further his victorie against Campson: and for performance of promises on both sides, required secret hostages to be giuen. By the same messengers he also aduertised him, what strength the Sultan was of, perswading him in any case to make hast to giue him battaile, before hee had gathered any greater power. Selymus nothing doubted to condescend to all that the traitor had requested, promising of himselfe farre greater things than ever he had required: assuring himselfe of the victorie, if his enemy should lose so much of his strength by the reuolt of so great a commander.

Campson enforced by the generall consent of his souldiours, and the violence of his inevitable destinie, then at hand, rejecting the good and faithfull counsell of Gazelles, at such time as Selymus was reported to be at hand; resolved according to the counsell of the traitour Cayerbeius, to dare him battell. He lay conveniently encamped vpon the riuier Singa, almost ten miles from the citie, in such sort as that his souldiours might vse the benefit of the riuier, and removed from the houses and pleasures of the citie, might yet neuertheless be easily releued with the store and plenty thereof.

as he was of greater place or calling, so had he attending vpon him more seruants, well furnished with horse and armour. A goodly and inuincible armie, if the battaile might haue been tried by true valour. The Mamalukes wearing their beards long and rough, with graue and sterne countenance, hauing strong and able bodies, vsed such cunning in all their fights and battailes, that after they had giuen the first charge with their launces, they would by and by with wonderfull aduirtise vse their bowes and arrowes, casting their targuets behind them; and forthwith the horsemans mace or crooked scimitar, as the manner of the battaile or place required. Their horses were strong and courageous, in making and swiftnesse much like vnto the Spanish Iennets; and that which is of many hardly beleueed, so docible, that at certaine signes or speeches of the rider, they would with their teeth reach him vp from the ground a launce, an arrow, or such like thing; and as if they had knowne the enemy, run vpon him with open mouth, and lash at him with their heeles, and had by nature and custome learned, not to be afraid of any thing. These courageous horses were commonly furnished with siluer bridles, guilt trapping, rich saddles, their neckes and breasts armed with plates of yron: the horseman himselfe was commonly content with a coat of maile or a breastplate of yron. The cheefe and wealthiest of them vsed headpieces; the rest a linnen couering of the head, curiously foulded into many wreathes, wherewith they thought themselves safe ynough against any handie strokes: the common souldiours vsed thrummed caps, but so thicke, as that no sword could pierce them.

Campson of all his armie made fise battailes: The first was committed to Cayerbeius, because it was in his owne prouince where the battaile was to be fought. The second was led by Sybeius, who for his wonderfull aduirtise was of them called Baluan, which in their language signifieth a tumbler, or one that sheweth feats of aduirtise; he was gouernour of DAMASCO, a man of singular faith and valour. These two great commanders were appointed at once to charge both the wings of the Turkes armie. After them followed Gazelles with the third battaile, to second either the one or the other of the two formost, as need should require. Campson himselfe led the fourth, all glittering in guilt armour, behind the rest almost a mile and a halfe. The last was left for defence of the campe.

The order of Campson battell

But Selymus according to his wonted manner so ordered his battaile, that his Asian horsemen were in the right wing, his European horsemen in the left, his Ianizaries and artilerie in the maine battaile: before whom, in the middle betweene the two wings he had placed his most valiant and gallant pentioners, amongst whom, contrarie to his wonted custome, he chose to serue that day.

The order of Selymus his battell.

Cayerbeius as soone as he was come neere the enemy (in token of his braue courage) gaue a hote charge vpon the European horsemen; and by and by, as if hee would haue compassed in that wing, wheeled a great way about behind them: where chauncing vpon a great companie of scullions, drudges, and other base people that followed the campe, with an infinit number of cammels and carriages, hee made there a great stirre, with little slaughter, that as a valiant and cunning traitour he might in the selfesame time satisfie the expectation of his valour and of his treason together. In the other wing, the gouernour of DAMASCO to enter vpon the open side of the enemy, forbearing to charge him affront, and turning about his troups on the left hand, entred ouerthwart their ranks: where the Mamalukes fought with such furie, that hauing made great slaughter of the Asian horsemen, they brake in amongst them, as if it had bene a raging flood, bearing all downe before them, vntill they came to the ensignes in the midst of that wing: neither could Mustapha the Beglerbeg (who was by birth an Hungarian, and Selymus his brother in law) neither the Imbrahor-Bassa (or master of the house) although they did what they might to withstand him, after the first were ouerthrowne, stay the rest, but that they would needs turne their backs and fle. So Sybeius as a valiant conquerour hauing cut in two peeces the right wing of the enemies battaile, and thrusting in betwixt the battaile of the footmen and the backs of the pentioners, brought a great terrour and feare vpon the whole maine battaile. The matter was now brought to extreame danger: for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeius was almost cut off from his footmen, in whom he had reposed his greatest confidence. And now the Ianizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles, who following the fortune of Sybeius had set vpon the head of the enemies battaile. The Asian horsemen also being put to the worse, and cut in peeces, found no meanes how to restore againe their disordered battaile.

In this extremitie Sinan Bassa in good time came in with his horsemen: by his comming, for that that he had bene but lightly charged by Cayerbeius the traitour, and had brought with him many fresh troupes of horsemen, the furie of the Mamalukes was repressed, the Turkes againe encouraged, and the victorie shortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great artillerie being by the commaundement of Selymus at the same time discharged amongst them, by the terrible thundring whereof, the Mamalukes horses somewhat troubled, could not so well as before be ruled: neither could the men themselves, although they were of wonderfull courage, much preuaile, being on euery side oppressed with the multitude of their enemies. Yet in that distresse being nothing dismayed, although they were by Cayerbeius and their good fortune forsaken, they were not to seeke either of courage or direction; but setting themselves close together, they brake through the midst of their enemies, with great slaughter of the European horsemen, and hurt of the pensioners; and so with speed fled towards the campe and citie. After whom followed Sinan Bassa with the readiest and freshest troupes of his horsemen: for Selymus, (who that day in the extreame heat, for his wonderfull paines, courage, and direction, seemed undoubtedly greater than himselfe) riding vp and downe, called earnestly vpon his souldiours to venge the victorie, and with all speed to pursue their flying enemies.

The death of Campson.

Campson had now (his destinie so leading him) set forward, of purpose to come to the reliefe of his men sent before; or if the Turkes should be overcome, to be partaker of the victorie: when vpon the way, he vnderstood by them that fled, that Cayerbeius was revolted, his armie overthrowne, and the terrour so great, as that the flight of his souldiours was not now possibly to be staied: beside that to augment the feare, it was reported, that the multitude of his enemies, and force of their artillerie was so great, that they were not then, to bee encountered. With which heauie newes, the proud old man, who in the perpetuall course of his good fortune had neuer tasted of euill hap, was readie for sorrow and griefe of mind to haue sunk downe to the ground. And forthwith, his owne men, and the enemy pursuing them, comming vpon him, who in their headlong course without regard ouerthrew whomsoeuer they met, euery man making shift for himselfe without respect of others harmes: he being a corpulent man of great yeares, and beside the heauinesse of his armour troubled also with a rupture, overcome with heat and griefe of mind, fainted in that great presse; and so falling downe, was without regard troden to death, after he had with great maiestie governed the kingdomes of Egypt, Libya, and Syria many yeares. The valiant Tetrarchs of Damasco and Tripolis, whilst others fled for life, either to the campe or to the citie of Aleppo, labouring in the hindermost of their flying troupes to repress the force of their pursuing enemies, were both fighting honourably, slaine. Selymus erecting a few tents in the same field wherein the battell was fought, & keeping most part of his armie in armes, slept not all that night, but stood fast as a man not yet assured of his victorie or good fortune; fearing least men of so great valour as were the Mamalukes, should in the couert of the night returne and set vpon him in his campe: for hee knew right well, that they were overcome and put to flight, rather by the treacherie of Cayerbeius and furie of his great ordinance, than by the valour of his souldiours. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainly vnderstood of the death of Campson, hauing giuen their horses a short bait, departed in hast from Aleppo to Damasco. The next day, Selymus remouing with his armie, took the rich tents of his enemies full of all princely store, which he gaue vnto his souldiours for a prey: and marching from thence to Aleppo, had the citie peaceably deliuered vnto him by Cayerbeius, where he fauourably tooke the citizens into his protection; and the more to win their hearts, granted vnto them greater priuiledges than they had in former time enjoyed.

Aleppo deli-uered to Selymus by Cayerbeius
the traitor.

In this battell were slaine not aboute a thousand Mamalukes, but of their seruants and followers a greater number; mo being slaine in the flight than in the fight, when as their horses fainting for heat, and dying vnder them for thirst, many of them were enforced to betake themselves to their feet, and so were easily slaine of euery base horseman. For a great number of goodly horses died there, which being foggie fat, and delicatly brought vp in cold stables, could not endure the vehemencie of the heat and that vnacquainted trauell: for that day all things were burnt with the scorching heat of the Sunne.

This famous battell was fought the seauenth of August, in the yeare, of our Lord 1516, the verie same day (which is strange to tell) whereon but two yeares before, he had obtained the victorie against Hyssmaell the great Sophi in the Calderan fields. Selymus lost in this battell three thousand horsemen: whereby it may easily be gathered, that he had there receiued a notable ble ouerthrow of his horsemen; if Sinan Bassa in the left wing, which by the treason of Cayerbeius escaped with small losse, had also happened vpon his Sybeius, as the other Generall did.

The dead bodie of Campson found two daies after without any wound appearing therupon, was by the commaundement of Selymus laied forth in open place for all men to behold; that such as beleued him yet to liue, and to be gone to repaire his armie at Cairo, might be out of all hope of his returne; and others that were alreadye reholted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all feare of him. Not long after, when the dead bodie began to putrefie and grow noisome, and to conuince the same of his escape; had lien openly to the view of all men by the space of three daies, it was without any funerall pompe or solemnitie simply buried in the most auncient temple of Aleppo. Of the rising and fall of this great man, Ianus Vilius hath written this elogium or epitaph.

In English thus.

Fortune, well cal'd both deafe, and blind,
And thereto fond with all,
Thou setst the beggar vp aloft,
To worke his greater fall.
Thou peeuish dame, more sudden than The thunder clap from hie, Rejects the suites of greedie wights,
Which to thee call and crie.
And lauishly consumes thy selfe,
And whatsoe' else thou hast,
On such as craue nothing of thee,
Nor wish nor to be grac't:
As Campson Gaurus seeking nought, Ne crauing ought of thee:
Against his will by fouldiours rage, was rais'd from base degree.
And soaring vp above the clouds, Made king of Ægypt land, Receiu'd amongst the highest starrs,
Did there in glorie stand.
But forthwith falling thence, oppress
With rebels, warre, and age:
Became the scoone of thine ouerthwart
Most fierce and fickle rage.
And so with life, together lost A world of wealth also:
Which with his stately kingdome great,
He greatest did forgoe.

Selymus commeth to Da-masco.

Selymus having receiued the citie of ALEPPO into his obeisance, sent Ionuses Bassa before him with a great part of his light horsemen, to pursue his flying enemies to DAMASCO, whither he himselfe in few daies after came also with the rest of his armie, when he vnderstood that his enemies were departed thence and fled to CAIRE. They of DAMASCO, thinking it not to stand with their good to stay the course of his victorie, and with their liues to hazard the the great wealth of that rich citie; without delay presently opened vnto him the gates at his coming. By whose example other cities alongt the sea coast moued, especially TRIPOLIS, BARYTUS, SYDON, and POTLEMAIS, sending their embassadors, and receiuing in the Turkes gar-risons, yeelded themselves in like manner.

Not long after Selymus held a great counsell in his campe, which then lay vnder the wals of DAMASCO: for he would not bring his fouldiours into the citie for troubling the quiet and populous state thereof, together with the great trade of merchandise, which at that time was with wonderfull securitie kept there by merchants of diuers countries, comming from far, euen from the remotest parts of the world. And in the campe such was the militarie discipline of that most seuerie commaunder, that the fouldiours (knowing the victorie to giue them no whit the more libertie) suffered the fruitfull orchards and gardens of the citisens, in the most plentiful time of Autumne, to rest in safetie vntouched, without any keeper. By which seuerie and strait goiernment he so politikelly prouided against all wants, that his campe was in all parts furnished with plenty of all things necessarie, and that at prices reasonable. There taking vnto him men skilfull in the lawes and customes of the countrey, and calling before him the embassadors of all the cities of the countrey; he heard and decided the greatest controuerfies of the Syrians, appointed gouernours ouer the prouinces and cities, tooke view of the tributes and customes, and abrogated many customes and tributes due vnto the old Sultans, which seemed either vnreasonable or grieuous to the people; thereby to gaine the fame of a iust and bountifull conqueror.

pline in Selymus

When he had thus set all things in order in SYRIA, and sufficiently rested and refreshed his armie, and especially his horses which with long and continuall trauell were growne maigre and leane: he of nothing more desirous than of the conquest of ÆGYPT, and the vtter subuersion of the Sultans state and Mamalukes gouernment; sent before Sinan Bassa into IVDBA with fiftene thousand horsemen, and a strong regiment of harquebusiers selected out of the Ianizaries and other fouldiours, to trie the passage of that countrey, and to open the way for him to GAZA: which was thought would be vnto him verie troublesome, by reason of the wilde Arabians roaming vp and downe that countrey. The citie of GAZA standeth neere the sea towards ÆGYPT, not farre from the sandie desarts, whereby men with much difficultie and dangerous trauell passe out of SYRIA and so to CAIRE.

In the meane time, the Mamalukes who vnder the conduct of Gazelles were come to CAIRE, with all the rest of their order which were thither assembled from all parts of the kingdome, entering into counsell together (as it often falleth out in time of danger and distresse) without all contention or enuie, chose Tomombeius (of the Turkes called Tuman-bai) a Circassian borne, to be their king. He was then the great Diadare, and by his office next in honour and power vnto the Sultan; whose prowesse & pollicie was such, that he only in the opinion of all the Mamalukes was thought able and sufficient to stay and vphold the afflicted and declining state of their kingdome. He by their generall consent and good liking promoted to the state of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his owne majestic, and the remainder of the Mamalukes hopes, to bee wholly reposed in armes and the fortune of battell: began with great carefulnesse and singular indutrie to prouide armour, weapons, and horses from all places; hee also caused great store of ordinance to be cast, and mustered great companies of such of his slaues as seemed meet for the warres: beside that, he entertained for pay many of the Moores and Arabians his neighbours. He also for great reward hired men skilfull of the countries, to go through the desarts of the Palmyrens into MESOPOTAMIA, and so to Hysmaell the Persian king with letters: earnestly requesting him to invade the Turkes dominions in ASIA the lesse, or with all speed to breake into COMAGENA, being by the departure of the enemy left bare and destitute of sufficient gar-risons: and farther to aduertise him, That Selymus who then lay in the borders of IVDBA, might easily be enclosed with their two armies, and so be vanquished, or for want of victuals distressed: and the rather, for that there was no fleet of the Turkes vpon that coast; able from sea to relieue their armie by land, or yet to transport them thence in case they should by chance of warre be distressed, and so thinke to returne. In which doing, he should both relieue the Egyptian Sultan his friend and confederat, for his sake brought into so great danger; and also without any great trouble or perill notably reuenge himselfe of so many shamefull injuries as he had before receiued from that his most capital enemy. Whilest Tomombeius doth these things, Sinan Bassa the forerunner of Selymus, hauing easily repulsd diuers companies of the wild Arabians, who in manner of theeves and robbers lay vpon the passages, had now opened the way and was come to GAZA: where the citizens, although they were in heart faithfull vnto the Mamalukes, yet for that to shut their gates against the Bassa, &c to stand vpon their guard without a sufficient garison, seemed a matter both perillous and vnreasonable, forthwith yeelded their citie vpon reasonable composition: and with the plentie thereof relieved the Turkes Bassa, giuing him great (but disguised) thanks, that by his means and the good fortune of Selymus, they were deliuered from the cruell bondage of the Mamalukes: promising for the remembrance of so great a benefite, for euer to remaine his faithfull seruants. Sinan commending their readie good will, required of them all such things as he wanted, or had occasion to vse, which they seemed willingly to deliuer: and so lodged his armie neere vnto the wals of the citie, within the defence of the gardens, purposing in that place to expect the comming of Selymus.

In the meane time (as he was a man of great experience, and most skillfull in martiall affaires) he fought by all meanes to get knowledge of that desert and vnpeopled countrey, not inhabited for lacke of water; and especially of the nature of the great sands whereby Selymus was with his armie to passe; he also wooon by rewards the inhabitants of the countrey thereabout, by large offers to procure vnto him the fauour of the cheefetaines and leaders of the Arabians, neere vnto those places, and also to espie what the Mamalukes did at CAIRE, and wherein they reposed their cheefe confidence, and forthwith to giue him knowledge thereof.

On the other side, the citizens of GAZA, in heart enemies vnto the Turkes, as dayly feeling the grieuances of the present armie, aduertised Tomombeius of the comming of Sinan Bassa: and that that part of the Turkes armie might easily bee oppressed before the comming of Selymus, if a strong power of Mamalukes were sent thither vnder the conduct of skillfull leaders: promising, that if the Mamalukes would at an appointed time vpon the sudden in the night set vpon the sleepe Turkes, they would at the same instant fallie out of the citie vpon the campe, and there with fire and sword doe what harme they could for the ouerthrow of the enemy.

Of this deuise, Tomombeius and the Mamalukes liked well, and so without delay sent Gazelles with six thousand chosen horsemen, and a great number of the Arabians to performe the exploit vpon Sinan: for Gazelles, in that his wholesome counsell had been by Campson &c others rejected (who being straight way desirous of battell, had rashly cast themselves and the whole state into so great calamitie) and afterwards in the greatest danger of the battell hauing performed all the parts of a politicke and valiant cheefetaine, was growne into such credit, that all men held a great opinion both of his valour and direction.

of the comming of Gazelles, ga-ue his rely to meet him.

But he was scarcely well set forth, when aduertisement was giuen vnto Sinan by his Syrian intelligencers, That the Mamalukes with the Arabians were comming through the sandie deserts vpon the sudden to oppress him; and that they would be with him before two dayes were expired, for as much as they had set forward vpon the spurre without any carriages or baggage to let them. Which ouerture in good time giuen, as it was the safegard of Sinans armie, so was it of greatest importance and moment for the obtaining of the full conquest of AEGIPT afterward. But Sinan Bassa, although he knew nothing of the trecherie of them of GAZA; yet as a man of a prouident and subtil witt, suspecting that such a thing might happen, because he would not at once haue to do with a double enemy, resolved to go and meet the Mamalukes vpon the way, and to giue them battell. Wherefore with great silence dislodging his armie betwixt ten and twelue a clocke in the night, he set forward and marched out of sight of the citie, about fifteene miles toward AEGIPT. There was neere vnto that place a little low village, wherein trauellours vsed commonly to lodge, for the commodiousnesse of a liuely and plenteous spring which there riseth: there by chance both Sinan Bassa had purposed to stay, and Gazelles in like manner had also determined to rest a few houres to refresh his armie, that he might by night, after he had well refreshed his horses, come vnlooked for vpon his enemies at GAZA; when newes was brought to both the Generals almost at one instant, by the forerunners of both the armies, That the enemy was at hand.

Gazelles not a little troubled with that vnexpected newes, for that he perceiued himselfe disappointed of his purpose; and vnable to fight with his enemy in plaine battaile, especially his horses being sore wearied with trauell, was enforced vpon the suddaine for the safegard of himselfe and of his followers, to resolve vpon a new resolution: yet nothing discouraged, with cheerefull countenance and liuely speech exhorted his souldiours, to make themselves readie for battaile, battaile, and that which they could not by policie bring to passe, they should now by plain force performe. Sinan on the other side hauing somewhat sooner set his men in order of battell than had Gazelles, for as much as hee had before at good leisure taken order what hee would haue done, if it should come to the point of battell: with constant looke and long persuasions full of hope, encouraged his souldiours to fight. But the conclusion of all his speech was, That they should play the men, and not once thinke of flight, for as much as all places about them would be shut vp and become impassable, if they obtained not the victorie: and that about all things they should persuade themselves, that no one of them could that day perish, but such as the immortal God had by the ineuitable law of fatall destinie appointed to die: and that with like hazard valiant men found life in the midst of their enemies weapons, that cowards by immutable destinie found death in their safest flight.

The Bassa had placed his harquebusers in the wings of his battell, which were raunged of a great length in thin ranks, thereby to vse their peeeces at more libertie, and with more ease to enclose the enemy: in the middle were placed the horsemen, to receiue the first charge of the Mamalukes. Gazelles approaching the enemy, sent before the troupes of the Arabian light horsemen to trouble the wings of the enemies battell, and with a square battell of his Mamalukes charged the middle battell of the Turkes. The battell was a great while most terrible, and the victorie doubtfull: for although the Turkes in number farre exceeded, yet were they not able to endure the armed and courageous Mamalukes, but were glad to giue ground; and quite disordered by the breaking in of the Mamalukes, as men discouraged, began to looke about them which way they might flie: when by the commaundement of Sinan, the harquebusers, who with the first volley of their shot had repulsed the Arabians, wheeling about, enclosed all the enemies battell. By which means both men and horse were a farre off flaine, with the multitude of the deadly shot: where true valour helped not them, so on euery side enclosed. For where any troupe of the Mamalukes pressed forward vpon the Turkes, they quickly retired, and in all places of the battell as much as they could shunned to encounter their enemies with their horsemen, labouring onely to gale them with shot. Gazelles seeing his horses spent with extreame wearinesse, and that he was not to expect any further helpe, his Arabians now beginning to fall from him; and also considering that many of his most valiant souldiours were either flaine or wounded, and hauing also himselfe receiued a great wound in his necke; he with the rest of his armie made way through the midst of his enemies, and hauing lost diuers of his ensignes, fled backe againe to CAIRE through the same sandie deserts whereby he came. In this battell was lost the gouernour of ALEXANDRIA, and Orchamus gouernour of CAIRE (both men of great account amongst the Mamalukes) and beside them a great number of Arabians, with a thousand or more of the Mamaluke horsemen. Neither got Sinan a joyfull or vnbloudie victorie, hauing lost about two thousand of his best horsemen, and amongst them certaine commanders, men of great marke.

The Turkes wearie of this battell, which had endured from noone till night, and many of their horses fainting vnder them, were not able to pursue their enemies, and therefore encamped themselves in the same place where the battell was fought, neere vnto the fountaine. The day following they at leisure gathered the spoile, and cutting off the heads of their enemies, which were easily knowne by their long and rough beards, fastened them vp vpon the Date trees growing thereby, as well in witnesse of their worthie labour, as by that strange and horrible spectacle to feed the eyes of their fierce emperor, who was shortly after to passe that way, and so to manifest vnto him the victorie of that day.

In the meane time, they of GAZA vpon the rising of the Sunne, perceiuing the Turkes campe left empty, as men not able longer to dissemble their couert trecherie; and vainly supposing that Sinan Bassa vpon some knowledge of the comming of the Mamalukes, had for feare retired backe into places of more safetie, suddenly set vpon such as were left in the campe, which were for most part sicke and weake men (yet in number many) whom they most cruelly slew: & presently after set vpon two thousand of the Turkes horsemen, sent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the same day, enquiring with great carelesse what was become of the Bassa and his armie; and spoiling them of their carriages, put them to flight. Who after that discomfiture, supposing the Bassa (whom they had thought to haue found at GAZA, tarrying for the comming of Selymus) by some mishap or policie of the enemy to haue been lost with all all his armie, and therefore fearefully retiring, were vpon the way miserably slaine by the Arabians: neither had any one of them escaped, if they had not met with Iuleb the gouernour of Achaia at the citie of Rama: for he was also sent from Selymus to Sinan Bassa with a strong companie of Gracian horsemen, by whose comming the furie of the Arabians was well repressed. Yet these pilfering people still calling forth to the prey more and more of their leaders which dwelt in the mountaines adjoyning, and being growne to a great armie, ouertooke the Turkes at a village called Caraseara, where they enforced them to fight in a place of great disadvantage. For the Arabians hauing before taken certaine straits, which closed in the passage at the further end of a large valley, shewed themselves at once, before, behind, and on both sides of the Turkes: their weapons were bow and arrowes, and long speares armed at both ends, which they nimble handled, after the manner of the Moores. These weapons they most skillfully vsed vpon their swift horses, and both in their charge and retreat wounded their enemies deadely. So that the Turkes in number few, and for their horsemenes staues inferior to their enemies, durst not offer to charge them; but keeping close together, hardly defended themselves, still making way as they might: and had vndoubtedly beene brought into extreame danger to haue beene utterly lost, had not Iuleb with foure peeces of artillerie which he brought with him for his defence, drawne them which kept the straits from their high places, and so opening the way, with all speed brought thorow his men: which straits once passed, and comming into the open fields, he with more safetie marched forward, skirmishing a farre off with the enemy with his arches and harquebusiers, and discharging his field peeces where he saw the greatest and thickest troupes of those wild people.

On the other part, the Arabians disperedly houering about them in troupes, were still in the taile of the armie, and such as were wounded or weake and could not follow the rest, they slew; and sought by all meanes to hinder their journey, not suffering them (circumuented with so many dangers) either to refresh themselves, or to take any rest. This was vnto the Turkes a most dismal day, for many of them tormented with thirst, and weakened with wounds and extreame labour, gaue vp the ghost; and now no helpe remained in this desperate estate, being still beset and hardly laied to with the multitude of those fierce and desperat enemies: when suddainely a great number of other Turkes came to them in the mid way vnlooked for, being now in despaire and euen at the last cast. For Selymus hauing left the Imbrahor-Bassa with a strong armie vpon the borders of Persia, for the defence of Syria and Asia, and hauing sent for new supplies of souldiours to Constantinople, which should with a great fleet be transported into Syria, had now remoued from Damasco: and the better to prouide for victuals and forrage, which began now to grow scant in that wasted countrey, euery day sent before great troupes and companies of his armie, as it were at certaine appointed times.

So Iuleb deliuered of the present danger by the comming in of these fresh souldiours, met with Selymus the next day, and in order told him all that had happened vnto him and his first troupes at Gaza and Rama, and all the way after: and also what they supposed by conjectures to haue chanced to Sinan Bassa with his armie, for the manifold wyles of so dangerous enemies. With which newes Selymus became exceeding melancholie: and thereupon thought it not good to goe any further, before he perfectly knew how all stood with Sinan, in whose fortune he had reposed all the hope of his good successe in that so great an enterprize. But whilest hee was in this dumpe, suddenly came the Syrian spies, who declaring vnto him all that Sinan Bassa had done, conuerted that melancholie passion into no lesse joy and gladnesse: for he saw that by that victorie, Egipt was laid open vnto him, and his desires as good as halfe accomplished in lesse time than euer he expected.

The next day after, he remoued with his armie to Rama, and by the way as he went (to the terror of others) burnt the dwellings together with the wiues and children of those Arabians, who but a little before had done so much harme to his men in their passage. And from thence sending before his footmen to Sinan Bassa at Gaza, hee himselfe with his horsemen turned out of the way vpon the left hand to Hierusalem, to visit that most antient and famous citie, so much renowned both for the antiquitie thereof, and the fame of the religion of the Iewes. That vnpeopled and desolate citie lay then defaced with the huge ruines of the old sacred and stately buildings; not inhabited by the Iewes, the antient inhabitants thereof (who for their inexpiable guilt, as men exiled out of the world, haue neither country or resting place) but for most part by a few poore Christians, who to the great shame and scorne of the Christian name, paid yearly a wonderfull tribute vnto the Sultan of Egipt for the possession of the sacred sepulchre: when as the Christian princes flourishing at that time with glorie, power and wealth, could not by any motive of immortall glorie or fame, be incited to reuenge so great an iniurie; but deeming it (as should seeme) better agreeing with their state, to spend their time in idle vanities or mortall warone against an other, than in the quartrell of the most true and Christian religion.

Selymus hauing reuerently worshipped the auntient monuments of the old prophets, and done especiall sacrifice vnto his great prophet Mahomet; gaue vnto the Christian priests keepers of the place (as vnto good and deuout men) money to maintaine them for six moneths: and staying at Hierusalem but one night, marched in foure daies to the rest of his army at Gaza. Where by the way, he had continuall skirmishes both day and night with the Arabians: for they according to their wonted manner, were desperately at hand in euerie place; and where the straightnesse of the waies enforced the Turkes to extenuat their rankes, there would they be ready to skirmish with them, and suddenly vnlooked for come to handie blowes: and when they came into the vallies, they tumbled downe the mountaines vpon them great stones which they had for that purpose before prouided. At which time the Turkes harquebusiers in whom they had greatest confidence, serued them to little purpose: for the weather was so tempestuous and extreame moist with continuall raine, that the powder in their flasks became wet and vnseruicable, and hardly could they keepe fire in their matches. Yet by the valiantnesse of the Ianizaries the matter was so vfed, that neere vnto the person of the emperour no great harme was done by those naked robbers: for climbing vp the hills with pikes in their hands, they driue them from their standings, and enforced them to abandon the straights and high places.

But Sinan Bassa who after his victorie returning to Gaza, had put to death the authors of the late reuolt, confiscated their goods, and exacted of the people in generall a great sum of money, as the iust punishment of their false treacherie: hearing now of the comming of Selymus, went to meet him with his victorious souldiours, furnished with the spoiles of their enemies. Vvhom Selymus most honourably receiued, and gaue generally to the captaines, and particularly to the most valiant of the common souldiours, garments of silke, with a great sum of money in reward of their good seruice.

After that, he staid but foure daies at Gaza, for that he thought it not good to giue any long time of breathing vnto his discouraged enemies, now twise ouerthrowne, or to suffer the new Sultan (not yet well settled in his kingdome) to grow stronger by new preparations and supplies raised in the most populous and plentifull countrey of Egipt. Vvhich to let, although it required great hast in setting forward, and serued as spurs vnto him naturally hasting to glorie and renowne; yet was his armie to be refreshed after so long and painfull trauell, and great provision to be made for the carriage of water vpon camels all the way through the drie solitarie and sandie deserts. For betweene Gaza and Caire lie vast vnpeopled and barren sands, which moued by the wind, rise vp in billowes in manner of a wrought sea so troublesome, that oftentimes it is not possible to see for dust: and the light sands in many places gauled deepe with the wind, wonderfully troubleth the wearie passengers. But such a sudden calme ensued the great raine which fell but a few daies before, that Selymus vnto his great good fortune wanted nothing that he could wish, for the happie conducting of his armie: for the ayre was become so calme, that there was no blast of wind to raise the sand to trouble their sight; and withall such plentie of water was found almost in euerie place by reason of the abundant raine, which being not yet sunke farre into the sand, afforded them water in such plentie if they digged but two foot deepe, that the souldiours commonly thought it needlesse to carrie any bottle of water for feare of thirst. Yet for all that, the wild Arabians failed not in all that passage, on euerie side to houer about the Turkes armie (as haukes ouer their prey), and suffered none of them to straggle out of order, or stay behind the armie, but they were straightway snatcht vp and slaine. Against whom Selymus provided an easie remedie, by placing his field peeces in diuers parts of his armie, which by the direction of the leaders (as euerie man happened to be neere vnto the danger) were forthwith discharged vpon the roaming enemy. And in the rearward of his armie were placed strong companies of harquebusiers, for defence of the weake and feeble souldiours, who could but softly follow the armie, and were therefore most subject to danger.

By this meanes Selymus with some small losse receiued from the Arabians, in eight daies march

*Tomombeius seeks to entrap

march drew neere to CAIRE, Sinan Bassa going before him, who with his European souldiours still kept one daies journey before. There is a village about six miles distant from the cite of CAIRE called MATHAREA, famous for the plenty of most excellent baulme: which liquor of all others most fragrant and souveraigne, distilled out of low trees there planted, whose vntermost rind the people cut with yuorie knives to giue the liquor passage: which baulme, for the notable vertues thereof, being not elsewhere to be had, mens diseases and wanton desires haue made of a wonderfull price. Into that place neere vnto a village called RHODANTA, had Tomombeius conuaid all his new and old prouision of artillerie; and had drawne deepe ditches ouerthwart all the field, and crosse the high way, which he had closely couered ouer with weake hurdles and earth, as if it had beene firme ground. And he with his Mamalukes (in number about twelue thousand) and a great multitude of Arabian horsemen lay in places conuenient, of purpose that when the Turkish battels should approach, they should first feeble the force of his great ordinance before they came within the shot of their arrowes, and forthwith vpon great aduantage, with all his forces suddenly to set vpon them disordered and entrapped. All which things were so cunningly and so politickely dispatched and done, that there was none in the Sultans armie which doubted of the good successe of that day: and a great mischiefe had vndoubtedly befallen the Turkes, had not fortune which fauoured Selymus and frowned vpon Tomombeius (or more truly to say, the fatal period of that kingdome so requiring) by the false treacherie of a few, frustrated the great endeavors of the Mamalukes.

There was in the Sultans armie amongst the souldiours of the court, southe Epiriote Mamalukes, who grieued to see Tomombeius contrarie to their desires; preferred vnto the kingdome by others of a contrarie faction: whether it were vpon a malicious disposition, or vpon hope of reward and better entertainment; or for that in so great a declination of their kingdome, they thought it good to seeke for new friends of more assurance, fled secretly to Sinan Bassa, as to a most famous captaine and one of their owne nation. For this great commander Sinan, Selymus his right hand, was borne in a poore countrey village of EPIRVS, in the mountaine countrey of AMERACIA, whom a wonderfull mischance preferred to that height of credit and wealth: for it is reported, that a sow kept in the house wherein he was borne, bit off his genitories, being then but a child, as he lay by chance sleeping in the shadow; and being made of greater esteeme by that mishap, was by them which tooke vp delicat minions for the Turkish emperour, brought to CONSTANTINOPLE, and presented to the great emperour Mahomet; Selymus his grandchilder: where fortune by the fatal direction of his good hap, advanced him to his appointed honours, whom he had long before dismembred. By these fugitiue Mamalukes, Selymus and Sinan were instructed of all the deuises of the enemy, and especially what stratagems Tomombeius had with great cunning and pollicie deuised: whereinto they must needs fall, if they should go directly on, and not forsake the hie way. Wherefore guided by the same fugitiues, they fetched a great compasse on the left hand, and by an vnused way, before it was day hauing escaped the front of their enemies campe, with all the dangers prepared for them; they came and shewed themselves at their backs in order of battell, with their great artillerie readie bent, because they were desirous without delay to joyne battell.

Tomombeius now too late perceiving that his plot was discovered by the treason of some of his owne people, although he was therewith about measure grieued; for that all which he had with so great industrie and the labour of so many men brought to passe, was through spightfull fortune made frustrat, and in a moment brought to nought: yet for all that (as he was a man of an inuincible courage) presently entred into his wonted and deepe deuises, and calling vnto him his chiefe commanders, quickly told them what he would haue done. Now in this short moment of time, he was to doe many things at once; the signall was to be giuen for the souldiours to mount their horses, and to make themselves readie; the order of his campe was to be changed; his battell to be ordered; his souldiours to be encouraged; and all his great ordinance, as the case required, quite contrarie way to be turned: all which things, as they could but hardly and troublefomely by one commander be directed, so were they hastily and disorderedly at once done by many. But about all other things, the great concourse of people for turning and remouing the great artillerie most troubled the well ordering of the rest: for many of them were huge yron pieces of great waight, made fast in stocks of wood, with rings and yron clasps, after the old and rude manner of ship ordinance; which for their exceeding & ponderous waight, could could not be out of their places remoued, but by the strength of many horses, and the great labour of men, with leauers and roubles put vnder them: and such as were mounted vpon carriages, when they were drawne through all parts of the campe, with the great clamor of the disordered and hastie people, some drawing, some thrusting forward the same, with their tumultuous stirre and doings, wonderfully troubled the other souldiours as they were mounting to horse and repairing toward their ensignes. But two things maruellously helped these difficulties, the souldiours cheerefulness, and constancie; which was such as passeth credit: For they did not vpon any apprehension of feare faile either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it happeneth in suddaine accidents, wherein euen the old approved souldiours doe many times faile of their wonted valor. And although they were twice ouercome in battell, yet still they were of greater spirit & confidence, as men destitute neither of courage or skill, but onely of fortune.

Wherefore Tomombeius hauing with much adoe ordered his battell, and his souldiours with great cheerefulness desiring the signall to be giuen, commaunded all the multitude of his Arabians to compasse in the wings of the enemies battell behind, and so to skirmish with them: that so (if it were possible) the Turkes horsemen might with the danger of the doubtfull fight with such an vncertaine enemy, be disordered before he set forward to charge them with his troupes: and withall commaunded his great ordinance (which was now turned vpon the enemy) to be presently discharged. So did the Turkes likewise, discharging at once from a conuenient distance both their greater and smaller ordinance, and speedily recharging them, brought them within an arrow shot; so that for a good space they lay beating the one the other on both sides with their great artillerie onely: in which manner of fight the Egyptian canoniers were almost all slaine, and many of their fieldpieces broken by force of the enemies shot. For Selymus had in his campe many excellent and skilfull canoniers, whom he had with great entertainment allured out of ITALIE and GERMANIE: and especially of those refuge Iewes, which by the zeale of king Ferdinand being driuen out of SPAIN, afterwards to the shame of the Christians, dispersed those rare and deadly deuices through the East. The chiefe of these canoniers was one Iacobus de Regio Lepidi, a cunning engineer, who but a little before ouercome by the Turkes rewards, abjuring the Christian religion, resolted vnto the Mahometane superstition.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to battell on both sides, they gaue out a most hideous and dreadfull crie, and with exceeding furie assailed the Turkes in three places: for Selymus still keeping his wonted order, approached his enemies with his battell in forme of an halfe Moone. Mustapha Bassa had the leading of the Asian horsemen in the right wing: and Ionas Bassa of the Europeans in the left: he himselfe stood in the maine battell with the squadron of his trustie Ianizaries, and great store of artillerie: but Sinan the Eunuch Bassa, generall of the field, led after him a great number of most valiant horsemen, drawne out of euery troupe to be readie against all the vncertaine euents that might happen in the battell; vnto whom hee joyned five hundred harquebusiers, Ianizaries, men of wonderfull courage and actiuitie, selected out of Selymus his owne Squadron, to relieue such part of the armie as should chance to be most pressed by the enemy.

nerall of the field*

So almost at one time, whilest Tomombeius stood in the maine battell against Selymus, and the wings of the Mamalukes with equall battell encountered the wings of the Turkes, and the Arabians also valiantly charging them in the reerward as they had in charge, foure sharpe battels were at once made in diuers places. It is reported by some that were present in that battell, that what for the clamour and crie of souldiours, what for the noise of drums and trumpets and such like instruments of warre, what for the thundering of ordinance, clattering of armour, and rising of the dust, all mens minds were so confounded and abashed, that running on headlong as men furious and desperat, when neither their speeches could be heard, their tokens knowne, their ensignes seene, or captaines vnderstood, mistaking one another in that hurly burly, they slew many of their friends in steed of their enemies: for neuer battels met together with greater hatred, neither did euer two great kings with lesse care of their persons and safetie more resolutely or desperately make shew of their strength and courage. For both of them with like danger both of themselves and of their armies, seeing plainly that they had put both their liues and kingdomes to the hazard of a battell, promised vnto themselves no other hope of safetie, but what they should obtaine by victorie. Gazelles desirous both of honour and of reuenge, to requite the European horsemen with like slaughter as he had before receiued from them not far from GAZA, with with wonderfull furie assailed Ionufes Bassa, and at the first encounter brake his first ranks, and overthrew certain of his guidons: at which time the Arabians pressing couragiously in at their backs, enforced those victorious troupes, which in all battels had hitherto carried away the prize (the very flower of THRACIA, THESSALIA, EPHYRS, MACEDONIA, and GRECIA) to flee and shew their backs, which neuer enemy had before that time seene. At which time Sinan Bassa carefully attending every accident, came speedily in with his most valiant troupes of fresh men vpon the side of the enemy, and restored againe the battell, now declining and foulely disordered. But whiles Sinan, who in this his last worthie labour had interrupted the manifest victorie of Gazelles, was with an inuincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of his battell, he was by the comming in of the courageous captain Bidon with his Mamalukes, overcharged and slaine. His most valiant followers also labouring to rescue and carrie away his dead bodie, were by Gazelles vnfolding his troupes (that standing thin, they might at more libertie vse their swords, in which manner of fight the Mamalukes farre excelled the Turks) for most part slaine, and the rest put to flight: and that chosen companie of five hundred of the most valiant Janizaries, now destitute of their horsemen, when they had most courageously done what was possible for men to doe, being compassed rotund with the Mamaluke horsemen, were all in a trice cut in peeces and troden vnderfoot. Thus resteth this Eunuch Bassa in the bed of fame, who liuing, had the leading of this most warlike emperour Selymus his greatest armies in his most dangerous warres.

Mustapha in the other wing of the Turks battell comming on courageously with his Asian horsemen, did sore presse the left wing of the Egyptians (whereof Heylmis the Diadare, and Gaspal, two valiant capitaines had the leading) who but a little before had receiued great harme by the great ordinance which was discharged out of the midst of Selymus his battell ouerthwart the field: VVhich Mustapha perceiuing, and desiring to blot out the old infamie hee had before receiued, did fiercely presse vpon them, so disordered, and with his whole troupes overthrew their broken ranks; and glittering in his bright armour, with a loud voice encouraged his Asian souldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant prowesse or honourable death, to recouer their ancient honour of late lost in the fields of ALIPPUS.

At the same time also Tomombeius breaking through the middle battell of the Turks horsemen, was entred into the Squadron of the footmen, with his crooked scimitar giuing many a deadly wound, himselfe being a valiant big made man, and of great strength. The Arabians had also in a ring enclosed the vttermost parts of the Turks armie, and in many places enforced them to turne their battell vpon them, being sore charged with a doubtfull fight both before and behind: when Selymus set forward with his battell of footmen, and his Squadron of Janizaries, his last and most assured refuge in that his hard distresse, whose inuincible force, neither the courageous barbed horses, nor their victorious riders were able to abide: for part of them with their harquebusers, and the rest with their pikes, had so strongly set the front of their battell, that nothing was able to stand wherefoeuer that firme battell, linked together as if it had been but one whole entire bodie, swayed. Yet was this cruell battell continued with diuers fortune on both sides, from foure of the clocke vntill the going downe of the Sunne; neither was there any part of their armies, which had not with diuers successe and change of fortune, endured the fume of that battell: for both the victors and the vanquished being enraged with an implacable hatred one against another, fought desperately as men prodigall of their liues: The Mamalukes disdain- ing to haue the victorie wrong out of their hands by them whom they had in so many places discomfited, and the Turks taking it in no lesse scorn, that they, whom but of late they had overcome and vanquished in two great battels, should now the third time make so strong resistance. So that on both sides their fainting hands and bodies both wearied and weakened with wounds, supported only with anger and obstinacie of mind, seemed yet sufficient to haue maintained that bloudie battell vntill the next day, if the darkenesse of the night now comming on, had not made an end of that dayes slaughter.

Tomombeius vndoubtedly vanquished, and fearing to be vtterly ouerthrowne, first caused a retreat to be sounded, that his Mamalukes which were indeed not able to withstand the Janizaries, might not seeme to be put to flight, but rather as men commaunded, to retire. VVhich hee thought to concerne much both for the encouraging of his souldiers, and for the keeping of his owne credit and estimation with his subjects. For now the selfe same fortune which had decreed his first hopes, seemed vnto him (as it fareth with men in distresse, yet still hoping for better) to promise him more prosperous successe, if he were not discouraged: but reseruing such remainders of his forces as were left, he should againe courageously renew the warre.

The battell thus broken off by the approach of the night, the Turkes as victors enjoying the tents and great artilerie of their enemies, pursued the Mamalukes vntill midnight, who held on their way to CAIRE, in manner as if they had fled. This great battell was fought vpon a Thursday the foure and twentieth day of Januarie, in the year 1517. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally wounded, and with him the valiant capitaine Bidon, hauing in the battell one of his legs broken in the knee with a faultshion shot, wherewith his horse was also slaine vnder him. Selymus commaunded them both the next day to bee slaine, either for that their wounds were supposed to be incurable, or els for that it was his pleasure, with the death of those two honorable personages to appease the angry ghost of Sinan Bassa, whose death he wonderfully lamented.

Selymus caused the Diadare and the valiant captain Bidon to be slaine.

The Turkes although they still preuailed, yet was their armie greatly impaired euen in their prosperous successe and fortunat battels: the fourth part of their armie was consumed with sickness and the sword; and that dayes labour had tyred a great number of their horses, beside the long journey they had before endured: For which causes Selymus was enforced to slacke somewhat of his accustomed haile: for as yet he had no experience of the disposition of the Egyptians which dwelt at CAIRE; neither could he vnderstand by any certaine report, where Tomombeius staid, or vpon what resolution he rested. VVhich things not thoroughly known, he thought it not good to commit himselfe and his armie into that most populous and spacious citie: but staying foure dayes at the village of MATHARRA and RHODANIA, carefully provided for his wounded souldiers, and caused the bodies of such as were slaine to be buried; but the dead cat-kasses of his enemies he left to the birds of the aire and beasts of the field. And afterward removing his campe thence, that he might more commodiously water, he came into the plaines betwene old CAIRE and BVLACH.

In the meane while Tomombeius nothing discouraged with so many mishaps, gathering together the Mamalukes from all places, encamped his armie commodiously betwene the new citie of CAIRE and the riuer Nylus, hee also armed eight thousand Ethyopian slaues (which kind of men he had not before vsed, for the remembrance of their old rebellion,) beside that hee opening the old armourie, put armes into the hands of Mamalukes sonnes, and Moores (his vassalles) into the hands of the Iewes and Arabians also, and courageously prepared for a greater and more mortall warre than before. But for as much as there were many difficulties in the managing thereof, hauing almost lost all his great artilerie, with many of his most valiant horsemen slaine in the former battels; he in his troubled mind did so cast the doubtfull hopes of his last deuice, which cruell necessitie wrung from him, that for as much as he had by manly force nothing preuailed in open field, he would now altogether vse policie: as hee which of late hauing vnfavourably made prooue of his strength, his forces yet all whole, thought it not good againe to aduenture the fortune of a battell: neither was hee in hope if he should so doe, to be able with his small power and desperat supplies to protract the warre vntill the heat of Summer, as he desired. VVherefore he resolved by night to assaile the Turkes campe, and if possibly he could, to set it on fire. For which his deuice hee seemed to haue two reasons: whereof the one consisted in the speedie execution, that he might desperately attempt to doe some notable exploit in the night, before the enemy should perceite the weakenesse of his power, which was not great, and scambled vpon the sudden; as also before hee himselfe should grow into contempt with the naturall Egyptians, who desiring nothing more than to cast off the serile yoke of the Mamaluke gouernment, with wauering minds expected but some fit occasion to rebell: the other was, that by the benefit of the night hee might auoid the danger of the great ordinance; which in sudden accidents, and especially in the darkness of the night, serueth to little or no purpose; in which kind of strength he had before to his great losse learned, that his enemies were farre too good for him. But these his reasonable policies, when all things were in readinesse to haue put the same in execution, were in like manner as the first overthrowne by the treason of such as secretly revolted from him to the enemy.

The purpose of Tomombeius discovered to Selymus.

For Selymus vnderstanding the whole plot, by certain Mamalukes, (which hauing the kings euill fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with men in miserie, daily forooke him) commaunded his armie to be alwaies in readinesse, and making great fires in diuers places of his campe, campe, kept most carefull and vigilant watch. By which his diligence it came fitly to passe, that the night following Tomombeius approaching his campe, was repulsed, with no small losse of his first troupes which vnadvisedly were gone on too far: and had no doubt that night thereby receiued his last ouerthrow, but that he wisely misdoubting the vnwonted light of the fires shining in all parts of the campe, in time called backe his halting troupes, which were themselves with more hast than good speed marching into the verie mouth of the Turks great artillerie, bent of purpose vpon them.

Tomombeius disappointed of his purpose, by perswasion of his chieftaines retired to CAIRB: for the Mamalukes still put to the worke in plaine field, thought it best to proceed in another manner; perswading him, with the whole strength of his armie to man all the conuenient places of that great citie, otherwise exposed to the enemies pleasure, and so to keepe the Turkes from courting. For they as men brought to this extremitie, that they must now fight for their dwellings, liues, wiues, and children: thought it more honourable and better agreeing with their ancient glorie, so to doe in their fight, and in the entrance of their houses, than elsewhere farther off. Wherefore the Mamalukes comming home to CAIRB, furnished all their families and the roofes of their houses with all manner of weapons: euerie one of them now humbly requesting the Egyptians their neighbours, to take vp armes against the Turkes their ancient and mortal enemies, and not to suffer themselves to be cowardly slaine, their goods spoiled, and their wiues and children carried away into most miserable captiuitie; forasmuch as the merclesse and greedie enemy, if he should once get the victorie, would no whit spare them; although they should as neuters stand looking on, and helpe neither partie: for victorie (as they said) alwaies full of insolent pride, would know no friend but such as with resolute hand did their vttermost deuoir in time of danger, for the obtaining thereof.

The Egyptians
directly opposed to the Ma-
malukes.

There were many of the wealthiest of the Egyptians, who as they thought the change of the state would be hurtfull to their trades and wealth, so were they teadie in all they could to helpe the Mamalukes their old lords: So on the other side there were many of the middle sort of the citicens, and a farre greater multitude of the basest sort of the vulgar people, who hauing little or nothing to lose, liued in hope now to make a gaine of other mens losses; and withall, remembring what miserie and slauerie they had endured about the space of three hundred years, vnder the proud gouernment of the Mamalukes, kept themselves close in their houses, expecting the last euent of warres; and secretly reioycing in their hearts, that the time was come (God so appointing) wherein their outrageous and cruell masters should be iustly and worthily punished for their oppression and hard dealing; and that which gladdened them the more, that the reuenge should be taken by the hazard of other mens liues, with which wished spectacle they well hoped shortly to fill their desirous eies.

Tomombeius with much labour and greater care, fortified all the gates and entrances of the citie, appointed vnto euerie street a particular captaine, in euerie publike place encouraged the people, omitting nothing that could possibly be done or deuised; and that which in so great a calamitie and danger was of all other things the hardest, with cheerfull countenance and vndaunted courage, made shew of greatest hope. The Mamalukes also, beside the necessitie (which in cases of extremitie is of power to encourage and make desperat the faint hearted coward) prouoked with emulation, straued amongst themselves who should best performe all the duties of worthie captaines and fouldiours: for euerie one of them according to his conceit and deuise, caused deepe ditches, or great timber logs to be cast ouerthwart the streets; some in covert trenches set vp sharpe stakes, whereupon the enemy falling vnawares might be gaged; other some according to their store, furnished the windowes and fronts of their houses in the greatest and most open streets, with harquebusiers: all which things with many mo were done with such celeritie, that none of the best or most honourable of the Mamalukes refused to handle a spade or a mattocke, or to put his hand to any other base labour; so that nothing could be sooner deuised, but it was forthwith performed.

of the great citie
of Cair.

This great and auncient citie of CAIRB was not compassed with any wals, yet were there diuers gates and entrances which led into it: whereof one broad straight street came directly from the East gate vnto the castle and middle of the citie; the rest were so narrow and crooked, that by them no great artillerie could possibly be brought, or fouldiours enter without great danger. Into this place especially, had Tomombeius conuained his chiefest strength: for that he knew his enemies enemies must of necessitie come in that way for the largenesse of the streets; the other parts of the citie he kept with lesse garrisons. But the innermost part where the castle stood, was kept with a verie great and strong garrison of most valiant soldiours: that whiche soeuer the clamour of the enemy or danger of the battell should call, they might speedily from thence come with reliefe. For why, that citie of all others the greatest, could not with so small power as Tomombeius then had, be in euerie place and entrance sufficiently defended: for within the circuit of MEMPHIS (now called CAIRB) are contained three great cities, which joyned one to another with stragling bridges, make one citie; whereof the greatest and most populous, is at this day called New CAIRB. It lieth in length six miles, alongst the riuer Nilus, from which it is equally distant a mile: the breadth thereof, exceedeth not a mile and a quarter. In the midst thereof is a castle standing vpon a little rising ground, somewhat higher than the rest of the citie; more notable for the greatnesse and beautie thereof, than for the manner of the fortification: for in it were many princely gardens, a faire street with many large galleries, diuers faire tilt-yards and courts, with stately chambers opening euerie way: the vter part thereof was garnished round about with towers, fortresses, and beautifull battlements; from whence all parts of the citie, the riuer Nilus running by, and the high Pyramides were most pleasantly to be seene. Not far from this princely pallace, is a lake made by the hand of man, the water wherein deriued from the riuer Nilus, is on euerie side enclosed with most stately buildings: and is a place of wonderfull pleasure, when as a man standing at a window may take both fish and foule, whereof there is in the lake great store. Another lake there is farre greater and fairer than this, in forme of a triangle, in the vttermost part of this New citie of CAIRB toward BVLACH: it is filled at the rising of Nilus by a great fluce made of stone with yron floudgates; and being joyned to the great riuer by a broad channell, is able to beare small boats and barges: wherein gentlemen for their disport vsed to solace themselves both by day and night in courting their mistresses. The houses were all gallantly built affront all about the lake, with porches garnished with open galleries, and paved with smooth marble euen to the brim of the lake: there the citicens in their more prosperous times vsed to row vp and down in boats, and with pleasant musick to delight the listening eares of the hearers. On the East side of this lake stood a most sumptuous and stately pallace, the late worke of queene Dulcibe wife of the great Sultan Cairbetus, for manner of the building and inward beautie farre exceeding the other proud buildings of this pleasant place: for the wals glittered with red marble, and pargeting of diuers colours, yea all the house was paved with checker and tesseled worke; the windowes and gates were made of alabaster, white marble, and much other spotted marble; the posts and wickets of massie yuorie, checkered with glistering blacke ebony; so curiously wrought in winding knots, as might easilier stay than satisfie the eies of the wondering beholder: neither was the furniture in it inferiour to the magnificence of the building, but such as might fitly answer both a princes state, and a womans quaint desire. All which things shortly after (Selymus hauing obtained the victorie) carried to CONSTANTINOPLE; not sparing the verie wals, but plucking them downe, so to take out the curious stones whole. Beside the goodly buildings about that lake, in euerie place of New CAIRB was to be seene the faire houses of the chiefe Mamalukes; more commended for their commodiousnesse, than for the manner of their building. The rest of the buildings of the citie was but low, replenished with the common sort of base people: There are yet extant in diuers places of the citie, three churches of the Christians; whereof one is holden in greater reuerence than the rest, for the same of a low vault in the ground, where it is reported the virgin Marie flying the furie of Herod, to haue reposed her selfe with her child Christ Iesus the Saviour of the world: another dedicated to the virgin Barbara; and the third to S. George, which amongst those nations are of great fame. Vnto the citie of New CAIRB, the citie of BVLACH is joyned almost with continuall buildings: It is of an high and stately building, lying close vnto the riuer Nilus; and was in some time frequented by the Mamalukes and other noble men, that they might at their pleasure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous riuer: There land all the ships which come vp the riuer; yet the great meeting of the merchants is at New CAIRB. On the other side of the riuer ouer against BVLACH, are many cottages made of hurdles and leaues of date trees; the dwellings of poore fishermen and watermen. A little about BVLACH is old CAIRB, which is also joyned vnto the new citie with continuall buildings; yet distant from it about two miles and an halfe, and standeth also fast by the riuer of Nilus. Over against it in the midst middest of the riuer is an island, notable for the pleasantnesse of the gardens and banqueting houses therein: In it is an antient temple, famous for the loue of king Pharaos daughter, and the daughter of Moses (a most antient historie, yet euerie where there still fresh in memorie.) But most part of the buildings of old CAIRE, are now growne into gardens and rude ruines. It is supposed by many probable coniectures, that there sometime stood the antient cite of MEMPHIS. Vpon the banke of the riuer, the late Sultan Campson built a sumptuous tower, ouertopping the castle in new CAIRE, to conuay water thither out of Nilus; which being by many wheelles and ingenious deuises forced into the top thereof, and there receiued into great cisterns, was from thence by pipes of stone and lead, conuayed into all places of the kings great pallace at new CAIRE. About fise miles distant from old CAIRE on AFRICK side, stand the Pyramides, monuments of the barbarous Egyptian kings vanitie; whose proud names and titles Time hath worne out of those huge and wonderfull buildings, of purpose made for the vaine eternising of their fame and endlesse wealth: so that of them it may now well be said,

Interitus saxis nominibusq; venit.*

What wonder we that men doe die: the stately tombes doe weare:
The verie stones consume to naught, with titles they did beare.

Within them are the sepulchers of the old Egyptian kings, deuised into chappels, garnished with stone of great price curiously wrought. Yet are those places loathsome of smell, and for darknesse thereof, dreadfull to behold: for as men go downe to come into them by a narrow way, almost swarmed vp with rubbidge, their lights are oftentimes put out with the dampe of the earth, and swarms of veremise flying about their eares. Some hauing got to the tops of the report, that the watch tower of ALEXANDRIA, and the mouths of the riuer Nilus where it falleth into the sea, is from thence well to be seene: and that for the great height of them, a man cannot shoot an arrow so high as the middest of the lower tower whereon the spire standeth. Of these outrageous buildings, are written many strange and almost incredible things, as that an hundred thousand men should be occupied continually by the space of twentie yeares, in building of one of them: during which time, the charges for roots, garlike and onions only, amounted to 1600 talents of siluer. These wonderfull Pyramides only excepted, nothing is in the three cities more to be wondered at than the multitude of the people, who in number almost incredible go vp and downe euerie street: but for most part ragged and torne, for that they which held any wealth, durst not make any shew thereof for feare of the Mamalukes. The common people did then generally liue with mutton, hens, and rife, whereof the countrey yeeldeth plentie: neither had they as yet the knowledge of the curious but vnwholsome forced dishes, and prouocations of gluttonie, which other nations had to their great cost and hurt inuented. But againe to our purpose.

When Selymus vnderstood assuredly that Tomombeius was retired into CAIRE, and that the Mamalukes hauing thither assembled all their strength, were resolved there to proue the vndermost of their fortune: he with his armie drew neerer vnto the cite, exhorting his souldiours to set downe themselves that day for cuer to vanquish and subdue their enemies, whom they had so many times before ouerthrowne; and now a little to force themselves for the gaining of the rewards due to their former labours and victories: which (as he said) would be so many and so great, as they had not the full thereof before in their immoderate desires imagined. Telling them moreover, that there was but a few good souldiours left with the desolat Sultan, who already wounded and terrified, and not able longer to keepe the field, had made choice to end their daies in the sight and armes of their wiues and children. Beside that, he made them beleue, that he was voluntarily sent for by the Egyptians, deadly enemies vnto the verie name of the Mamalukes, whose vtter destruction they earnestly expected: and had therefore promised him for the rooting vp of that wicked and cruell kind of men, to assaile them as occasion serued out of their houses, and so to further his victorie: yet neuerthelesse he said, That the accomplishment of the whole matter, and to make a full conquest, consisted in the subduing of those weake remainders of the vanquished and scattered armie; for as much as they were not to be accounted as men quite quite overcome, which did yet liue in hope, with weapons in their hands, possesse of the chiefe citie and seat of their empire. Wherefore that they should thinke, that in the fortune of that day, rested the good or bad estate and condition of all their liues, honours and fortunes. Assuring them, that it would be a matter but of small labour and trauell to bring it to a wished end, if they would in that new kind of fight (as they had alwaies valiantly in other battels vnder his conduct), but resolve with themselves that they would overcome.

This his speech much enflamed the minds of his souldiours, but the hope of so great a prey much more: so that being in good order and readie, they expected, but the issue of the assault. When Selymus entering by the gate called Basula, did at one instant thrust in his horsemen at diuers places of the great citie; but his Janizaries he brought in by the greatest and largest street. At the first entrance of the citie, horsemen encountered with horsemen, and made a bloudie fight in the narrow streets and lanes: but the footmen placing their euastings & falcons before them, and suddenly discharging them where they saw the thickest troups of their enemies, cleared the street directly before them. But when they came to the barricades and trenches, and were by force to remoue the timber logs and other like things lying crosse the streets, and so to passe the trenches, the Mamalukes on the other side valiantly withstanding them, they fought with such force and obstinacie on both parts, that in the memotie of man, was neuer a more fierce or cruell battell scene. For both the Mamalukes and the Turkes in that fight, shewed the vttermost of their strength and power; not ignorant that in that as in the last, they were to fight not for honour onely, but euen for their liues and empire: when as greatest rewards, or else extreame miserie, were by dallying fortune on both sides propounded both to the vanquished and vanquisher. At these barricades the Turkes receiued great losse, as also at the trenches: for they vnauidely running on, the hindermost still bearing forward the foremost, tumbled by heapes one vpon another into the covert trenches, and were there miserably empailed vpon the sharpe stakes, for that purpose before set vp by the Mamalukes. The women also and children, with manly courage threw downe stones and tiles, and such other things from the tops of their houses, and out at their windowes vpon the Turkes: and they on the other side as they could espie them, sought them off from those high places with their hatquebuties, or else violently brake into the houses from whence they were assailed, & there fought with diuers successe. But most part of the Egyptians, diligently obseruing the fortune both of the one and of the other (accounting them both for enemies) with diuers affection assailed sometimes the Turkes, and sometime the Mamalukes, seeking still notably to helpe that part whom they saw for the time to haue the better. Many cruell and most terrible encounters were at once made in diuers places of the citie: for as they crossed from street to street, sometime the one, and sometime the other hapned vpon new troups of enemies: and they which as victors pursued their enemies a front, were by others following them at the heeles, slaine downeright; so that in the victorie no man could assure himselfe of safetie. The lanes and streets (a most horrible thing to behold) did so flow with the bloud of them which lay by heapes slaine, that the dust which at the first rife wonderfull thicke, was quite laid as with a plentiful shower of raine: the ayre was darkened with the smoke of shot, and showers of arrowes: and such was the clamour of the people and souldiours, the clattering of armour, and report of the artillerie, that the earth seemed to tremble, and the houses to fall downe.

This dreadfull and doubtfull battell endured two whole daies & nights without intermission: yet so, that the Mamalukes in number few, and vnable to endure so long labour and watching, retired themselves farthier into the citie. The third day, beset with the greatest dangers that could be, as to lose themselves with all that they had (which commonly enforceth mens courages in their last attempts) they renewed the battell with such resolution, that they constrained the Turkes to retire a great way, and for last to leaue behind them certaine of their field pieces. With which repulse it is reported, that Selymus despairing of victorie, commaunded to set fire vpon the houses; moued thereunto with just displeasure against the Egyptians, for that Tonuses Basa, now his greatest man of warre, had euen then before his face receiued a dangerous wound in his head, by a stone cast out at a window.

Now were the houses pittifully burning, and the Egyptians weeping and wailing cried for mercie: The Turkes themselves fought but faintly, expecting the sound of the retreat: when news was suddenly brought by many at once, that the enemies in the other side of the river, were by Mustapha Bassa enforced to retire, and afterward had betaken themselves to flight, as to their last refuge. For Mustapha by the ouerture of the Egyptians and fugitive Mamelukes, was directed to a faire broad street, where the Mamelukes had left their horses readie saddled & bridled, that if the worst should chaunce, they might thither retire, and taking horse, speed themselves to such places of refuge as they had before thought vpon. All these horses, referred by the Mamelukes as their last refuge, Mustapha tooke away, hauing before put to flight the garrison which kept them, which was but weake, consisting for most part of horseboies and muletours, as sufficient in such a place of the citie as was least to be suspected or feared.

This accident (as it oftentimes falleth out in great and v unexpected mischances) did not a little daunt the courage of the Mamelukes: who now seeing themselves hardly beset, and that their full battell by no other hope or helpe maintained, but onely by courage; being in their owne judgement overcome, betooke themselves to flight. Most part of them hasting to the riuier of Nilus with Tomombeius (who in that battell had all in vaine proued the vitermost of his promise and policie) being transported ouer the riuier in boats, fled into the countrey of Sagasta: others of them hid themselves in the houses of the Egyptians, and in the loathsome corners of the citie. A thousand five hundred of the better sort of the Mamelukes fled vnto the greatest temple of their vaine prophēt: where after they had a great while valiantly defended themselves as out of a strong castle, because they would not yeeld themselves but vpon honourable conditions, at last overcome with thirst, wearinesse, and wounds; together with the furie of the great artillerie, they yeilded themselves to the pleasure of the conquerour: part of whom the furious souldiers slew in the porch of the same temple, and the rest within a few dayes after were cast downe the riuier to ALEXANDRIA, there to be afterwards murdered.

Selymus hauing thus gained the victorie, forthwith sent part of his armie to quench the fire then raging, and caused proclamation to be made through all the citie, That all the Mamelukes which would yeeld themselves within twelue houres, should be taken to mercie; but vnto such as yeilded not within the appointed time, should remaine no hope of life. Vnto the Egyptians also that should reueale the hidden Mamelukes, he proposed rewards: but vnto such as should conceale them, he threatened to empale them vpon stakes, and hauing sold their wiues & children to burne their houses: vpon which proclamation, many of the Mamelukes before crept into corners, came forth and yeilded themselves, and were forthwith cast into yrons. All which were shortly after, contrarie to his promise, most dishonourably murdered in prison, because (as it was giuen out) they sought meane to haue escaped. Many of the Egyptians which would not breake the bonds of faith and fidelitie with the Mamelukes their old lords, being appeached by their malicious neighbours, most constantly died for their friends, for whose sake they had vowed themselves to death.

With this victorie the Turkes growing insolent, ranackt euery place of the citie, drew out the Mamelukes that had hid themselves, and slew them, rifled the houses of the Egyptians, as well friends as foes, and left nothing shut vp or in secret. And some there were, which at one time in the same house ragged with couetousnesse, crueltie, and lust: euery man sitting his owne humour, whereunto he was by nature or custome enclined: for that in time and place of so great libertie, most men, but especially the common souldior, flattereth himselfe to the full, making conscience of nothing, but measuring all thing according to his insolent and disordered appetite. The same day that Selymus tooke CAIRE, Gazelles (who but a little before by the commandement of Tomombeius was gone to THEBAIS, to assemble the Arabians and to entertaine new supplies) came to CAIRE; but finding all lost, and seeing no possibilitie either by force or policie to preuaile, and therefore thinking it not good againe to proue the fortune of warre, which had so often with contrarie course frustrated the endeouours both of himselfe and his partakers; he came to Selymus, vpon his faith before giuen for the safetie of himselfe & his followers (which were three Arabian captaines, and a number of good horsemen) and being admitted to his presence, in the midst of his greatest captaines boldly spake vnto him as followeth.

If fortune, whom by thy great valour thou hast woon to be thy friend, had not enuied our felicitie, thou shouldest not haue (most noble Selymus, at this time, after that all things haue giuen place vnto thy valour) matter whereby thou mightest excell others in worthinesse of mind also. Whilest

we were in armes against thee for our liues and kingdom, our wealth and state yet standing whole; we alwaies as men proudly presuming vpon their owne vaine strength, made little account of thee or the name of the Turkes; yea to say the truth, we hated thee as became enemies: But now that we haue to the vitermost of our power made proofe of thy force, and haue in all battels bene put to the worse; admiring both thy wonderfull and diuine prowesse, and most prosperous vittories, not giuen thee without the providence of the immortall God, we humbly come vnto thee by thy goodnesse to better our hard and aduerser fortune: that thou by sparing and pardoning thy vanquished and yeelding enemies (by which onely vertue men come neere vnto the gods) maiest extend thy name and fame aboue the bounds of the rest of thine immortall glorie. We haue faithfully serued Tomombeius, so long as he held the strength and maiestie, yea but the name of a king, or liued in any countenance: but seeing he is (his destinie so requiring) driven out of his countrey, and wandereth the desert, with vncertaine report whether he liue or not; we come vnto thee, rather as men of him forsaken, than such as haue forsaken their princes: readie to shew vnto thee our loyalty and valour in our better condition and state: if we may by thy goodnesse, changing our hard fortune, liue and serue vnder thy worthie conduct.

Selymus, for that he right well knew Gazelles both for his vertue and valour, (wherewith valiant men win credit euen with their greatest enemies) and also desiring to joyne in league and friendship with the Arabians. (or rather Alarbes) whom he knew of all others to be most to be feared, receiued them all courteously: appointing vnto euery one of them an honourable pension, and perswading them to forget their old estate, willed them to looke for farre greater things of his bountie. Not long after, when as the Moores and wild Arabians, with certain Mamelukes that were fled to the citie of ACHASTIA, made incursions into the countrey about CAIRE, and oftentimes did cut off the Turkes which went any thing farre from the citie to seeke abroad for forrage, he sent Gazelles with part of his armie to repress them: who hauing quickly woon and sackt ACHASTIA, and slaine most part of those aduenturers, to his owne great praise, and the wonderfull contentation of Selymus, honourably returned in lesse time than was expected.

In the meane time, Tomombeius in the countrey of SAGASTA (which is on the other side of Nilus towards CYRENAICA) miserably beset with so many mischeefes, began to make head againe. There were come vnto him a strong companie of Mamelukes from ALEXANDRIA, which he had by letters sent for out of the garrison of that citie, and many others had followed him in his flight from CAIRE. And there were not wanting many great men amongst the Arabians and Moores (the inhabitants of that countrey) which promised him their helpe and furtherance. Beside that, many of the Egyptians, whose houses and families were become a prey, and bootie vnto the insolent Turkes, promised him, That if he would by night come to CAIRE, they would raise such a tumult in the citie, as should easily worke the confusion of the Turkes; for as much as they all hauing endured most horrible indignities and villanies, could no longer abide those most insolent men to rage and raigne ouer them. They sent him word also, that the Turkes huge armie was now brought to a contemptible number, most part of them being slaine in the battell at CAIRE: and the rest being for the greatest part brought to extreame weaknesse with wounds and sicknesse. For which causes, as Tomombeius his forces encreased dayly, so hope also, which neuer failed the poore vanquished and distressed king, began now also to reuiue in his inuincible heart, aboue the condition of his miserable estate. So that fawning fortune, which euen then most cruelly & despitfully went about vtterly to supplant him (of all other distressed princes most miserable) seemed but then first to change her frowning countenance, and to promise vnto him more happie and prosperous successe.

Whilest Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Abuchomar, an Egyptian, for authority and wealth the greatest man by farre in all the countrey of SAGASTA, whether it were to avert the miserie of the present warre out of his countrey; or els by the pleasure of his reuolt to gaine the good liking of Selymus, vpon whom all things seemed to fawne, came and certified him both of Tomombeius his strength, & of the new practises of the citizens of CAIRE. Whereupon Selymus caused strong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great citie: and such citizens as hee suspected to fauour Tomombeius, hee shut vp into the castle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the citie in his possession: and placed all along the riuier boats furnished with men and artillerie, to keepe and defend the farther banke of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his passage ouer. Yet considering with himselfe, with how great danger he had so many times fought with those desperat enemies, and what a difficultie it would be to intercept Tomombeius (protracting the warre in those vast and vnkowne countries, and still preparing greater forces, without whom he could nothing assure himselfe of all his former victories), to proue if he might be wonn by clemencie and bountie, he resolved to send embassadours vnto him, to perswade him to lay downe armes, and after so many ouerthrowes, at length to acknowledge the fortune of the victor: and withall to promise him vpon the faith of a prince, That if he would come in and submit himselfe, he should of the clemencie and bountie of the conqueror vpon conditions reasonable repofesse that his late kingdome which he should neuer be able by force to regaine: But if he would needs desperately proceed to make head againe, forgetting this offered grace, together with his owne disability, he should afterwards when the matter was againe tried by battell, by his owne just desert neuer more find at the hands of his angrie enemy any regard of his princely state or dignitie.

The causes moving Selymus to send embassadours to Tomombeius.

For Selymus seeing himselfe by the course of his victories drawne into a farre country; and not without cause fearing with so small a power as hee had left, to bee oppressed in that so great and populous a citie, euen with the very multitude, men of doubtfull faith; thought it better by some honourable composition to assure himselfe of some great part of that he had woon, than by going on to thrust himselfe with his armie into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Besides that, he was certainly aduertised, That the Mamalukes before fled into diuers countries, were in euery place leuying new supplies of horsemen; and that the fleet which was gone into the Arabian gulf against the Portugales, was dayly expected at the port Svazzia, wherein were three thousand Mamalukes, vnder the leading of Amyraces and Ray Salomon, two expert capitaines, with great store of good brasse ordinance: by which good helpe Tomombeius stood in faire possibilitie to recouer his former losses, and to returne againe to CAIRE, whether he was by his secret friends most earnestly inuited. But aboue all things, the care he had of the Persians most induced him to thinke of peace: for feare, that if the Bassa, whom he had left at the mountaine TAVVS, should not be able to withstand the forces of the Persian king, he should so be excluded out of ASIA the lesser, and SYRIA also, before his fleet could stie from CONSTANTINOPLE attune with new supplies of men and victuall at ALEXANDRIA.

Selymus his misfortune: slain by the Mamalukes.

Wherefore hee sent certaine of the most reuerend of his Turkish religious, and with them some of the most honourable Egyptians, embassadours to Tomombeius: who passing ouer Nilus into the country SEGESTA, were without further hearing, with more than barbarous cruelty, slaine by certaine Mamalukes which chaunced vpon them: thinking thereby to gratifie Tomombeius, as yet not knowing of any such matter, & to manifest their affection towards him, as also that they were not desirous of any peace with the Turkes.

This proud and insolent fact vtterly brake Selymus his patience, and shortly after made an end of that mortall warre, together with the honour of the Mamalukes. For he being a man of an hot and cruell nature, euen when we was nothing at all moued, could by no meanes brooke that his enemies, so often vanquished and put to flight, should so lightly reject his offers vnto them as the case stood, both honourable and profitable: and that worse was, violate his embassadours against the law of nations, most religiously kept euen amongst the most barbarous and savage people. Wherefore prouoked by so great an iniurie, he carefully provided all things necessary for his expedition into SEGESTA against Tomombeius. And because it stood not with his honour (as heooke it) nor with the good of the present seruice, to passe the riuer by boats, he gathering together all the small vessels and lighters he could possibly, made thereof a large and strong bridge ouer Nilus.

Tomombeius understanding by his espials and from his friends at CAIRE of the preparations of Selymus, and of the bridge he had made; fearing also the reuolt of the country people, whom he probably suspected to be alienated from him by the reuolt of Abuchomar, a man of so great power and authoritie amongst them; determined once againe to proue the fortune of battell, which had so often deceiued his expectation. For hee justly measuring his owne strength, and finding himselfe in all things inferiour to his mightie enemy, well saw, that hee was neither able to protract the warres, neither in open field to abide his comming with all his forces; and to stie further into the deserts, was as he deemed it, nothing els but to make shipwracke of that small remainder that was left of his honour and credit. Wherefore by the aduice of his best capitaines

(which was the last endeour both of himselfe and of the Mamalukes) he departed betime out of the province of SEGESTA with foure thousand Mamalukes, and twice as many Moores and Arabians, and trauelled day and night without intermission to come to the riuer Nilus. By that desperat attempt to deceite the Turkes, suspecting no such thing from their vanquished and weak enemy: as also by celeritie to prevent the fame of his comming; hoping so by his suddaine and vnexpected approach to ouerthrow that part of the Turkes armie which should first passe the riuer, before they could possibly be relieved from the other side. Neither was hee deceiued in the computation of the time, which hee hauing betwixt cast, with the manner of his trauell, fell out so truly, that he came to the place he desired, euen at such time as the Asian horsemen were come ouer the bridge, as he had before guessed. The harbengers and pages of Selymus his chamber, which were gone something further than the rest, to make choice of the most commodious place for the erecting of the emperours pavilion, by the rising of the dust first perceived the comming of the enemy. And Mustapha the great Bassa aduertised thereof, suddainly raised an alarm: which so vnexpected a matter brought a great feare both on them which were already passed ouer, and also on them that were on the further side of the riuer.

Tomombeius presently assailing his enemies, as yet but putting themselves in order, and repairing to their ensignes, at the first onser slew such as made resistance, and the rest hee discomfited and put to flight. Neither was Mustapha the great commander (although he did what possibly he could, by his owne example to haue encouraged them) able either by his owne inuincible courage, or other persuation, after his first ranks were ouerthrowne, to repaire his disordered battell, or stay the flight of his men: for in that so hot and suddaine a skirmish all was full of tumult, slaughter, doubtfulness, and feare: and all amongst the banke of the riuer, both aboue and beneath the bridge, were to be seene fearefull companies of the Turkes, ruthfully looking vpon the riuer, and crying vnto their fellowes on the other side for helpe. Many forced by the furious enemy, tooke the riuer, and there perished: others struing at the end of the bridge to returne that way, and ouerborne by their fellowes: others continually sent from the further side, or els amazed with feare, fell into the riuer, and there drowned. The bridge was so broad, that foure horsemen abreast might easily passe ouer at once, and so great numbers of them in short space be conueyed ouer. But when that great ordinance (the Turkes cheefe strength) was also to be transported, fewer troups of horsemen were sent ouer, than either the greatnesse of the present danger or suddennesse of the seruice required. Neither did their great artillerie as then stand them in any stead, for that it could neither so speedily be conueyed ouer, nor without great hurt be discharged from the hither banke to the further, by reason of their owne men standing betwene them and the enemy.

In the meane time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmish came downe to the riuers side, filled a great number of boats and other small vessels with his Ianizaries with their harquebuses, and withall hastened his horsemen ouer the bridge to relieue their fellowes distressed on the further side: in which boats the nimble watermen vsed such diligence in landing of some, and presently in fetching ouer of others, that in short time they had transported diuers bands of those most readie and valiant souldiours: whose comming wonderfully comforted the Asian souldiours; euen now at the last cast, and readie to haue giuen ouer. Canoglu also, the Tartar kings sonne and Selymus his brother in law, encouraging his horsemen to take the riuer, with losse of some few of his men recouered the further side, to the great admiration of the beholders: which in that action was not so much to be maruelled at, as they which by troups with their horses had oftentimes swam ouer the great riuers Tanais and Volga, no lesse dangerous than was the riuer Nilus.

Tomombeius at the same time, for that he saw speedie victorie to consist in one thing especially, setting his troups close together, strained himselfe with might and maine to haue gained the head of the bridge, that by plucking away some few of the first boats, he might shut in his enemies already come ouer; and by cutting the cables wherby the boats were fastened to the banke, all the bridge with the Turkes vpon it, might be borne away with the force and violence of that great riuer: whereupon rose a most cruell and deadly fight; for the resolute Mamalukes in the front of their battell fought valiantly: and Mustapha well considering the danger, had drawne vnto that place both his ensignes and his best souldiours: so that there was fought such a fight, as a matter of so great consequence required: The Mamalukes plainly seeing, that if they could obtaine obtaine the place, they should shortly after with little adoe, ouerthrow all the former victories of their enemies. And the Turks no lesse ignorant, that except they kept the bridge whole, they were all but lost men that were already come ouer; and that the rest of the armie together with their emperour so farre from home, and in the midst of his enemies, must of necessitie shortly after run the same fortune. But Mustapha well relieved by the Ianizaries and the European horsemen, which were now come ouer in great number, not onely received the enemies charge, but pressing vpon them, gained ground, and by little and little enforced them to retire: This is that Mustapha the Hungarian, and Baia his sonne in law, which for his owne glorie and perpetuall fame, built that notable, stately, and sumptuous stone (bridge of the spoiles of this victorie) ouer the riuer Siremon, which at this day men passing ouer into Thracia wonder at, as at a worke becomming the greatnesse of the Roman empire.

Tomombeius, to giue a time of breathing to his Mamalukes, who their horses for wearinesse now fainting vnder the, were not able longer to shew their wonted courage; & desirous by them againe to proue the vttermost fortune of the battell, exhorted the Moores and Arabians a while to charge the enemy, which thing they after the manner of their fight valiantly performed. And shortly after, the Mamalukes hauing a little breathed themselves and their horses, came in afresh and renewed the battell; with such furie, that Selymus doubting the victorie (although he was by his most faithfull counsellors perswaded to the contrarie) yet doubted not to adueneure the bridge, and in person himselfe to go and relieue his distressed souldiours: who by his coming in, encouraged, and in the sight of their emperour desiring euery man for his part by some notable seruice to deserue both credit and preferment, repressed the furie of the enemy; who in short time after, by the coming on of certaine fresh companies of Ianizaries, were notably repulsed, and so at length put to flight: whom the horsemen which were not in the battell, pursued all the fields ouer. At length also the Tartarians (who carried away with the force of the streame, were somewhat long before they could recouer the farther bank and come to their enemies) were now come in also, and with their swift horses following the chase, augmented the slaughter.

But Selymus about all things desirous of Tomombeius, presently commaunded Mustapha the great Bassa, Gazelles, and Cayerbeius, with certaine fresh troupes of light horsemen, to pursue him at the heeles, and if it were possible not to suffer him to escape: for so long as he liued, he could not assure himselfe of any thing he had yet gotten. These vigilant captaines not vnmindfull of their charge, following fast after him, ouertooke him the next day at the sluice of a great deepe fen, where he had a little rested himselfe and his followers, being then about to cutt off a wodden bridge, so to haue hindered the enemies pursuit. Some of his followers being there slaine, and some taken, he was againe enforced to flie. The third day when he had almost lost all his men, and was come with some few into the territorie of the Secussane prince: these great captaines still eagerly pursuing him; and denouncing vnto the poore country people which dwelt in villages thereabout, all extremities and tortures, if they did not with most diligent watch and ward so keepe the passages of those marshes, as that he should not possibly escape; he was so beset on euery side, that for safeguard of his life he was glad to hide himselfe all alone in a foule deepe marsh: VV here shortly after he the poore Sultan was by the diligent search of the country peasants found out, hidden amongst the flags and bulrushes, standing in the water up to the shoulders, who deliuered him miserably bound vnto the Turks. Shortly after hee with certaine captaines and other of his cheefe friends taken in that flight, was brought to Cia Selymus before resolved to put him to death, and the rather for the injuries done to his souldiours, would not suffer him to come into his presence; but commaunded him to be tortured, so to haue caused him to haue revealed the great treasures of Campson his predecessor, which were thought to haue been by him hidden: in which most horrible and exquisite tortments, it is reported, that hee with great constancie and sterne countenance vttered nothing but certaine deepe sighes and groanes, ouercomming with patience the tyrannie of the proud conqueror, who after that commaunded him in bale and ragged apparell, with his hands bound behind him as a theefe or murderer condemned to die, to be set vpon a foule leane cammell, and so to be carried in derision through all the publicke and notable places of the Citie, that the Egyptians might see him whom they but a little before had adored for their king, by change of fortune cast into extreame miserie, by most shamefull death to end both his life and empire together. VVhen they had thus despightfully led him as it were in triumph, and brought him to the cheefe gate of the citie called BASVELA, they there openly strangled him with a rope: and that he might be the better seene, and become more contemptible to all that passed that way, they hanged him vp by the necke vpon an yron hooke in an arch of the same gate, and so left him to the worlds wonder. Palestinus propounding him as a mirror both of the better and worse fortune, for all men to looke vpon, aptly describeth both his happinesse and miserie in these few verses following:

TOMOMBEIUS, THE LAST Sultan of Ægypt.

Pales. Iou-

lib. 4.

Non fuit in toto, rex aequè oriente beatus:
Nec magis in toto rex oriente miser.
Quam dolor Ægypti, olim Tomombeius, auro Ingenti, atq; armis, & ditione potens.
Captus ab hoste fero, miserum simul atq; beatum, Exemplo potis est, commonuisse suo.
Quid rides temere? quid fies? vis te cohibere?
Et natum posthac te meminisse hominem?

Selymus the first,

Atque quondam ornabant pretiosa monilia collum, Nunc, fractam vultu respice fune gulam.

In English thus.

In all the East a king more blest was no where to be found,
Nor in the East one more accurst liv'd not vpon the ground, Than Tomombeius, *ÆGYPT*s grecke, sometime for store of gold,
Of power great for martiall force, and kingdomes he did hold.
But taken by his cruell foe, may good example be Both to the happie and distrest, of mans vncertainetie.
Why doest thou fondly laugh? why doest thou vainely crie?
Canst thou from henceforth stay thy selfe? and thinke th'art borne to die?
My garments were the royall robes, I wore the crowne of gold,
With richest stones most richly set, most glorious to behold:
My necke adorn'd with richest gems which I did sometimes weare:
But now trust vp in shamefull rope, behold me hanging here.

in doubt of their estate bewaile

This miserie befell Tomombeius the 13 of Aprill, in the yeare 1517, vpon the Monday in Easter weeke. There were many which shed teares to behold that so cruell and lamentable a spectacle, who by their wofull countenance and pitifull lamentation seemed to detest that foule and vnworthie death of their late Sultan; notwithstanding that the Janizaries reprimed them therefore, and threatened them with death, who like giddie brained fooles (as they termed them) enured to the flauerie of the Mamalukes, joyfully and thankfully accepted not of their deliuerance: for the Ægyptians were as yet vncertaine of their estate, and therefore as men in suspence (not without cause) stood in doubt what should become of themselves; fearing least the Turkes, a warlike nation, and a terrour to all the princes of EVROPE and ASIA, nothing more courteous than the Mamalukes, should with no lesse insolencie rage and tyrannize ouer them, vnder their warlike and cruell emperour. Besides that, the wofull sight of Tomombeius hanging in the gate, as the vnworthie scorne of fortune, wonderfully wounded their hearts: for why, it was yet fresh in their remembrance, that he with the good liking of all men, and generall fauour of the nobilitie, with good fame rise by all the degrees of honour both in field and court, vnto the height of regall dignitie; and therefore greued the more to see him, by inuitable destiny cast downe headlong, so shamefully to end his life and empire together. A notable spectacle vndoubtedly amongst the rarest examples of worldly fragilitie both to the happie and vnfaynthe one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themselves in their greatest blisse, and the other, to learne thereby with patience to endure the heauie and vnworthie changes and changes of this wretched and miserable world. And so much the more did Tomombeius so hanging moue men to compasion, for that the maiestie of his tall and strong bodie, and reuerend countenance, with his long and hoarie beard, well agreed with his imperiall dignitie and martiall disposition. The same fortune with Tomombeius ran also diuers of the princes of the Mamalukes, with some others of the common sort also.

Tomombeius thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamalukes almost slaine, and no power of the enemy to be heard of in all ÆGYPT to renew the warre: Selymus deuiding his forces, sent them forth with his captaines, to take in the countries and prouinces of ÆGYPT lying further off. They of ALEXANDRIA after the battell of CAIRE hauing thrust out the garrison, and easily surpris'd the castle of PHARVS (which the weake defendants chose rather vpon hope of present reward to deliuer, than with doubtfull cunct to defend) yielded themselves many dayes before vnto the Turkes. DAMIATA also, called in auncient time PELVSIUM, opened their gates, and submitted themselves to the victors. There was no citie betwixt the riuer of Nilus and the borders of IVDBA and ARABIA, which yielded not to the obedience of Selymus. The kings also of AFRICKA bordering vpon CYRENAICA, tributaries or confederats of the Ægyptian Sultans, sent their embassadours with presents to Selymus.

There remained now none but the wild Arabians (a people neuer to be tamed) and especially they of AFRICKA, who hauing lost many of their friends and kinsmen in aiding Tomombeius, would

would not (as it was thought) submit themselves vnto the Turkish obedience. This wandering kind of people, liuing for most part by theft, had filled the countries from Euphrates, where it runneth by the Palmyrens, with all the inner parts of ÆGYPT and AFRICKA vnto the Atlantick sea, with huge multitudes of men: and being deuided into many companies vnder diuers leaders, haue no certaine dwelling places, but liue an hard and flegall kind of life in tents and waggons, after the manner of the Tatars: their greatest wealth is a good seruiceable horse, with a lance, or a bundell of darts: they were alway at discord & variance amongst themselves, by reason whereof, they could neuer agree for the expulsiue of the Mamalukes, who otherwise had not been able to haue stood against them, if they should haue joynd their forces together. So that the late Ægyptian Sultans seemed to hold their state and empire amongst so populous a nation, rather by their discord than their owne strength. Wherefore Selymus hauing now by fit men vpon his faith bene giuen allured many of their cheefest and greatest commanders to CAIRE, honourably both entertained and rewarded them. By whose example others moued, came also in dayly: and hauing receiued their rewards, gaue the oath of their allegiance to Selymus. Others which could by no faire promises or words be wooen, being cunningly intercepted by other captaines, and deliuered to Selymus, endured the paines of their vaine obstinacie and mallice. The other remote nations toward ÆTHIOPIA, as they had in former time rather acknowledged the friendship than the command of the Ægyptian Sultans, so now induced with the fame of the victorie, easily joynd in like amitie with the Turke.

About the same time Selymus sent certaine troupes of horsemen to SVBZIA, a port of the red sea (of old called ARSINOE) about three dayes journey from CAIRE: in which port Campson the great Sultan (a little before the coming of the Turks) had with infinit charge and foure yeares trauell built a strong fleet against the Portingals, who by their conquests in INDIA had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian marchandise into the gulfes of ARABIA, to the great hinderance of the Ægyptian kings customes: ouer which fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkish warres) Campson had appointed one Amyrases and Ray Salomon Generals, with a strong power of Mamalukes and great store of ordinance, against the Portingals. These valiant captaines hauing yet done nothing in the seruice they were appointed vnto, as they lay at GIDDA (the port of the famous citie of Mecha, wherein is the temple of their great prophet Mohomet) vnderstanding of the death of Campson, & of the coming of Selymus into ÆGYPT, fell at variance betwixt themselves one of them being willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan, and the other no lesse desirous to follow the good fortune of the victor. Whereupon a mutinie arising among the souldiours, Amyrases, who fauoured Tomombeius, was enforced to flie to Mecha. But shortly after, Ray Salomon requiring to haue him, and threatening all hostilitie except he were forthwith deliuered, he was apprehended by them of Mecha, fearing to haue GIDDA their port spoiled, and so sent backe againe to the fleet. Ray Salomon, that he might be Admirall alone, his associat being taken out of the way, and by some notable fact to insinuate himselfe into the fauour of the conquerour, caused Amyrases in the night to be cast ouer board: and giuing to the souldiours two moneths pay, and swearing them to the obedience of Selymus, in few dayes sayling came backe againe to ARSINOE, where leauing the fleet, hee came directly himselfe to Selymus at CAIRE, of whom he was gratioously receiued. After that, all the princes which were before tributaries or confederats to the late Sultans of ÆGYPT, euen vnto the confines of DAUID the most mightie king of ETHIOPIA (whom some call Presbiter John) without delay entred into the like subiection or confederation with the Turkes.

ÆGYPT, with all the prouinces thereunto belonging, thus brought into subiection, Selymus about the beginning of Iuly sayled downe the riuer of Nilus to ALEXANDRIA (Cortug-Ogli, of this Cortug-Ogli see more here) there to take view of a famous pyrat of HALICARNASSVS, sitting at the helme of his gallie) there to take view of his fleet, but lately come from CONSTANTINOPLE with new supplies both of men and victuals, sent from Pyrrhus Bassa and his sonne Solyman: which after he had well surueyed, and diligently viewed the wals of the citie, and of the castle of PHAROS, hee returned againe to CAIRE. In the meane time, the Mamalukes in durance at ALEXANDRIA, were by his commaundement murdered euery mothers sonne, in the entrance of the prison. At which time also about fife hundred families of the noblest and richest of the Ægyptians were commaunded to remoue from CAIRE to CONSTANTINOPLE, and a great number of women and children, of the race of the Mamalukes, were transported thither also in ships hired for that purpose.

Selymus cunningly reduced the Arabians to his obedience.

Of this Cortug-Ogli see more here the life of Solyman.

Into this fleet beside the kings treasures and riches, he conveyed all the publicke and priuie ornaments of that most rich and famous citie; with such a couetous and greedie desire of poyle, that the very marble stones, commended either for the excellencie of the workmanship, or beautie of the stone, were violently rent out of the maine walls, to his great reproch and infamie. Lying at CAIRE, he with great pleasure beheld the rising of the riuer Nilus, which had then overflowed the countrey next vnto it; and that with such a desire, that he most curiously enquired of the old countrey men the measure and nature of the riuer: for by the diuersitie of the rising thereof (which they by certaine markes and measures well find out) they prognosticate sometime abundant plentie, sometime extreame dearth, and sometime reasonable store: when as the violent riuer moderately or furiously breaking out, somewhat so drowneth the greatest part of the countrey, that all the seed season it lieth vnder water, and at another time floweth so sparingly, that in many places it scarce layeth the dust, thereby foreshewing an vndoubted death: so that the Egyptians then assure themselves of plentie, when as Nilus keeping a meane, pleasantly refresheth neither to the highest or lowest markes of his inundation.

The Mameluke kingdom, together with the name of the Mamelukes, thus ouerthrowne, and the conquest of AEGIPT so happily atchieued: Selymus resolved to make his retourne into SYRIA, and the rather, for that it was reported, That Hysmaell the Persian king was comming with his armie into MESOPOTAMIA, & so like ynough to breake into COMAGENA. Wherefore hauing as he thought good, disposed of all things, he left a strong garrison of his best souldiours in CAIRE, and appointed Cayerbeius that notable traitour, his deputie and great commander ouer all that great and new gotten kingdom of AEGIPT, now conuerted into the forme of a province, as it remaineth at this day. Which honourable preferment so vnworthely bestowed, exceedingly both greued and troubled Ionuses the great Bassa, before enflamed with the hope and iust desire thereof: For now that Sinan Bassa was dead, he puffed vp with the estimation of his owne worth and valour, and proud of the wound hee had of late receiued in the presence of Selymus at the entring of CAIRE, and to the vttermost of his power suffering no man to grow neere him in credit and estimation; thought himselfe the onely man now left, to whom of all others, that especiall and honourable charge should in the judgement of Selymus and of the whole armie of right be committed. Neither wanted he the generall good liking of the men of warre, for immediately after he was recouered of his wound, when he in the most magnificent house of the Diadare at CAIRE (which he in the victorie had rather of himselfe usurped, than by the gift of Selymus obtained) dayly kept princely cheare for all commers (no small meanes to gaine the loue of the common souldiours) and gaue frankly to them all, to some horses, to some beautifull slaues, to some money, plate, jewels, rich garments, faire armour, and such like; he vpon vnto himselfe such fauour and credit, that whensoever he should (as the manner was) goe to the castle vnto the emperor, he was brought thither with a great and goodly traine of his fauourites and followers, as the man in all mens judgement designed to the gouernment of that great and rich kingdom. All which things highly offended the mind of Selymus, who as he was apt to suspect, and cruell where he feared, so did he also (in secret) enuie great vertues, accompanied with too much honour and power.

Ionuses seeing Cayerbeius the traitour thus vnworthely promoted, overcome with greed and indignation (who as a man of a proud and haughtie mind, tooke it as done to his owne disgrace) yet colouring his inward discontentment by counterfeiting himselfe sicke, for certaine dayes came not abroad; neuertheless still more and more tormented both with the iniurie (as hee tooke it) done to himselfe, and the vnworthie preferment of the traitour, he could not so well containe himselfe, but that in his choler some words fell from him, whereby his discontentment was perceiued. It happened, that Cayerbeius comming of courtesie to visit him, and in the heat of the day familiarly calling for drinke (which was water and sugar, after the manner of the Egyptians) immediately after he had drunke, felt such grieuous and vnwonted gripings and tormentings in his stomacke and bellie, that many supposed him to haue bene poysoned by the Bassa: yet was he by the power and vertue of a more soueraine and effectually remedie preferred. Which report, whether it were true or no, was vncertaine: but certaine it is, that it ranke further into the mind of Selymus, than any man would haue thought. He had now also a little before heard, that many of those rich Egyptian families, which he had before commanded to be remooued to CONSTANTINOPLE, had for great summes of money obtained of Ionuses (who

(who had the whole ordering of that matter) that they might quietly and in safetie remaine still in their owne countrey. Of which his couert dealing, great probabilitie was alledged by such as repined at his honour, and secretly accused him, That those princelike and excessiue charges and expences, which he was not able possibly to maintaine of his ordinatie pension, were roially supported with the embefeled poyle and reuenues of that new gotten kingdom. Which malicious suggestions, as they tended to the lightening of his credit, so also another crime (whether it were of fraudulent dealing or negligence, or other further respect, is vncertaine) comming in the necke of the other, wrought his vtter disgrace, and final confusion: For Selymus after the manner of great princes (who more seuerely to punish the former offences, notably dissembling their present anger, expect but the occasion of some new crime) with vigilant eye waiting vpon his words and deeds, prosecuted him with a mortall and deadly hatred, with a full purpose to destroy him.

A few daies before it was certainly reported that Selymus would againe retorne into SYRIA, the souldiours appointed to be left in garrison at CAIRE, alleaging the great distance of the place, and the greater dangers they were to expect, with the labours by them already endured, requested the bountie of their most fortunate emperor, that they might haue their wages augmented. Which thing Selymus (neuer spare handed to his men of warre) easily granted, commanding Ionuses the stately Bassa, that the summe they required, might be added to their accustomed wages, and so entered into his accounts for the warres. But he carried headlong with discontentment, made neither the treasurers nor paymasters acquainted with any such matter as Selymus had before commanded: of purpose, that the garrison souldiours deuiued of their greater wages promised them by the emperor, might euen at the first begin to hate and contemne Cayerbeius, as author of so great an iniurie; that so the state of CAIRE, and of that new gotten kingdom, disquieted by the mutinie of the garrison souldiours, Selymus enforced to change his former purpose, should in stead of that strange gouernor (hated of the Egyptians for his late treason, and not beloued of the garrison souldiours, because he was to them a stranger) of necessitie send some of his owne Bassas, a Turke, for the better stay and assurance of that wauering and mightie province. But all these things (as commonly wicked purposes haue their foule euents) fell out in fine farre otherwise than he had in his troubled mind before conceived. For Selymus being departed out of AEGIPT, and now on his way almost as farre as HIERUSALEM, the garrison souldiours at CAIRE, the pay day being now come, and receiuing no more but their old accustomed wages, moued with that euill dealing (as contrarie to the emperours promise and their generall expectation) began with more furie and rage than euer Ionuses had before imagined, openly and insolently to insult and threaten the treasurer and paymasters, and with open mouth to rail vpon Cayerbeius their gouernour. With which so insolent and opprobrious speeches hee affronted (as one not yet acquainted with the fashions of the Turkish garrisons) together with the paymasters, in best manner they could excused themselves vnto the souldiours, requesting them not to thinke so hardly of them who were altogether innocent in the matter, and with patience to vnderstand the truth of the cause; wherein if they should on their part find any fraudulent, or euill dealing, they craued no fauour, either refused any punishment. Thus Cayerbeius and the paymasters seeking by all meanes to auoid both the suspicion and the present danger: and the mutinous souldiours no lesse hating to find out by whom they were so abused, and to be thereof reuenged, it was at last with much adoe agreed, That trustie messengers should forthwith be sent to Selymus, who was not yet gone out of IVDIA, to vnderstand of him the truth of the matter.

These speedie messengers hauing with wonderfull celeritie dispatched their journey, ouer tooke Selymus with his armie a little from LARISA in IVDIA: and admitted to his presence, orderly declared vnto him both the complaints of the souldiours, and the carefulnesse of Cayerbeius and the paymasters to excuse the matter, together with the danger they were in, with all the other accidents whatsoever which had happened since the time of his departure from CAIRE. Which complaint so incensed the mind of Selymus with new passions of anger and choller, being already fore alienated with former displeasures, that hee without further delay commanded Ionuses Bassa to be brought before him to answer the matter: who although hee were inwardly stricken with the guilt of his owne conscience, and surprised with a deadly feare, which appeared in his colour as pale as ashes, seeing in the angle face and countenance of his soveraigne the most certaine tokens of his heauie displeasure: yet as he was a man of a great spirit, answered boldly, That he had forbidden the souldiors wages to be augmented, contrarie to his maiesties command, not vpon any euill meaning to haue inuerted that money to his owne vse, neither thereby to haue drawne any man of purpose into disgrace, as was by some his malicious enemies suggested; but vpon great reason, thereby to prouide for his maiesties cofers, wonderfully emptied with those late warres: beside that, the constant report of new troubles like to arise out of PERSIA, gaue good occasion for him to spare vnnecessarie charges: Whereas on the other side, as he said, the garrison souldiors were already enriched with the plentiful spoiles of ÆGYPTE, and in a most goodly citie possessed the sumptuous houses and lands of the Mamalukes, feeding vpon the goods of the Egyptians, and had already receiued both greater pay and more bountifull rewards from him, than euer any souldiors had from any his predecessours the Othoman kings: in which case, if they were not past all modestie, they might well enough take it in good part, if they were something restrained in their vnreasonable requests. He alledged moreover, that great princes which retaineth their souldiours in reasonable pay in time of peace and warre, ought sometime for warlike discipline, to require of them a moderation of their desires; least whilest they all strue with greedinesse for their priuat gaine, there want money afterwards in the common treasure to maintaine a greater and more necessarie charge, wars stilling vpon wars; seeing that no commander were he neuer so valiant or fortunat, euer did any great matter in wars, if he wanted coine, the most proper instrument and verie sinues of warre, answering vnto his other most heroicall parts and sufficiencie. But as he was yet thus speaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him, for if he should haue suffered him in longer discourse to haue recounted his former deserts and worthy seruice done, as well in the time of his father Baiazet, as of late euen in his owne presence, he was like enough to haue had of them that were able to doe most with him, intercessors for him: and so without farther delay, caused him euen there in his owne presence to be executed; saying moreover, That others which would arrogantly presume to prescribe vnto their soveraignes what they had to doe, should for euer after by the example of that most insolent seruant, be admonished of their due and condition. It is reported, that the souldiours in despite of Selymus wonderfully lamented the vnworthie death of this so worthie a man: For he, beside his notable and rare valour, so many times to his great honor in sundrie battels approued, had by the dexteritie of his Gracian wit, comelinesse of personage, militaire eloquence, and gallant maner of liuing, so woon the loue and fauor of all men, that there was few or none in all the armie which did not acknowledge himselfe some way indebted and beholden vnto him; and did therefore condemne the emperours crueltie. They then began to tell how Mustapha surnamed Caloger, a man of wonderfull credit and authoritie both with Baiazet and himselfe, was in the heat of his furie slaine without hearing: And that in like manner of rage, old Chendemus a man of greatest honour and integritie of life, and of all the chieftaines which came out of the great emperour Mahomet his nurserie, the most skilfull, had been for his graue and wholsome counsell onely without cause murdered: Neither was then Bostanges his sonne in law forgotten: neither Cherseogles (the one most honorable for the great place he held in court and the marriage of Baiazet his daughter, and the other a man of no lesse marke being his great Admirall, and bearing himselfe high vpon his infinit wealth, but more vpon his wife one of the daughters of Selymus) both which two noble gentlemen about two years before had their heads slucke off, no man well knowing wherefore, and their dead bodies cast out at the court gate to the terror of the beholders, as a miserable spectacle of their owne miserie and the emperours crueltie. Yea the remembrance of his old tyrannic (renewed as it were with this late outrage) presented afresh vnto all mens eyes the reuerend old emperour Baiazet his father, with his two brethren, Acomates and Corcutus, by right both called vnto the empire before himselfe; with many other young princes of the blood, of great hope and expectation, who as all men knew, perished through the vnnaturall and execrable crueltie, of this most mercilesse man. So that men generally did both feare him and hate him. For as much as he without all feare of God or regard of worldly shame, accounted no practise wicked, or deuile detestable, that might serue for the better establishing of his kingdome; and had set downe in his mind, (long before corrupted with ambition and tyrannic) That it was farre better for the assurance of his estate, to be feared of all than beloued of many: and therefore spared no mans life, of whom he had but the least suspicion. Howbeit that the seueritie by him vsed against this so great a man and so gracious with the people, may in some sort be excused, as justly moued thereunto by the presumptuous and malicious dealing of the proud Bassa vnderhand, contrarie to the charge giuen him by his lord, to the perill of those his great but late conquests both in ÆGYPTE and SYRIA.

This great Bassa, whilest he yet liued and flourished in the court, in nothing so much offended the minds of the people (who generally both loued and honoured him) as by the crueltie by him shewed vpon the person of the faire ladie Manto his best beloued wife. VVho being a Greek borne, and adorned with all the good gifts of nature, wherunto her laudly conditions were also answerable, was by Zebalia her first husband (a man of great honour) carried with him into the wars, as his greatest treasure and chiefe delight. But he slaine, and she by misfortune falling into the hands of the Turks (her enemies) remained so prisoner with them for a time; vntill that this great Bassa Ionuses shortly after (seeing her amongst the other captiues there taken, so farre to exceed the rest as doth the Sunne the lesser stars) surprised with her incomparable beautie, became of her amorous: and in too curious viewing of the captiue ladie, was by her himselfe taken prisoner. VVhere finding her outward perfections graced with no lesse inward vertues, and her honourable mind answerable vnto her rare feature, tooke her vnto his wife; honouring her farre aboue all the rest of his wiues and concubines: and she againe in all dutifull loyaltie seeking to please him, for a space liued in all worldly felicitie and blisse, not much inferior vnto one of the great Sultaneses. But long lasteth not the sommer fruit of wanton loue, blasted most times in the blossome, and rotten before it be well gathered: For in short time, the Bassa more amorous of her person than secured in her vertues, and after the manner of sensuall men still fearing least that which so much pleased himselfe, gaue no lesse contentment to others also; began to haue therein distrust, although he saw no great cause why, more than his owne conceit, not grounded vpon any her euill demeanor, but vpon the excess of his owne liking. Which mad humour (hardly to be euer purged) of it selfe still more and more in him encreasing, he became so stoward and imperious, that nothing he could say or doe could now so please or content him, but that he still thought some one or other, although he wist not who, to be therein partakers with him. So fearfull was the jealous man of his owne conceits. Yet could he not chuse but loue those great perfections, whereat he could not enough wonder; although he found no contentment therein, tormenting still both himselfe and her whom he so deely loued with his owne passionat distrust: vntill at length, the faire ladie grieued to see her selfe thus without cause to be suspected, & wearied with the insolent pride of her peeuish husband, together with his imperious commands; determined secretly to depart from him, and so to returne againe into her own country. VVhich her purpose she discovered vnto one of her eunuchs, to whom she had also deliuered certaine letters to be by him conuaid vnto such of her friends, as whose helpe she was to vse in her intended flight: which letters the false eunuch opened, and so for the more manifesting of the matter deliuered them vnto the Bassa his master. VVho therewith enraged, and calling her vnto him, forthwith in his furie, with a dagger stabd her to the heart and slew her: so together with the death of his loue, hauing cured his tormenting jealousy. The liuely counterfeits of these two so notable personages thus vnworthily slaine, the one by the imperious command of his soveraigne, and the other by the cruell hand of her husband, thou maist in the pages following behold, as they are by Bosfordus expressed.

But leauing this great Bassa with faire Manto vnto their rest, his course thus run, to returne againe vnto Selymus; who now come into SYRIA, was by letters from the Himbracor-Bassa or master of his horse (whom he had left vpon the frontiers of his kingdome to attend the motions of the Persians) aduertised, That the Persian preparations which had raised such a hoat rumour of wats in the beginning of Winter, was growne cold in the heat of Sommer: and that he had scene in all the time of his aboad in those quarters, none but certaine stragling companies, making shew as if some greater power had beene comming, which had many times made sudden roads into the counrey, with whom he had sundrie times prosperously encountred: and that it was generally reported by such prisoners as he had taken, and by his owne espials also, that Hyfmaell, troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars, had converted the greatest part of his forces against those nations: so that VVinter now drawing fast on, and deepe snowes already fallen vpon the mountaine TAVRVS, he could notwithstanding he would that yeare looke after ASIA the lesse, or SYRIA. There were that reported, that the Tartars which dwell betwene the two riuers Tanais and Volga, were by Selymus his procurement, and money, set a worke to keepe Hyfmaell busied, by invading the Iberians and Albanians, which were vnder his protection: which thing he wrought by the meanes of Mahomet his father in law, the Bosphorane king, who being of the same language and nation, by rewards easily induced the needie captaines of the Tartars his friends and confederats, to take vp armes against their neighbours.

The causes why Hyfmaell invaded did not Selymus, wholly busied in
warres.

Many men marvelled that Hyfmaell the Persian king neglected so faire an opportunitie, where by he might (as most men thought) haue thrust Selymus quite out of ASIA and SYRIA, whilst he was thus busied in EGYPT, yea and easily haue destroyed him, shut vp with all his power, especially at such time as the Aegyptian Sultans Campson and Tomombeius, made so great resistance. But they which could better judge of the matter, saw that Hyfmaell was not of so great power and strength abroad, as at home: for his armie for most part consisted of gentlemen, or such as were by custome bound to serue him in his defensie warres, voluntarie men, and such as serued without pay. These as they were the most valiant horsemen of the East, so did they with singular valour worthely defend the kingdome of PERSIA, and also as occasion required, make warre with their neare neighbours: but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no means away withall, accounting it a grievous thing to depart from their wives, vnto whom they are so addicted that oftentimes they carrie them with them into the wars; and being a wanton and fine kind of people, are not able without wages to draw after them, according to their accustomed manner, so many carriages and horses as might serue both for their necessarie and wanton vses. With which difficultie the great king Vsun-Cassanes, Hyfmaell his grandfather by the mothers side, was much troubled in his warres against Mahomet the Great: but was now much harder for Hyfmaell to doe, for that hee hauing obtained his grandfathers kingdome by the meere good will of the people, easing them forthwith of their heauie impositions, alwayes thought the loue of his subjects (which is easily gotten with bountie and justice) the surest riches of his kingdome; and that to commaund onely ouer the bodies and goods of his people, their hearts altogether alienated and lost by most heauie and grievous exactions, seemed not the part of a gracious and naturall prince, but of an outrageous and momentarie tyrant. Whereas Selymus on the contrarie part, who had by force, mischeefe, and most detestable practices stept vp into his fathers seat, had after the maner of the Othoman kings, reposed his greatest and most assured strength in a seruile and mercenarie kind of men, whom he might for pay as his owne creatures, at his pleasure draw farre from home, and as he best liked lead them from place to place, and countrey to countrey, for the enlarging of his empire and eternising of his name: and therefore according to the qualitie of his people, deemed true and readie power to consist onely in money, and the seueritie of his owne commaund; whereby he had leatened with most happie successe, in short time to obscure all the victories of the former Othoman kings, with the greatest of his owne.

All the Winter following Selymus stayed with his armie in SYRIA, spending the time in visiting the ports and cities of that prouince, and setting of things in order, for the better assurance thereof. But vpon the approach of the Spring, when he certainly vnderstood, that by the procurement of Leo the tenth, then bishop of ROME, the Christian princes were entered into consultation to make warre vpon him, and that supplications with great solemnitie were made for that purpose, and honourable embassadours sent into all prouinces to stirre vp the greatest kings of Christendome against him, he (leaving Gazelles his lieutenant in SYRIA), by great journeys returned to CONSTANTINOPLE: from thence as at hand to behold the deuises and motions of the Christian princes his enemies. In the meane time, fearing no alteration to arise in the prouinces of SYRIA and EGYPT, for as much as he well saw, that Cayerbeius and Gazelles, his lieutenants, being at deadly hatred betwixt themselves (as well for old grudges, as for the late treason of Cayerbeius, the great cause of the ruine of the Mamelukes kingdome) would neuer agree in one against him, but rather with a certaine emulation strue betwixt themselves with diligence, faithfulness, and moderation, who should deserue best in well gouerning the prouinces by him committed committed to their charge; as indeed they did during the short time of his raigne.

Selymus being arrived at CONSTANTINOPLE, and purposing from thenceforth to turne all his forces vpon the Christians, caused wonderfull preparation to bee made for his warres, but especially at sea: whereby it was thought, that hee would either haue attempted the strong Island of the RHODES (a great moat in his eye) or els some part of ITALIA. But as hee was hatching this mischeefe, or some other of no lesse importance, and in the meane time delighted himselfe with visiting the cities of GRACIA and THRACE, and folloaced himselfe in the pleasant countrey about HADRIANOPLE, he was suddenly attached with the hand of God, and stricken in the reynes of his backe with a canker: which melancholie and deuouring maladic continuing all cure, did by little and little so eat and corrupt his bodie, as that he before so much honoured, became now loathsome and odious both to himselfe and others.

As he lay thus languishing, his incurable disease still encreasing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus the Bassa, whom of all others he most loued, said: O Pyrrhus, I see I must shortly die without remedie. Whereupon the graue Bassa tooke occasion to discourse with him of many matters: and amongst others, that it would please him to giue order for the well bestowing of the great wealth taken from the Persian marchants in diuers places of his empire: persuading him to bestow the same vpon some notable hospitall for releefe of the poore. To whom Selymus replied, Wouldst thou Pyrrhus, that I should bestow other mens goods, wrongfully taken from them, vpon workes of charitie and deuotion, for mine owne vaine glorie and praise? assuredly I will neuer doe it: nay, rather see they bee againe restored vnto the right owners. Which was forthwith done accordingly: to the great shame of many Christians, who minding nothing lesse than restitution, but making ex rapina holocaustum, do out of a world of euill gotten goods cull out some small fragments, to build some poore hospitall, or mend some blind way: a poore testimonie of their hate charitie.

Selymus lying thus sicke to death, and rotting about the ground in his tent, as he was vpon the way going to HADRIANOPLE, sent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes, two of his greatest Bassas, to prouide for the solemnising of the great feast, which the Turkes call Bairam (and is as it were their Easter) purposing to come after himselfe at leisure, as his weake bodie would giue him leaue: and kept with him onely Ferhates, the third of his greatest Bassas and priue counsellours. But such was the furie of his foule disease, continually attainting him with intolerable paines, that shortly after the departure of the other two Bassas, he breathed out his cruel ghost, in the moneth of September, in the yeare 1520: nere vnto the citie CHIVRA, in the selfesame place where he had sometime most vnaturally assayed his aged father Baidet, with purpose to haue slaine him, had not the fortune of the old emperour in a great battell preuailed both against his force and the treason of his own people. Thus intending the mischeefe he could not performe, cut off by a loathsome and vntimely death, hee to the great joy of all Christendom ended his dayes, when hee had liued six and fortie yeares, and thereof reigned eight: which time of his raigne was nothing els but a most horrible and dreadfull time of bloudshed. His dead bodie was afterwards solemnly by his sonne Solyman buried in a new temple at CONSTANTINOPLE, which he to the imitation of his father and grandfather had for that purpose before built. Vpon his tombe is engrauen in the Greeke, Turkish, and Sclauonian tongues, this short Epitaph.

To whom Selymus replied, Wouldst thou Pyrrhus, that I should bestow other mens goods, wrongfully taken from them, vpon workes of charitie and deuotion, for mine owne vaine glorie and praise? assuredly I will neuer doe it: nay, rather see they bee againe restored vnto the right owners. Which was forthwith done accordingly: to the great shame of many Christians, who minding nothing lesse than restitution, but making ex rapina holocaustum, do out of a world of euill gotten goods cull out some small fragments, to build some poore hospitall, or mend some blind way: a poore testimonie of their hote charitie.

Selymus lying thus sicke to death, and rotting about the ground in his tent, as he was vpon the way going to HADRIANOPLE, sent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes, two of his greatest Bassas, to prouide for the solemnizing of the great feast, which the Turkes call Bairam (and is as it were their Easter) purposing to come after himselfe at leisure, as his weake bodie would giue him leaue: and kept with him onely Ferhates, the third of his greatest Bassas and priuie counsellours. But such was the furie of his foule disease, continually attainting him with intolerable paines, that shortly after the departure of the other two Bassas, he breathed out his cruell ghost, in the month of September, in the yeare 1520: neere vnto the citie CHIVRLI, in the selfesame place where he had sometime most vnnaturally assayed his aged father Baiazet, with purpose to haue slaine him, had not the fortune of the old emperour in a great battell preuailed both against his force and the treason of his own people. Thus intending the mischeefe he could not performe, cut off by a loathsome and vntimely death, hee to the great joy of all Christendom ended his dayes, when hee had liued six and fortie yeares, and thereof raigned eight: which time of his raigne was nothing els but a most horrible and dreadfull time of bloudshed. His dead bodie was afterwards solemnly by his sonne Solyman buried in a new temple at CONSTANTINOPLE, which he to the imitation of his father and grandfather had for that purpose before built. Vpon his tombe is engrauen in the Greeke, Turkish, and Sclauonian tongues, this short Epitaph.

Non bella relinquo, sed pergo inquirere.
Non vlla me fortuna potuit euertere: Licet ossa iacent, animus bella querit.*

In English thus.

Lo here I lie great Selymus, which held the world in feare:
The world I leaue, but not the wars, which I seeke though not here.
No fortunes force, or victors hand, could deale from me the spoiles:
And though my bones lie buried here, my ghost seekes bloudie broiles.

He vsed commonly to say, That nothing was sweeter than to raigne without feare or suspition of his kindred. A little before his death he commended his sonne Solyman to Pyrrhys Basile, straightly charging him, that after his death he should leaue the Persian, and turne his forces altogether vpon the Christians. And the more to incense him to the effusion of bloud, he left him the liuely counterfeite of himselfe hanging at his bed side, with fundrie bloudie precepts breathing forth his cruell and vnmercifull disposition.

His fathers empire Solyman doth rule with mightie power,
And Christian kingdomes ceaseth not with slaughter to deuour.
The antient RHODES, with NAXOS Isle, and PAROS he did take,
And on the coasts of ITALIE did wofull hauocke make:
Faure HUNGARIE with armies great he often did annoy,
And with a world of men had thought VIENNA to destroy.
But whilest to SIGETH he laied siege, in hope the same to haue, Cut off by death in his great pride, went naked to his graue.

THE LIFE OF SOLYMAN, THE FOVRTH AND MOST MAGNIFI- CENT EMPEROVR OF THE TURKES.

He death of Selymus was with all carefulnesse concealed by Ferbates the onely Bassa then present, for feare least the Ianizaries and souldiours of the court getting knowledge thereof, should after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancie of the empire, spoile the merchants and strangers in places where they lay in garrison, and especially in the imperiall citie: and not so contented after their accustomed insolencie prescribe vnto the greatest Bassaes at their pleasure. For preuenting whereof, Ferbates dispatched a trustie messenger with letters in post to Solyman the onely sonne of Selymus, then lying at MAGNÉSIA, certifying him of the death of his father; and that he should deferue well of his peaceable subjects by hastening his comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, whilest all things were yet in good order, in time to repress with his presence the feared disordered proceedings of his men of warre.

Solyman hauing to his great content perused the Bassaes letters, as one desirous enough of the empire; yet considering the cruell disposition of his father (who vpon a meere jealous conceit of his aspiring mind, and for certaine words by him let fall in dislike of his fathers extreame dealing, had practised most vnnaturally to haue taken him away by poison: which danger he escaped onely by the carefulnesse of his mother, who misdoubting the worst, caused the poisoned rich shirt sent to him from his father to be first worne by one of his chamber, whereof he in short time after died) and also that the letters were signed onely by Ferbates, and the newes not seconded from any of the other Bassaes: fearing some hidden & secret plot of his father tending to his destruction, durst not aduenture to remoue from his charge, but returned the messenger as one to whom he gaue little or no credit. Ten daies thus spent, and the death of Selymus nothing as yet suspected; Ferbates vnderstanding by his messenger the warinesse of Solyman, and that he expected more assured aduertisement, sent presently vnto the other great Bassaes Pyrrhus and Mustapha at HADRIANOPLÉ, that they should without delay repaire vnto the court: vnto whom at their comming he declared the death of the emperor. Which after they had seene to be true, they by an other secret and speedie messenger aduertised Solyman againe thereof, firing those letters with all their hands and seales: whereby Solyman now assured of his fathers death, presently put himselfe vpon the way, and by long and painfull journies in few daies came to SEVTARIVM, called in auncient time CRISOPOLIS, ouer against CONSTANTINOPLE. Where he was met with the Aga or capitaine of the Ianizaries, and by him transported in a gallic ouer that straight passage to CONSTANTINOPLE; where at his landing the Ianizaries by the appointment of their capitaine were readie to receiue him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of Selymus, vntill that Solyman being now in the midst of them, the capitaine with a loud voice said vnto them, Behold your emperor. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long liue the great emperor Solyman: which consent of the men of warre, is vnto the Turkish emperours the greatest assurance of their estate. And so with much triumph he was by them brought uous and cruell nature, but of great experience in sea matters. Who presented to Solyman by Mustapha and Ferhates, two of the greatest Bassaes, going before him, after due reverence done, and commaunded to deliuer his opinion, spake vnto Solyman as followeth :

Cortug-Ogli the pirat persuadeth Solyman to besiege the Rhodes.

The greatnesse of your deserts (most mightie and puissant emperor) maketh me (being by you so commaunded) at this time frankly to speake what I thinke may be for the glorie and honour both of your maiestie and empire. I daily heare the pitifull lamentation of the miserable people of MYTLENE, EVBCA, PELOPONESVS, ACHAIA, CARIA, LYCIA, and all alongst the sea coast of SYRIA and EGYPT, bewailing the spoils of their countries, the ransacking of their cities, the taking away of their cattell and people, with other infinit and incredible calamities, which they daily suffer of the crossed Rhodian pirats, no man withstanding them: many a time haue these wretched people holden up their hands to me for helpe, most instantly requesting me to be a meane for them to your imperiall Maiestie, whereby they might be protected from the iniurie, rapine, and slaughter of these cruell rousers. Wherefore in their behalfe I beseech your sacred Maiestie, by the most reuerend name of the holy prophet Mahomet, and by your owne most heriticall disposition to deliuer your afflicted subiects from these their most cruell enemies, and at length to set them free from the furie, captiuitie, and feare of these pyrates more greivous vnto them than death it selfe: and consider with your selfe, that this iniurie and insolencie tendeth not so much to the hurt of your poore subiects and oppressed people in priuat, as to the dishonour and disgrace of your imperiall name and dignitie, which if any other Christian king or prince should offer, your Maiestie I know would not suffer vnrerenged, and will you then suffer these robbers, cut-throats, base people gathered out of all the corners of Christendome, to wast your countries, spoile your cities, murder your people, and trouble all your seas? for who can passe by sea to TRIPOLIS, DAMASCO, ALEXANDRIA, CAIRE, CHALCIDE, LESBOS, CHIOS, nay vnto this your imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, without most certain and manifest danger of these rousers? What haue we heard euerie Spring this manie yeares, but that the Rhodians had taken some one or other of your ports, led away your people into miserable captiuitie, and carried away with them the rich spoiles of your countries? And that which is of all other things most dishonourable, this they doe vnder your nose, and in your sight, in the midst of heart of your empire. Pardon me I beseech your most mightie emperor, if I too plainly speake what I thinke: For whatsoeuer I say, I say it to no other end, but that you should now at length doe that which should manie yeares agoe haue been done. We your most loiall subiects may not nor ought not, for the encrease of our Mahometane religion, and for the enlarging of your empire and honour, to refuse to aduenture our goods, our bodies, our liues to all hazard and danger without exception. If you likewise be caried with loue of glorie and renoune, or rauished with the desire of neuer dying fame; in what way can you more easily gaine the same, or better employ vs your seruants, than in vanquishing and subduing the Rhodians, the reputed bulwarke of Christendome, which onely keepeth vs from their countries? But some will perhaps say, your auncestors haue in former times vnfornately attempted that citie: so did they also BELGRADE in HUNGARIE: yet hath your happie fortune to your immortal fame brought the same vnder your subiection, being far more strongly fortified than it was in times past: and doe you then despaire of the Rhodians? Cast off such vaine and needlesse misdoubt, the Turkish empire hath alwaies growne by aduentures and honourable attempts: therefore make hast to besiege it both by sea and land. If your subiects mourning vnder the heauie burthen of the Christian captiuitie, built it with their owne hands for the Christians, cannot they now at libertie, desirous of reuenge, and fitted with oportunitie, with like hands destroy the same? If it please you to vouchsafe but to looke into the matter (most dread Soueraigne) you shall see that there is a diuine occasion by the procurement of our great prophet Mahomet presented vnto your most sacred Maiestie, now that the Christians of the West are at discord and mortall warre amongst themselves. Your Maiestie is not ignorant, that in managing of warres, the oportunitie of time is especially to be followed: and that when occasion serueth, all remission and delay is to be carefully avoided: the changes of times are most tickle, and if you suffer your good hap now to passe ouer, you shall perhaps in vaine afterwards pursue the same when it is fled and gone.

Solyman by nature an ambitious young prince, prickt forward thus also by the persuasions of Cortug-Ogli and others, seeking their further credit and preferment by firing his ambitious humour: but most of all by the instigation of the Bassa Mustapha, resolved to goe in person himselfe against the Rhodians. And first to make some prooffe of what spirit and courage Villerius the new chosen Great Master was of, in whose sufficiency the greatest part of the defence of the citie was supposed to consist: to him by way of a little cold friendship, he sent a messenger with this short letter thus directed.

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greatest Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRABZOND, most mightie king of PERSIA, ARABIA, SIRIA, and EGYPT, lord of ASIA and EUROPE, prince of Mecha and ALEPPO, ruler of HIRVSATM, and Master of the Vritetfall sea: to the reuerend Father Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Master of the Rhodians, and Legat of ASIA, greeting.

I am glad of thy comming and new promotion, which I wish thou maiest long and happily enioy, for that I hope thou wilt in honour and fidelitie exceed all them which haue before thee ruled in the Rhodians: from whom as my auncestors haue withdrawne their hand, so I after their example ioine with thee in amitie and friendship. Joy thou therefore my friend, and in my behalfe reioice of my glorie and triumph also: for this last Summer passing ouer Danubius with ensignes displayed, I there expected the Hungarian king, who I thought would haue giuen me battell, I tooke from him by strong hand BELGRADE, the strongest citie of his kingdome, with other strong holds thereabouts: and hauing with fire and sword destroyed much people, and carried away many moe into captiuitie, as a triumphant conquerour, breaking up mine armie, am returned to my imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, from whence farewell.

The Great Master hauing read these letters, and well considered of the fame, perceiued forthwith Solymans meaning, and that peace was offered him in words and shew, but war in deed and meaning. Which because he was readie by force to repulse, he rewarded the Turks messenger, and sent backe with him another of his owne, a priuat person. For the Rhodians did feldome vouchsafe to send any honourable embassadours to the Turkish emperours (with whom they for most part liued in hostilitie) either the Turks to them. By this messenger he answered Solymans letters with other of like vaine, as followeth.

Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Master of the Rhodians, to the Turke.

I right well vnderstand your letters which your messenger brought vnto me. The friendship you write of, is as pleasing to me as displeasing to Cortug-Ogli your seruant, who went about to haue intercepted me vpon the suddaine, as I came out of FRANCB: but failing of his purpose, stealing by night into the Rhodian sea, he attempted to haue robbed certaine merchants ships bound from IOPPE to VENICE: but sending my fleet out of my haue, I staied his furie, constrained the pirat to flie and for hast to leaue behind him the prizes he had before taken from the marchants of CRETE. Farewell from the Rhodians.

By this answere Solyman perceiued, that he was well met withall in his owne finenesse, and that he should not so easily carrie the Rhodians, as he had before done BELGRADE. Yet being fully in himselfe resolved to trie his fortune therein, hee called vnto him certaine of the cheefe commanders of his warres, to whom he opened his whole determination in this sort.

Although I doubt not worthe chieftaines, but that you are of the same mind now that you haue been alwaies of, in the inuading of other nations: yet I haue thought it good in matters tending to the common glorie and good of vs all, to vse your generall aduice and counsell. Since the time that my father left this world, we haue made warre with diuers nations and people: The Sirians by nature constant, and prone to rebellion, we haue by force reduced to their former obedience: The Sophis, that mightie king, nephew vnto the great king Vsun-Cassanes by his daughter the sister of king Iacup, in heart and deed our mortall enemie, not contented with the kingdome of ASSIRIA, MEDIA, ARMENIA the greater, PERSIA, and MESOPOTAMIA, we haue by our forces shut up within the compasse of his owne dominions: The last yeare running through HUNGARIE, both on this side and beyond Danubius, we tooke BELGRADE the strongest fortresse of that kingdome: and whatsoeuer els we attempted, we subdued. Yet for all that (to speake plainly of my selfe) my mind greater in conceit than mine empire, and the blond of Othoman, findeth no contentment in these victories. For whatsoever you have yet done, although it be great, yet I deeme it all but little, in regard of your worth: my desire carrieth me further. This haue I alwaies above all things most earnestly desired, to set upon the RHODES, and utterly to root out all the strength and forces, yea the very name of those Rhodian souldiours. And haue not you also no lesse than my selfe desired the same? How often haue I heard you crying out, The RHODES, The RHODES? I haue expected the time, that being discharged of other warres I might here employ my whole strength and power. That we so long deferred, is now come: there was neuer greater oportunitie of good successe offered, a great part of the wals of the citie of the RHODES now lying even with the ground; which cannot in short time be repaired, especially in their want of coine. Beside this, the garrison in the castle is but small, and their aid from FRANCE farre off, which will either come too late when the citie is lost, or that which I rather beleue, neuer. For neither will the French king (being at mortall warres with the Germane emperor, and lord of ITALIE) suffer his storehouses to be disurnished, or his ports bared of the necessary defence of his shipping; neither doe you beleue that the Spaniards (distressed at home with famine, warre, and ciuile discention) will easily come hither out of SICILIA and CAMPANIA with supplies of men and victuall. But you may perhaps thinke, that great danger is to be feared from the Venetian fleet, and the Isle of CRETE, which I assure you is not so: for I know (although I will not now manifest the same) how I haue prevented that mischeefe. Wherefore our courageous souldiours (borne to the subduing of all Christendome, much more of the RHODES) with cheerefull hearts follow me your Soueraigne against these your most perfidious and cruell enemies. How long I pray you will you suffer that shame and disgrace to sticke upon the Othoman familie, and generally upon all the name of the Turkes, which these Rhodians cast upon us the last time they were besieged? which was not so much done by their valour, as by the vnfortunat counsell of my great grandfather Mahomet, calling home Mesithes Paleologus his Generall in that warre, for one vnluckie assault. But admit that their valour gained them the victorie, will you therefore alwaies suffer these piraticall excursions upon our maine and Islands? the ransacking of our cities and countries? the carrying away of your cattell and richest substance? the captiuitie and slaughter of your wines and children? the slauerie of your nearest friends and kinsmen? So helpe me great Mahomet, it shall not so bee: I vow, in despite of Christ and Iohn, in short time to set up mine ensignes with the Moone in the middle of the market place of the RHODES. Neither doe I seeke any thing unto my selfe, more than the honour of the enterprise; the profit I giue unto you my fellow souldiours, their coine, plate, iewels (which is reported to be great) their riches and wealth is all yours, to carrie home with you unto your wines and children. Wherefore let us now with all our forces and courage set forward to the besieging of the RHODES.

Solymans purpose thus made knowne, and the same with one accord of all his captaines well liked: Pirrhus the eldest Bassa and of greatest authoritie, who at the first dissuaded the warre, standing vp in the middest of the rest, said:

I cannot but much admire the great wisdom and rare vertues of our young emperor, who so wisely and aduisedly hath declared all the deepe counsels of a worthie cheefetaine in taking of warre in hand. Blessed be Mahomet, thrice and foure times blessed is this empire, blessed is our estate, and blessed are we with such a prince, which carrieth with him in his warres not onely men and habiliments of warre, but most deepe wisdom and policie. Which wholsome manner of proceeding, if we had alwaies before our eyes, and would follow, we should in short time bring under our subiection not the RHODES onely, but all the kingdomes of the Christians. Yet beside that which our emperor hath most carefully and considerately deuised, mine age and experience would exhort you, by gifts, promises, rewards, and all other meanes whatsoever, to corrupt if it were possible the very cheefe and principal citizens of the RHODES, thereby to enter into their most secret denices and counsels: which how it may be wrought, I will in few words giue you to understand. I as a man indifferent, desirous of peace and quietnesse, will by messengers and letters induce the Great Master to send some honourable embassage to our dread Soueraigne, which if I can once bring him unto, then let me alone with the rest.

This counsell of the old Fox pleased all the hearers well, but about others the emperor himselfe, who gaue him in charge with all diligence and speed, to proue what he could doe: the other captaines he commaunded to prepare the greatest forces they could, both for land and sea service.

service. Which preparation was so great both at CONSTANTINOPLE and other places, that it could not long be kept so secret, but that newes thereof was brought to the RHODES the fourth day of Februarie: which newes daily increasing and still confirmed by more certaine reports, Villerius the Great master for more certaine intelligence, sent a Christian of EPIDAVRVS, who could perfectly speake the Turkish language, as a spie to CONSTANTINOPLE; who by secret letters from thence gaue him knowledge, that the Turkes were preparing a great fleet, and raising a mightie armie, aduertising him also of a wonderfull proportion of artillerie prepared for batterie; but against whom was not commonly knowne, some deeming it to be for the invasion of ITALIE, some for the RHODES, others supposing it to be for CIPRVS or CORCIRA: which diuersitie of conjectures, made many (whose conceits auerted from themselves the fortune of that warre) to be more carelesse and secure. But whilest euery man was of opinion, that it was made against any man rather than himselfe; certaine aduertisement was giuen to the Rhodians from diuers places by letters from their friends and confederats, That the Turkes did with extraordinary diligence keepe straight watch and ward in all their ports therabouts along the sea coast, otherwise than they were before accustomed: which seemed to prognosticate some farther matter than the defence of their frontiers. Villerius careful of his charge, as the mark whereat the enemy aimed, provided with all possible diligence great store of victuall, armour, weapons, shot, powder, and whatsoever els necessary for the defence of the citie.

Villerius prepares to make resistance against the Turke.

The new wals of the citie, and AVERGNE fortresse, by Basilus engineer to the emperor Charles the fifth (a worke begun in the time of Fabritius Carettus late Graund master, but not yet finished) was now with all diligent labour set vpon, euery man putting his helping hand vnto so necessary a worke. Whilest these things are with so great endeuour and labour a doing, a messenger came from CONSTANTINOPLE, sent from the old Bassa Pyrrhus, a sharpe witted and cunning fellow; who with much filed speech in most ample manner doing his message, by the way, painted forth the great towardlinesse and courteous nature of the Turkish emperor Solyman, with the great commendation of Pyrrhus Bassa his master: deliuering from both of them letters vnto the Great master of this purport.

Solyman by the grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. to the reuerend father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great master of the RHODES and legat of ASIA, greeting.

I am certainly enformed that my letters are deliuered unto thee; which for that thou understoost Solymans letter deist them aright, I cannot expresse how much it pleased me. Trust to it, that I am not contented to Villerius. With the victorie I got at BELGRADE; I hope for another, nay I assure my selfe thereof, which I will not hide from thee, whom I am alwaies mindfull of. Farewell from CONSTANTINOPLE.

Pyrrhus great counsellor to the mightie emperor Solyman, to Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great master of the RHODES and legat of ASIA, greeting.

Your letters, greater in meaning than character, I haue deliuered unto our most mightie emperor: but the bearer thereof I would not suffer to come to his presence, least he should be too much offended with so base a messenger. Vnto whom from henceforth send men of worth, commendable for their yeares and discretion, with whom his Maestie may (if he so please) conferre and conclude of the matters concerning the common good: which thing if you shall doe, it shall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my counsell. The messenger I send, bringeth letters unto you also from our great emperor; to whose diuine excellencie how you are to answer, you are already admonished. Farewell from CONSTANTINOPLE.

These letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diuersly. Such as altogether wished for peace, measuring others after their owne plaine meaning and integritie, commended the counsell of Pyrrhus, saying, That he being an old man of great experience, was not so desirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his prince and countrey: and therefore wished by wisdom to order that which the young prince sought for by war, fearing the vncertaintie of mans fragillitie, fragilitie, the common chance of warre, the violence of fortune, which hath oftentimes in a moment with a handfull of men ouerthrowne most mightie kings with their strong armies. The persuasion of these men tooke such effect, that one of the knights of the order called Raymund March, a Spaniard, a noble gentleman of great courage and verie eloquent, skilfull also in the Turkish tongue, and then master maister, was appointed to haue beene sent embassadour vnto the Turkish emperor. Many there were of a contrarie opinion, which suspecting fraud and deceit, said it were good to beware of the enemies counsell: asking, to what end this embassage were? for should we proclaime warre (say they) against the most mightie tyrant, not yet our professed enemy, who writeth all peace? or should we intreat for peace, no warre as yet proclaimed? that he which as yet is afraid himselfe, may now vnderstand that he is of vs feared. Besides that, with what securitie, with what face can our embassadours go, vnrequested of the Turkish emperor, without his safe conduct thorow those countries which we daily burne and spoile? But they shall shew Pyrrhus the great Bassaes letters forsooth, his protection, his credit and authoritie shall defend them from all iniurie and wrong; as though the seruant should prescribe lawes vnto his master, and such a seruant as is most like vnto his master (that is) cruell, false of faith, a hater of all Christians, but especially of vs Rhodians: whom the mercilesse tyrant hauing in his power, with his nauie and armie in readinesse, shall with cruell torture enforce to discover vnto him our prouision, the secrets of our citie and Order. This opinion of the wilest sort, was greatly confirmed by the too much curiositie of the messenger which was sent, who with all diligence enquired of the state and situation of the citie, of the number and strength of the Order. Wherefore in conclusion he was sent backe againe, accompanied but with one priuat souldiour to carrie the Great masters letters vnto the Turkish tyrant: the tenure whereof was thus.

Philippus Villerius Great master of the Rhodes, vnto the Turke greeting.

Villerius his answer to Solyman's letters.

That you are mindfull of me, grieve me nothing: and I am also mindfull of you. You repaire your victorie in HUNGARIE, wherewith not being contented you hope for another: naie you promise and assure your selfe thereof, before you haue attempted the warre. Beware you deceiue not your selfe; mens expectations neuer deceiue them more than in warres. Farewell from the RHODES.

The other letters written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect.

Philippus Villerius Liladapus Great master of the Rhodes, to Pyrrhus the Bassa.

Villerius his answer to Pyrrhus the Bassa his letters.

I haue aduisedly considered thy letters, with the behaviour and disposition of thy messenger. As I contemne not thy counsell, so will I not follow the same, whilst my men of warre doe spoile the countries and ports of thy lord, and master; which I beare withall, by reason of the iniuries they haue sustained of the Turkish pirats. But I will call them home, and will send embassadours vnto thy great lord: so that thou before send me safe conduct vnder thy masters great seale, for their safe coming and returne. Farewell from the RHODES.

Villerius aduertised of the coming of the Turkish fleet.

But these letters were neuer deliuered vnto the great Turke, or the Bassa: for as soone as the Turkish messenger was come ouer into the maine, he presently tooke horse, which was therein readinesse for him, and posted towards CONSTANTINOPLE with as much speed as he could, leauing the Christian messenger his companion behind him; who returning backe againe to the RHODES, and telling what he had heard and seene, gaue them all great occasion to dispaire of peace: whereupon Villerius sent into CRET to hire certaine companies of Cretensian archers. In the meane time aduertisement was given vnto the Great master by letters from the island of NAXOS, That the Turkes were ready to put their fleet to sea with the first appearance of the new Moone: which thing they most superstitiously obserue in the beginning of all their great actions. The same newes was brought also by certaine merchants of the island of PARNOS, who came to the RHODES with a great ship laded with corne from EVBA; vnder the colour of the sale whereof, they (by the commaundement of the Turkes, to whom they were tributaries) ries) diligently noted all that was done in the citie, shortly to be besieged. The Great master with no lesse diligence, sent diuers of his small galleies amongst the islands and amongst the maine, to learne what might be of the enemies doings. Ioannes Lupus one of the knights of the order, and captaine of one of these galleies, meeting with a great ship of the Turkes laded with corne, tooke her and brought her home to the RHODES. But Alphonsus captaine of another of the galleies, lying in harbour in one of the islands, and suffering his men to straggle too farre into the land, was set vpon by a Turkish pirat and taken.

About the same time the Turkes by often fires made vpon the maine in the night season, gaue signe vnto the Rhodians, that they were desirous to haue some parley with them; as their manner was. Whereupon one Meniston a French man, one of the knights, by commaundement of the rest of the order, was sent with a gallee well appointed to the maine to see what the matter might be; and with him was joyined Iacobus Xaycus paymaster for the galleies, that he might of the inhabitants of the place, and his friends there dwelling, diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended warre: for this Xaycus, besides that he was a skilfull sea man and one that knew the coast well, had also good experience in ciuile affairs; and was wonderfully beloued and made of by the Turkish merchants, whose language hee had perfectly leatned. Drawing neere the shoare, he found the Turkish merchants making merrie vpon the maine, with their carpers, cooten wooll, and such like merchandise about them as they vsed to exchange with the Rhodian merchants for woollen cloathes: vnto these merchants he gaue due salutations, gaging his faith for their safetie, and they likewise to him. But being requested to come ashore to make merrie vntill one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be sent for, who as they said was not farre off; he answered, that he could not so doe, except they would first deliuer a pledge for him a shipboord. The perfidious Turkes laughing as it were at his needlesse feare, willingly sent their merchandise, and a pledge aboard the galleies. Xaycus then going ashore, and embracing the Turkish merchants which met him: vpon a signe giuen, was forthwith beset on euerie side and taken prisoner, and by post horses conuaid with all speed to CONSTANTINOPLE; where he was with most exquisite torments that could be deuised for any man to endure, enforced to confess whatsoeuer his cruell enemies could desire. After Xaycus was by treacherie thus lost, then began their proud vntowardnesse to be highly commended, which were the occasion, that the decree made for sending embassadours vnto the Turke, was againe reuoked. The hostage giuen for Xaycus, being brought to the RHODES and examined, was found to be a simple country fellow whom the Turkes had of purpose well apparelled to deceiue the Rhodians: who frankly and plainly according to his simple knowledge, answered to all things that were of him demaunded; as that the Turkes were making great preparation for sea vpon the coasts of CARIA and LYCIA, and had taken vp many souldiours in the countries thereabouts to send vnto the frontiers of his dominions towards SYRIA, for defence of the same against the Persians. All which was true: For Solyman to put the Rhodians out of all suspicion of inuasion (whom hee knew carefully to obserue his doings) sent those souldiours whom he had leuiued in the countries neere vnto the RHODES, farre away against the Persian, as if he had meant nothing against the RHODES, and so vpon the sudden to set vpon them with his armie brought out of EVROPE, before they were aware. But this his deuise serued to small purpose, for the Great Master perceiving by many circumstances, but especially by that late calamitie of Xaycus, that the RHODES was in the place the Turkish tyrant longed after; and fearing that delay might bring farther danger, caused a cessation from all other businesse to be proclaimed, vntill all things necessarie for defence of the citie were accomplished: watch and ward was kept in euerie street, the great artillery planted vpon the wals and bulwarks, companies appointed for the defence of euerie place, the publike armorie full of all warlike prouision was open, all the streets were full of men carrying weapons, some to one place, some to another. At which time a generall muster was taken by the chiefe men of the Order, where were found about 5000 free men able to beare armes, amongst whom were 600 knights of the Order, and 500 souldiours of CRET; the rest were for most part martiners, able bodies, who in the time of the siege did great seruice, encouraged by their sea captaines: the island people which repaired into the citie, serued to little other purpose but to dig and carrie earth vnto the rampiers: and the citizens (except it were some few of the better sort) were for the most part weake and of small courage, not able to endure any labour or paines, and yet hardly to be kept in order and gouerned, great speakers, but small doers, greater greater in shew than in deed. The Great Master hauing carefully provided and ordered all things needfull for defence of the citie, and fearing nothing more than the faint hearts of the citizens, caused them all to bee called together; for encouragement of whom, hee spake vnto them as followeth:

Vallinius his Oration vnto
the Rhodians.

Valiant gentlemen and worthie citizens, we heare that the Turke our mortal enemy is comming against vs, with a huge armie raised of diuers nations: from whose naturall crueltie and wanted pcurie except we defend our selues by force, one and the selfesame danger is like to befall me, my knights, and you all. For wee haue with common consent and hand, greuously spoiled him both by sea and land, and you are by booties taken by strong hand out of his dominions, enriched: and at this day we keepe his people in greuous seruitude, and he ours; but he iniuriously, and we most iustly. For his ancestors (reuerie of the darke denmes and caues of the mountaine CAVCASVS, their naturall dwelling) without right, title, or cause, incited onely with couetousnesse, ambition, and the hatred of our most sacred religion, haue driuen the Christians out of SYRIA: and afterwards, oppressed the Grecians in GARCIA: where not contented to haue destroyed the people, with one simple kind of death (as barbarisme in euier cruell and mercilesse) they haue with most exquisite and horrible torments butchered many thousands of that nation. All whom this wicked proud youth (whose mischeefe exceedeth his yeares) in euill neighbour to all men, not contented with the dominions of ARABIA, SYRIA, EGYPT, the greatest part of ASIA, and of many other places moe, seeketh in tyrannie, murder, spoile, perimie, and hatred against Christ and Christians, farre to excell: and forceth himselfe to the uttermost of his power, to take from vs our Islands, and to subdue the Christian countries; that so at length being lord of all, and commaunder of the world, he may at his pleasure overthrow the Christian cities, kill the Christians, and utterly root out the Christian name, which he so much hateth. For the repelling of which intollerable iniurie, we haue especially chosen this Island of the RHODAS for our dwelling place, because the same seemed more commodious than any other for the annoying of this barbarous nation. We haue done what in vs lay, holpen by you: we know by prooffe your great valor and fidelitie, which we now haue not in any distrust. Wherefore I will not use many words to perswade you to continue in your fidelitie and loyalitie, neither long circumstance to encourage you to play the men: sithence worthie minds are not with words either encouraged or dismaied. But concerning myselfe and my knights of the Order, I will speake a few words. I wish them, with whom (as I hope) the Christian princes and other my knights of the West will in good time ioine their forces, are most readie and prest to defend your selues, your children, your wiues, your goods, the monuments of your ancestors, and sacred temples dedicated to the seruice of our God. Which opinion that it may remaine firme and fix in your minds, if nothing els, my faithfulness in your warres, my bodie not yet altogether spent, but able enough to endure paines and trauell, the nobilitie of these worthie knights of the Order, their loue towards you, and their hatred towards your enemies, were sufficient to confirme: but beside this, the strength of this citie, which this noble Order hath with infinit charges so notably fortified with ditches, wals, towers, and bulwarkes against all the force and furie of artillerie, is such that no citie may worthely be compared, much lesse preferred before the same. It is wonderfully stored with all kind of weapons and warlike prouision: we haue laid up plentie of wine, fleshe, and corne, in vaults, so that whether wet weather nor wormes can attaine the same: of wood and wholesome water not to be taken from vs, things necessarie for men besieged, we haue plentie: and able men ynow for the defence of the citie. All which things promise vnto vs assured victorie, and such end of the warre as we wish for. Besides this, Necessitie, which giueth courage euen vnto cowards, will enforce vs to fight. Yet standeth on our side true religion, faith, conscience, deuotion, constancie, the loue of our country, the loue of our libertie, the loue of our parents, wiues, children, and what soeuer els we hold deare: where as they bring with them the proud commaund of their captaines, infidelitie, impietie, vnconstancie, a wicked desire of your bondage, of your blood, and the blood of your parents, wiues and children. Out of doubt (beloued citizens) our good God will not suffer so many good vertues to be overcome by their foule vices. Wherefore be you in minds quiet and secure, and trouble not your selues with forboding feare of your enemies: onely continue in the fidelitie and loyalitie which you haue alwaies kept inuiolat and vnspotted toward this sacred and honourable fellowship, in most dangerous wars, and hardest chances of fortune: and if need shall so require, with courageous hand shew your valour against your enemies, and quite it knowne vnto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and English, That the Rhodians are of power to daunt the Turkish pride, and to auct their fleets and armies from ITALIE, which they haue

so many yeares threatened with fire and sword: and will no doubt thither with all speed hasten and come, if (that which my mind abhorreth to speake) they should here preuaile. Neither will this ambitious youth, in courage, fallhood, and crueltie exceeding Hanniball, imitate him in that, that hauing overthrowne the Romans in the great battell at CANNAS, knew not to use haunctorie: but he will presently with more than Cæsars celeritie bring forth the treasures his father got in AEGYPT, and with great fleets and huge armies invade AFRICA, CALABRIA, and SICILIA, from whence he will forthwith breake into FALSA, and afterwards into SPAIN, and other Christian countries, raging through them with all kind of crueltie. But I am caried away further than I purposed, and than need is: For your fidelitie and valor (most worthie citizens) to endure the siege and resist the enemy, is such, as needeth not my perswasion; and of greater resolution, than that it can be shaken with the dangers incident to men besieged. For the greatest and most forcible miseries of all, which is hunger and thirst, I assure you you shall neuer feelee, which pinching calamities for all these same people (in such false, courage, and valour nothing comparable to you) haue neuertheless most constantly endured. For they of PATELIMVM, besieged by the Carthaginians, for want of victuals, sold their parents and children out of the citie, the longer to hold out the siege, and lined themselves with hides and leather sod or broiled and leaues of trees, and made other homely things, by the space of eleven moneths, and could not be overcome vntill they wanted strength longer to stand vpon the wals, and to hold their weapons in their hands. They of CASSILINVM besieged by Hanniball, held out with a poorer monie, was sold for much monie. You must of necessity keepe watch and ward in your seasons: if your houses chance to be beaten downe with the enemies artillerie, you must haue patience; for why, they shall be repaired againe, and it is not a matter of such importance, that we should therfore yeld vnto our enemies whose courtesie and fidelitie no assurance is to be reposed. For besides that he is by nature cruell and vnfaithfull, he can by no means be gentle and faithfull towards vs, which haue done him so much harme: who onely (as he himselfe saith) haue oftentimes to his greefe interrupted the course of the victories of him the conquerour both of sea and land: whom he hath so many times assailed by open force with all his strength, wit, craft, deceit, and policie: yet alwaies he hath in vaine, almightie God full protecting vs, whom aboue all things (most deare citizens) I wish you to serue and call vpon: For except he keepe and defend the citie, the watchmen doe but watch in vaine.

This cheerefull speech wonderfully encouraged the hearers, especially the vulgar sort, easily caried away with pleasing words. But whilest they in their iolitic dreame of nothing but of triumph and victorie, the wiser sort possessed with care, ceased not to doe what in them lay, to procure, That the good commonly forewished, might in fine come to effect. Amongst others, Clement bishop of the Greekes, a man both for his place and deuout manner of liuing had in great reputation amongst them, laboured earnestly by dayly exhortations to perswade the Greekes his countrey men in that great and common danger with heart and hand to ioine with the Latines in defence of the citie: for although the gouernment was altogether in the Great Master and his Knights, which were Latines; yet the people both of the Island and citie were for most part Greekes, who liked not altogether so well of the Latine gouernment, but that they did many times repine thereat. Howbeit the matter was at that time so ordered by the good perswasion of the bishop, and good gouernment of the Great Master, that they all agreed as one man to spend their liues in defence of the citie; and were so farre from feare of the comming of the barbarous enemy, that many of the vulgar people, in whom appeareth commonly more heart than wit, wished rather for his comming than otherwise. But looke what they had fondly wished, proued afterwards to their costs ouer true. For within a few nights after, the Turkes by fire made the night time vpon the maine, gaue signe of parley vnto the Rhodians. Whereupon a gallie well appointed, with a long boat, was presently set forth to see what the matter was: which drawing nere vnto the shore, was hailed by a Turke, accompanied with a troupe of horsemen, desiring the captaine of the gallie to send some on shore, with whom they might more conueniently parley: which thing the captaine refusing, What, said the Turke, art thou afraid of Xayem? To whom the captaine in threatening manner answered againe, Xayem whom you haue contrarie to your faith and oath taken, troubleth me not; neither am I afraid of you, whom I trust not: but if you haue any thing to say, let me heare it, or els get you further off, otherwise I will speake to you by the mouth of the cannon. Then one of the Turks comming to the water side, laid downe letters vpon a stone, saying, that in them was contained that they had in charge which said, he presently let spurs to his horse, and departed with the rest of his company. The captain sending out his long boat for these letters, found them directed in this sort.

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, most mightie Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRAPEZONDE, &c. vnto the renowned father Philipppus Villerius Lilladarius, Great Master of the Rhodoss, to his worthy knights, and all his people in generall.

The purport of which letter was as followeth:

Solyman threatening letters to the Rhodians.

The compassion I haue of my distressed subjects, and the great iniurie you doe me, hath moued me so, that I therefore I commaund you without delay to yeeld vnto mee the Island and chiefe of the RHODES, willingly and charitably granting you leave safely to depart with all your riches, in as farre as you please vnder my obedience, your libertie and religion in no part infringed with tribute or imposition. If you be wise, preserve friendship and peace before bloudie warre: for as much as which are by force subdued, are referred all extremities, which the miserable vanquished use to suffer of the angrie conquerour: from which neither your owne force, nor forraine aid nor huge walls, which will utterly ouerthrow, shall be able to defend you, fare you well. All which shall assuredly be performed, if you shall make choice rather of my friendship than of my force: wherein you shall neither be deceived nor circumvented; I take to witnesse God the creator of heauen and earth, the foure writers of the Euangelicall historie, the foure score thousand prophets descended from heauen, & amongst them our highest prophet Mahomet, the reuerend ghosts of my father and grandfather, and this my sacred imperiall head. From our pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE.

When these letters were openly read in the Counsell chamber at the RHODES, some were of opinion, That it was good to answer the Turkish tyrant roundly, thereby to giue him to vnderstand that they were not afraid of his threats: other some thought it no wisdom to haue words to prouoke so great an enemy to further displeasure. Thus whilest euery man would haue framed an answer according to his owne disposition, in conclusion it was agreed vpon, to giue him no answer at all.

The same day these letters came to the RHODES, which was the foureteenth day of Iune. One of the Turkes great commanders at sea with thirtie gallies, the forerunners of the Turkish fleet, arrived at the Island of Cnos, famous in ancient time for the birth of Hippocrates the great physician, and the wonderfull picture of Venus left there vnpersifed by Apelles, which for the excellencie thereof neuer man durst afterward take in hand to perfect: which fruitfull and pleasant Island was then at the arrivall of the Turkes, part of the dominion of the RHODES. The Admirall of this fleet here landing his Turkes, began to burne the corne which was then almost ripe, with the countrey villages round about. With which iniurie, Prexianes gouernour of the Island (a man of great courage and valour) moued, with a chosen companie of footmen, and certaine troupes of horsemen, suddainly set vpon the Turkes, in diuers places dispersed abroad far into the countrey, with such a terrible crie of the countrey people, and instruments of warre, that the Turkes being therewith amazed, ran away as if they had been mad, and were many of them slaine without resistance; and had not the gallies lien neare the shore, to receiue them that were able to flee thither, there had not one of them which landed escaped the hands of the Island people. The Turkes hauing receiued this losse, left the Island, and put to sea againe.

for feare of the Turks destroy their suburbs & pieces of plaine
without the citie.

The Rhodians for the most part now assured and out of doubt of the comming of the Turkes, by the persuation of Gabriell Pomerolus vicemaster, and other men of great experience, plucked downe the suburbs of the citie, and laid them euen with the ground, their pleasant orchards also and gardens neere vnto the citie, they vtterly destroyed; the Great Master for example sake beginning first with his owne, being a place of great delicacie, lying vnder the wals neere vnto the French bulwarke: and taking into the citie all such things as they thought needfull for the enduring of the siege, they vtterly destroyed all the rest, were it neuer so pleasant or commodious, within a mile of the towne, leauing all that space as euen and bare as they could possibly make it; to the intent, that the enemy at his comming should find nothing neere the citie, wherof to make vic. But whilest the pleasures and delights of the suburbs are thus in defacing; another more heauie and wofull sight presented vnto the eies of the citifens, filled the citie with greater mourning and penitence than did the comming of the enemy. The miserable multitude of the poore countrey people, some bringing wood, some corne, some cattell, some foules, and other such necessities as they had, out of the countrey into the citie (for so the Great Master had commaunded) after whom followed great numbers of women and children weeping, with discheueld haire, scratching their faces and tearing themselves after the manner of the countrey, wringing their hands and casting vp their eies to heauen, beseeching God with heauie countenance and floods of teares to defend the noble citie of the RHODES and themselves from the furie of their enemies. Which multitude of countrey people with their prouision, being packt vp into narrow roomes in the houses of the citifens, and their cattell staruing for want of fodder, afterwards corrupted the aire; whereof ensued rotten agues and the flux, during the time of the siege. But after the citie was giuen vp, such a plague and mortalitie followed, as destroyed great numbers of the Turkes and poore Christians; which knowing not whither to go, chose rather there to die than to forsake their native countrey.

The Generall of the Turkish fleet, which landed in the island of Cnos, and was of purpose sent by Solyman to prouoke the Rhodians to battell at sea; before he with his whole power came to besiege the island, came daily with twentie gallies halfe those narrow seas ouer, betwixt LYCIA and the RHODES, leauing the rest of his fleet riding at anchor at the promontorie called GNIDVM (not farre from the citie of the RHODES) readie to aid him as need should require: this manner of brauerie he used many daies together, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians out of their haven to giue him battell; knowing, that if he should therein obtaine the victorie, it were at that time little lesse than the taking of the citie, or if he could by cruell fight but weaken the forces of the Rhodians, he should therein doe his master good seruice, and greatly further his victorie by diminishing the number of the defendants. When he had many daies without intermission in this proud manner come halfe seas ouer, and sometimes passing further came and lay at the mouth of the haven, as it were daring them to fight: the Rhodians not wont to be so braued at their owne doores, moued with the intollerable insolencie of this proud Turke, by their continuall importunitie caused the Great Master to call a counsell, to consider whether they should fight with this fleet of the Turkes or not. The counsellors by the appointment of the Great Master assembled: the Chancellor, a man of great authoritie and spirit, famous for his noble acts both at home and abroad, and chiefe of them which were of opinion this fleet of the Turkes was to be fought withall, said:

So great disgrace was not longer to be suffered, but presently reneged: For (said he) the huge fleet of the Turkes, I do not feare at whose force or sight, but at whose verie name many men do tremble and quake (which for all that is vnto vs no great noueltie, for euery yeare we heare of the like) is as a head to be ioined vnto these piraticall gallies, as members; and then will it be most expedient (which will be almost easie thing for vs to doe, hauing the better both for strength of shipping and number and valour of men) to giue that great head such a blow and wound, by cutting off these limbes, that it shall neuer after stagger and faile for want of strength: or else there is no other fleet at all prepared against vs to follow this, and then this discomfited we shall be at quiet. Which thing in my iudgement (though others which feare their owne shadowes and the falling of heauen, say otherwise) is most like to be true: for the great Turke is not so softish to come hither, the fittest time of the yeare being so far spent, in the latter end of Iune, to besiege this citie, and such a citie as he knoweth to be most strong, wanting no thing that is needfull, and thorowly manned with valiant souldiours, from whence his ancestors haue been with losse and shame repulsed: when as the remainder of the Sommer will be spent, before he can escape himselfe and place his batteries; and winter time as you know is unfit for any siege, especially in this island, wherein they can find no haven or harbour to rest in. Wherefore on Gods name let vs set vpon our proud enemies, and let vs not for a few threatening words sent vnto vs from a fearefull youth, vpon a fineness, and pollicie, least we should follow the tale of his fleet bound for some other place, sit still like cowards within our wals with our hands in our holmes, as men which for feare and dread durst not shew their heads. Which our cowardise and want of courage we (forsooth) call Fabius pollicie: but I would to God we were like Fabius, but I feare we shall proue more like Antiochus, the Resolians, the Itellians, all whose courage consisted in words, vainly hoping to gaine the victorie by sitting still and wishing well. But the helpe of God is not to be gotten by womens prayers and supplications.

cations or these faint-hearted policies, which cowards call advised counsell: but victorie is gained by aduenturing and exposing our selues to danger and perill.

With these and such like speeches he so moued the multitude, which commonly conceleth most courage vpon the greatest vncertainties, that they desired that they might fight, saying, That they would wash away that foule disgrace with the blood and slaughter of their enemies: for why, they wanted not weapons, courage, or hands (as they said) to doe it withall.

For all this, the grauer sort of the counsell (without whose consent the master might in such cases doe nothing) thought it not good in so dangerous a time to aduenture any great part of their forces, which they should afterwards want for the defence of their citie. The Turkish generall deceived of his expectation, and perceiuing that the Rhodians would not be drawne forth to battell at sea, withdrew his fleet twelue miles off, vnto a place called VILLANOVA, where casting anchor and landing his men, he burnt the corne all thereabouts which was now almost ripe, but forsaken of the people as a thing desperat: as for the people themselves, they were all fled, and had retired themselves either into the citie of the RHODIANS, or els into strong castles in other places of the island.

At the same time, certaine troupes of horsemen sent forth to haue skirmished with the Turks that were burning of the corne, were by a messenger sent from the Great master, commanded to retire: For the prouident Generall fought by all meanes to reserue his soldiers for greater dangers, which he justly feared in the expected siege: during which time he shewed himselfe a most politike capitaine and braue soldiour, he would many times by day eat his meat with his soldiers as one of them, and most part of the night keepe watch himselfe walking vp and downe, telling himselfe when he was wearie vpon some stone or piece of timber or other homely seat, as it chanced. In time of assault he was alwaies more forward and aduenturous than the graue counsellors withed, fearing neither shot nor enemy: yet did he alwaies more commend discreet counsell grounded vpon reason, than prosperous actions commended but by their euent. And that which a man would wonder at, amongst so many cares in midst of such diuers and dangerous chances, he carried alwaies such a grace and maiestie in his cheerfull countenance, as made him to be of the beholders both reuerenced and loued. All the time he could spare from the necessarie cares of his waighe charge, from assaults, and the naturall refreshing of his bodie, he bestowed in prayer and seruing of God; he did oftentimes spend the greatest part of the night in the church alone praying, his headpiece, gorget and gauntlets lying by him: so that it was commonly said, that his deuout prayers and carefulnesse would make the citie inuincible.

The six and twentieth day of Iune early in the morning, newes was brought into the citie from the watch-tower standing vpon S. Stephens hill about a mile from the citie, That a most huge fleet was descried at sea, making thitherwards all alongst the Westerne coast of Lycia. This bad newes much troubled the citie, although it was not of most men vnexpected; all places was filled with tumult and hurly burly, euerie man measured the greatnesse of the danger by the measure of his owne feare, and such a pitifull crie was in euerie place as is usually in cities presently to be besieged. Hereupon publike prayers were made through all the citie, and euerie man with great deuotion besought the God of heauen, That as it was his pleasure that the Rhodians should at that time be the champions of the Christian religion; so he would giue them strength and victorie against their enemies, and to turne the calamities of warre vpon the enemies of his name. Their deuotion ended, the gates of the citie were shut vp, and people from all places ran vnto the wals, great flocks of women, children, and aged men not able to stand without a staffe, going forth of their houses to gaze vpon that dreadful fleet (wherein was about 200 sailles as is reported) filled the streets, the tops of the high towers and houses. The foremost of the fleet was the Admirall of CALIPOLIS, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his name, and to assaile the citie by sea: The rearadmirall was Cara Mahometes an arch pirate, who was afterwards slaine with a great shot out of the citie. The viceadmirall in the middle of the fleet with a great squadron of gallies, hauing a faire Western wind, stricke saile directly before the mouth of the haven (which was on both sides defended with two strong towers well furnished with great artillerie) and began to row towards the citie: whereupon an alarm was raised, the trumpets sounded, and many hastened vnto the bulwarke which defended the left side of the haven, which the enemy seemed to direct his course vnto; and was indeed more subiect to danger than the other. But the Turke seeing himselfe in danger to be sunke with shot from the bulwarke, was glad to get himselfe farther off vnto the rest of the fleet: the Rhodians from the wals with lowd outcries scornfully deriding him for his foolish attempt. This great fleet in exceeding brauerie and triumph passing by the citie in sight of the Rhodians (standing vpon their wals with ensignes displayed) did not more terrifie them, than they were themselves terrified to behold the strength of the citie and cheerfulness of the defendants. But passing on, they came to the promontorie which the inhabitants call B O, about three miles distant from the citie, Eastward: which small harbour being not able to receiue so great a fleet, many of the gallies were enforced to ride it out at sea, where they were by shot out of the citie oftentimes endangered and enforced to get them farther off. Whilest the enemy was there landing his great ordinance and other instruments of warre prepared for the siege, chusing a place for his campe, transporting his land souldiours from the maine into the island, viewing the strength and situation of the citie, and in what place he might with most ease assault the same: the Rhodians in the meane time were not idle, but sunke diuers deepe sounds in many places of the citie neere vnto the wals, to discover the enemies mines; and fortified their bulwarke with greater rampiers; in which worke euerie man put to his helping hand without respect of age or calling. The Graund master about that time sent Lodouicus Andugus one of the knights of the Order, into SPAIN to Charles the emperour; and Claudius Duennillius another of the Order also, to ROM to the Cardinals, and Italian knights of the Order; and from thence into FRANCE vnto the French king with letters craving the aid of these Christian princes, for reliefe of the citie by sea, and land besieged. But all in vaine, for they carried away with the endless grudge of one against another, or respecting only their owne estates, returned the ambassadors with good words, without reliefe.

At this time Preianes Gouvernour of CHIOS (of whom we haue before spoken) a man comparable with any of the captaines of that age, an excellent souldiour both by sea and land, valiant and thereto fortunat, of an inuincible courage, brought vp in the wars from his childhoods when he had by the space of two or three daies hid himselfe in the rocks at sea, for feare of the Turkes great fleet, came by night in a small pinnesse to the RHODIANS, hauing deceived the Turkes watch: at whose coming the Rhodians wonderfully rejoyced, for the souldiours repored greater confidence in no man than in him: And if any great exploit were to be done, him the Master trusted aboute any other: he alwaies in armes during the siege, encouraged the souldiours, searched the watch, suruaid the bulwarke, repaired the breaches; and such labours as others accounted extreme miseries, he cheerfully endured, as if they had been but his pleasures and recreation. At the same time also Gabriell Martinus of Brixia, a most skilful engineer, came to the Rhodes out of CHART; by whose industrie and cunning, 55 mines which the Turkes did with infinit labor and charge make (by reason of the springing of the water, and hardness of the rocks) during the siege, were all by countermines disappointed and defeated.

The citie of the RHODIANS is situated on a plaine ground, on euerie side to be besieged, onely Northward it is defended with a goodly haue, from whence it lieth all Westward: betwixt it and the hills round about it, lieth a stonie plaine ground, not verie broad but of greater length; and these hills are full of springs, and orchards planted with Oliues, Figtrees, Vines, and such other fruits as such drie and sandie ground will beare. But what by nature wanted, was by the hand and industrie of man supplied; for it was compassed about with a most strong double wall and deepe trenches, threatening the enemy with thirteene stately towers: and sure against all assaults, with five mightie bulwarke: with diuers goodly faire gates: and that which was the greatest defence of all, within the citie was alwaies kept a most exact and straight forme of warlike discipline. The defence of the whole citie was thus proportioned: From the French tower (which with the greameffe and height thereof seemed to mate the skie) stood the Frenchmen with the French Lillies in their ensignes, vnder their Commander Joannes Abbinus a noble knight of the Order: from thence to S. Georges gate lay the four Germains, with the Eagle in their ensignes: in the third station were placed the French Aurgnois, with the Spaniards, for that the ditches in that place were neither so deepe nor broad as elsewhere: in the fift place lay the English garrison, whom the Graund master himselfe commaunded: after them succeeded they of NARONAS, and last of all the Italians, in valour not inferior to any of the rest, vnder the leading of Petrus Balthus and Gregorius Morgutus. In euerie one of these stations were diuers valiant knights of the Order, whose names (worthy of eternall memorie) for breuitie we passe over, all men of themselves sufficient to haue taken vpon them the whole charge. The enimie was not busie without the citie in placing his batterie, but traitorous minds were as busie within to haue betrayed the same. A Turkish woman, slave to one of the rich citizens, had conspired with certaine other her complices, at such time as the Turkes should give assault vnto the towne, at one instant to set on fire the houses wherein they dwell in diuers places of the citie, that the defendants drawne from the walls to quench the fire, the Turkes in the meane time might the more easily enter. But this treason was in good time reuealed, and the offenders were thulie executed.

The painfullness of the Turkish pioners.

The Turkes had not as yet placed their batterie, when as they tooke a certaine hill, whereon stood the church dedicated to Cosmus and Damianus, directly oueragainst the English station: from thence (as it seemed, rather for exercising of their souldiors than for any great harme they could doe so farre off) they began with small battering peeeces to shoot into the citie: and afterwards they began to dig mines, and to cast vp trenches: for the performance of which kind of worke, and for the filling vp of the towne ditches, they had brought with them fiftie thousand pioners, men better acquainted with countrey labour and keeping of cattell, than with warres; which being enforced vnto their labour day and night, sometime with stripes, and sometime with death, did with incredible celeritie bring that to passe, which was before thought impossible. They cut wayes through the most hard stonie rockes, raising the plaines as high as mountains, with earth brought two miles off, and laying the mountaines euen with the plaines, and yet they neuer wrought in safetie, but were miserably rent in sunder with the great ordinance out of the towne: and that which most of all troubled them, the Rhodians falling out vpon these outlaboured people, hauing neither courage nor skill to defend themselves, but trusting onely to their heeles, slew great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others also appointed for their defence, whom the Rhodians (taking courage of their feare) fiercely pursued & slew down-right. And when many others issuing out of the campe in great companies, thought to haue rescued their fellowes, the great ordinance before of purpose placed to most aduantage, so thundered from the wals amongst the thickest of them, that the ground lay couered with the bodies and weapons of the dead Turkes. With which manner of fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the enimie, the Turkes for their more safetie wrought most vpon their mounts by night, keeping most strong watch for defence of their pioners, which for more assurance they doubled in the day time, and bent their artillerie against the places which the Rhodians vsed to fallie out at: which did not so much keepe them in, as the feare of weakening themselves by often sallies. Knowing that one man was vnto them a greater losse, than vnto the enimie an hundred. Amongst others which in the beginning of this great siege forced the vntermost of their deuices to the destruction of the Turkes, were certaine mariners, who hauing the Turkish language perfectly, by leaue of the Grand Master (disguising themselves in the habit of Turkes) departed by night out of the haven in a small boat, loaded with apples, plums, peares, mellons, grapes, and such other fruits as the time of the yeare afforded; and in the darknesse came along the coast, vnto that part of the Island whereinto the passage was out of the maine. There as if they had been Turkes come from the maine, they landed their commodities, which the Turkish souldiors bought greedily. When they had thus sold their fruits, and in selling thereof diligently noted the speech and talke of the souldiors concerning the siege, and were now ready to depart, certaine Turkes which greatly disliked the hard beginning of this siege, seeing themselves if they did but stir, in danger to be set off with shot out of the towne, earnestly requested the mariners to take them with them into the maine: which to doe, at the first the mariners dissembling, refused, as a thing dangerous: & besides that, their boat was too little to receiue so many as would willingly haue gone with them. Yet with much adoe they suffered themselves to be situated to take in seuen or eight, such a number as they knew they could well master: who in hope of passing ouer into the maine, were (contrarie to their expectation) brought prisoners to the Rhodians, where they were by Praianes brought vnto the top of the highest tower of S. Johns church, from whence they might see all about the countrey, and well desire all the manner of the Turkes campe, which they simply discovered vnto the captaines, and what ouer els they demanded: and amongst other things confessed, that the souldiors were greatly discontented with the siege, halting in the beginning thereof lost so many men, and that they were ready to rise in mutinie against their captaines, and would hardly by them be commanded out of their trenches and cabbins, saying, that all they did was but lost labour: and that they should find it another peece of worke to win the Rhodians, than they had at Bellorad: wherefore if they were wise, they should in time depart before they had received further harme both from the enimie, and for want of necessaries, wherewith the souldiors began already to be pinched. All which was then supposed to haue been spoken by the captiues to please them in whose power they now were: yet it appeared afterwards to bee all true. For Pyrrhus Bassa, considering the troubled state of the campe, and the generall discontentment of the souldiors, whom he was at that time gladder to please than to punish, writ vnto Solyman at Constantinople, That if he would the siege should goe forward, he should without delay come in person himselfe to the campe, for that the souldiors without regard of shame were ready to rise in mutinie and to abandon the siege, refusing to be commanded by their captaines.

In the meane time whilest Solyman prepareth himselfe to set forward, the Turkish captaines vnderstood by certaine fugitiues (whereof in all warres some are to be found) that the high steeple of S. Johns church serued them of the towne for a watch tower: for which cause, and for despatch of the Crosse standing vpon the top thereof, they laboured nothing more, than with continual shot to beat downe that tower; which whilest they were doing with great diligence, Solyman himselfe came into the campe the 28 day of August in the afternoone: where finding in his armie all the signes of cowardise, and feare that could be spoken of, or deuised, and nothing done according to the command of such as he had appointed for that charge, but all things out of order; he tooke more greefe to see that great disorder, than he did pleasure and good hope of two hundred thousand souldiors, which were in his armie. Yet for all that hee was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, against his own people as well as the Rhodians, he moderated himselfe betwixt his owne rage and the offence of his souldiors, and calling them together, caused them to be disarmed, not leauing among them so much as a sword: and compassing them in with fiftene thousand harquebusiers whom he had brought with him well appointed, he stept vp into his royall seat, there set on high for the purpose; where sitting downe, he paused a good while without any word speaking; as if hee had considered with himselfe, whether he should onely punish the authors of the mutinie, or els with the punishment of many to ther he should soule a sedition, little differing from open rebellion. But following in himselfe the milder resolution, he thought it sufficient to correct the multitude and common sort of souldiors with sharpe and bitter words: and after generall silence made, brake out into this chollernicke speech:

Solyman comes marsh into the campe.

Slaves (quoth he) for I cannot find in my heart to call you souldiors, what kind of men are you now become? are you Turkes? men wont both to fight and overcome? verely I see the bodies, countenances, attire, and habit of my souldiors; but the deeds, speeches, counsels and deuises of cowardly and vile traitors. Alas how hath my opinion deceived me? that Turkish force and courage is gone, and the valour and strength both of bodies and minds, wherewith the Arabians, Persians, Sirians, Egyptians, Seruians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirotes, Macedonians, and Thracians were subdued, is lost: forgetting your countrey, your oath, the command of your captaines, your obedience, and all other warlike discipline, you haue against the maiestie of my empire refused to fight, like cowards betaken your selues to flight, for vaine feare of death and danger, not beseeming men of warre. If any man should at home but haue named the Rhodians in your feasts, amongst your pots, in your assemblies or great meetings, you could then with your tongues brag to pull it downe, you had much adoe to hold your hands: here when I would make prooffe of your force and courage, it is nothing but yee thought perhaps, that the Rhodians so soone as they saw your ensignes before their gates, would straightway yeeld themselves and their citie into your power. Let all men cease, so to say of thins, and beleue me that know the truth. This base and infamous deigne (which you see) is full of mosterwill beafts, whose madnesse you shall neuer tame without much labour and bloodshed. I see shall worke them; for why nothing is so wild but it may at length be tamed: which except I bring to passe, I am fully resolved and haue vowed vnto my selfe, Either here to die or spend my daies: and if euer I dooe say otherwise, let this my head, my fleet, mine armie, and empire be for euer accursed and vnforsaken. And so saying hee departed. And for without further speech, desiring rather to be accounted of his souldiors gentle than severe, he pardoned them all their former offences, and swore them all againe to his obedience. This mutinie so appeased, all things were afterwards done with better successe and greater care both of the souldious and commanders. First they planted in diuers places twelue great bombardes, wherewith they threw vp stones of hugie waight into the ayre, which falling downe into the citie, might breake downe the houses and whatsoeuer else they lighted vpon: with the fall of one of these, the Great master was like to haue been slaine. Howbeit this proued a deuisie of more terror than danger, for with 200 such shot were but ten men slaine; which thing amongst others, Apella a traitorous fugitiue declared vnto the enimie, with whom he had intelligence, as he himselfe confessed being taken vpon suspicion and examined: for which his treason he was justly executed.

The Turkish battery.

The force of the batterie was more feared, wherein the Turkes had planted fortie great pieces of batterie, and amongst them twelue Bassilisks (so aptly named of the serpent Basilisk), who as Plinie writeth, killeth man or beast with his sight) with these pieces the Turkes battered the wals continually; but lying somewhat farre off, did no great harme.

At the same time also Solyman caused batterie to be laid against the tower of Saint Nicholas, standing vpon a narrow peece of ground pointing farre into the sea, defending the haueyn vpon the right hand, where sometime stood the great Colossus of the Sunne, accounted the greatest amongst the seauen wonders of the world. Which castle was both strongly and sumptuously built at the charges of the Dukes of Burgundy, as appeared by their armes there engrauen in many places in marble. This tower was valiantly defended by Guido a Frenchman, who had the charge thereof, with 300 souldiours, amongst whom were 30 knights of the Order.

The Turkes artillerie planted against that tower, was by the skilfulnesse of the Christian canoniours in short time dismounted with shot from the tower, and many of the gunners slaine; so that they were glad to surcease any more to batter the tower by day; but lying still all the day they began to batter the same by night, wherein they preuailed no more than they had before done in the day time; for the defendants warily obseruing such places as were likeliest for the enimie to place his batterie in, did so aptly place their ordinance against the same, and to so good purpose, that the Turkes swore; their doings were by some meanes discouered vnto the enemies. So when they had in vaine bestowed 500 great shot, and made a small breach which they durst not once attempt to enter, they shamefully abandoned that place also.

All this while Pyrhus was busie in working of mines to vndermine the citie; two of which of which mines the defendants frustrated with countermines; in which kind of worke many were lost on both sides: yet for all the carefulnesse of the Christians, the English bulwarke was vndermined by the enimie, and vpon the fourth day of September part thereof blowne vp with such violence, that vnto them in the citie it seemed at the first to be a generall earthquake; and therewith diuers English men were there ouerwhelmed. The Turkes attempting presently to enter, were by the Graund master and his followers with great slaughter repulsed.

But Mustapha the Bassa comming on with fresh supplies, and crying out of the cowardice of them which retired, renewed the assault: where for a while was fought a most sharpe and cruell fight, the leaders cheerfully encouraging their souldiours, and they likewise doing what was possible for men to doe. All mens eares were filled with the thundring of the shot, noise of trumpets and drums, and crying of men. And vnto the Turkes it seemed that ouer their heads it rained deadly shot, stones, and fire: for the townsmen and women mingled with the souldiours cast downe vpon the Turkes, fire, stones, timber, and whatsoeuer else came to hand: so that they vnable longer to endure the courage and force of the Christians, turned their backs and ran away by heapes, not expecting any signe of retreat, euerie man seeking to save one amongst whom as they fled, the great ordinance shot off from the wals made a wonderfull slaughter. At this assault of the Turkes were slaine (as some write) almost 2000, and amongst them the master of the Turkes ordinance, a man whom Solyman greatly loued: which victorie the Christians gained not without some losse; for besides some few others that were slaine, fiftie knights of the Order (men worthe of eternall memorie) there ended their daies also.

The Turkes assault the English bulwarke the second time, and are againe repulsed.

The fift day after (which was the ninth day of September) Solyman by the perswasion of Mustapha the great Bassa, commaunded a fresh assault to be giuen to the English bulwarke, which was attempted by the Turkes with greater resolution than the first. Seauen ensignes of the Turkes were broken in by the ruines of the bulwarke, and had enforced the defendants, opposed with number to giue ground, when the Graund master comming in with the ensigne of the Order, guarded with a companie of most valiant knights, draue them out againe by force, and made good the place. Mustapha seeing his men retire, courageously restored the battell by bringing on of new supplie, and other capitaines with threats, strokes, and terror of death, enforced the souldiours (who had before turned their backs) now againe to fight. So that there began a more cruell fight than had before bene from the beginning of the siege; which was vnto the Christians more dangerous, for that they were ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkish shot. But in that extremitie no man regarded either danger, or life, onely this they remembered, That those were their barbarous enemies, whom they must either victoriously overcome or die therefore: with which furie the assault was continued by the space of three houres, vntill at length Mustapha with his Turkes discouraged, with the losse of 2000 of their fellowes, and of three great noble men whom Solyman especially fauoured, and sore beaten by the Spaniards out of their flankers, were enforced to retire. Few of the Christians in respect of so many enemies were slaine: yet had the ensigne of the Order been then lost, Ioachim Cluys the ensigne bearer hauing both his eyes shot out, had not Emericus Ruiaulx an Auernois and one of the knights of the Order, with incredible courage rescued the same.

After this second assault, falling out so vnluckily to the Turkes, Mustapha the great Bassa began to grow in contempt with Solyman: and Pyrhus to keepe his credit by doing something, with continuall batterie of 17 great pieces did batter the mount neere vnto the Italian bulwarke. At which time also Cassius, Gouernour of Bithynia, another of the Turkes great commanders, laboured by vndermining to haue ouerthrowne the French bulwarke: so glad they were to attempt any thing to content their imperious great lord and master. But the endeouours of Cassius was by countermines through the careful diligence of Gabriell Chierus, hauing charge of those works, frustrated: and Pyrhus in the other place after he had by hoat assault slaine them which were appointed for the defence thereof, and gained the mount, and brought a great feare vpon the citie, was againe with great losse shamefully repulsed, and by the commaundement of Solyman caused to retire. At this assault the Gouernour of Eubea, Solyman his lieutenant general, a man of great honor (if any of the Turkes slaues are so to be accounted) was slaine, for whose death Solyman was exceeding pensieue and heauie.

Mustapha the Bassa finding himselfe in disgrace with Solyman for the two vnfortunat assaults by him giuen at the English station, determined if it were possible by a third to recouer his lost credit: and for his better successe therin, agreed with Achimetes another great Commander, at the same time to assault the Spanish bulwarke: according to this resolution Achimetes hauing with a mine suddenly blowne vp a great part of the wall of the Spanish station, in the thicke of the dust and smoke, presently entered his men, who by the ruines of the wall recouered the top of the rampiers. Mustapha also at the same instant hardly charged the English, so that in both places was made a hard and doubtfull fight. Mustapha desiring nothing more than with better successe now to redeeme his former dishonour, did what he might to encourage his souldiours; calling vpon them by name, and putting them in remembrance of their former victories. The Rhodiens on the other side mindfull of their former honour, with the greatnesse of the present danger, valiantly repulsed the enimie, and forced him with shame to retire. In this assault many English men were slaine, and Preiaues also sore hurt, hauing before slaine many of the Turkes. Mustapha beside the losse of his men, had also two of his ensignes taken by Christophorus Vualderick Comendatur of the German knights. Achimetes hauing woon the top of the wals, had there set vp the Turkish ensignes; but by the valiantnesse of the defendants, and by meanes of certaine smal pieces of ordinance, by Martinius aptly placed in the houses before the new made breach, and by force of shot out of the flankers on both sides of the breach, whereof none fell in vaine, he was againe enforced to forsake the wals and to retire.

The English bulwarke assaulted the third time by Mustapha.

The Turkes ensignes advanced to the top of the wals are againe cast downe.

The three and twentieth day of September the Turkish capitaines hoping by meanes of a mine which they had made against the Auergne bulwarke, to enter and win the citie; approaching the wals with great multitudes of souldiours, ready to haue entered vpon the blowing vp of the mine, which being met with a countermine out of the citie, wrought not such effect as was by them expected: so that hauing receiued some harme, standing in a place of great disadvantage, and done nothing, they returned againe into the campe. Yet the expert captaines probably conjecturing that the wall might be inwardly shaken by the mine, although it were not by them them outwardly perceiued, caused that part of the wall to be most violently battered all the rest of that day and night following: and by the furie of their artillerie, made a faire and large breach. All that night was heard in the Turkes campe an vnwonted clattering of weapons, and of men running too and fro, as if there had been some great matter a doing; which the Rhodians conjectured (as the truth was) to be a signe of some great assault to be shortly giuen.

Solyman resolved the next day with all his force to assault the new made breach, after he had by himselfe in a melancholy mood walked vp and downe in his tent a great part of the night, sent for the chiefe commanders of his armie, to whom he declared his mind as followeth:

Your valour and wisdom (worthie captaines) needeth not any exhortation, yet the desperate manesse of our enemies maketh me to speake vnto you these few words. Who whilst they yet doe, as from the beginning, as men without reason desperately defend their citie rent with our artillerie, shaken with our mines, their churches and houses beaten downe about their eares, wearied and worn out with slaughter, labour, and wounds, which must needs befall men so often times assaulted; they wisely seeme vnto our souldiours men of inuincible force and courage; which opinion to haue removed, much concerneth the happie and wished successe of our assault. Wherefore I would haue you with effectuall perswasion & bountifull promises to harten on our men to the winning of this citie. Besides this, you shall open vnto them my purpose and intent, and that they should not thinke that they are brought hither to besiege one citie: but that in taking this one, they shall vpon the matter make way into all the dominions of the Christians. Here be the kinsmen, alliance, and friends of all the king, princes and potentats of Christendome: here is all our enemies treasure, the spoile whereof promised vnto our souldiours may serue to great purpose to encourage them forward: here is store of ordnance, armour, and other warlike provision, which shall both furnish vs, and in time to come miserably confound the rest of the Christians. We shall beside this, enjoy a most goodly and rich citie, with a haue of all other most commodious, from whence all things necessarie for warre may at all times, as occasion shall require, by land and sea be supplied: which as they shall be to vs things of great importance, so shall we despoile our enemies of farre greater. This is their castle, storehouse, treasure and armorie: this is the verie receptacle & place of refuge for all such as trouble the Turkes by sea: from hence shall we haue free scope and passage into AVELIA, CALABRIA, SICILIA, and many other Christian countries. But as for your selues valiant captaines, when as I consider how that you haue within these few moneths by your valour and wisdom subdued vnto my empire the strong citie of BELLGRAD, which my great grandfather Mahomet that mightie emperor could not with all his power gett in, in great hope that these fierce and obstinat Christians shall not long be able to defend themselves in these their dens and lurking places.

Having ended this speech, the captaines euerie one vnto his companie, made knowne what the great emperours will and pleasure was; and open proclamation made thorow all the campe, wherein the spoile of that rich citie was all granted vnto the souldiours as a prey and reward for the paines they were to take.

Solyman heauie with sleepe and care, laid himselfe downe vpon his pallet to take his rest. But the Great master (to whom the vnaccustomed stirre of the enemy portended some great matter) all that night in armes painfully viewed euerie part of the citie, cheerfully encouraging his souldiours to remember, that they did watch for the safetie of their countrey, their liues and libertie. It fortuned the same night, that a poore Christian seruing a Turke in the campe, calling secretly vnto the watchmen vpon the walls, gaue them warning that the Turkes prepared the next day to giue a generall assault vnto the citie. Which thing when the Great master understood, because he would haue nothing done rashly or fearfully (as it commonly happeneth in things done vpon the sudden) called together his knights, and spake vnto them as followeth:

The Great master
after his oration
vnto his knights.

I am glad sacred companions and fellows in armes, that the time is come when in one battell you shall win vnto your selues great honour, and defending your countrey, you may be iustly accounted the worthie defenders and renegers of the Christian commonweale and name. The people against whom we are to fight to morrow, assaulteth vs onely presuming vpon their multitude. But if we measure our valour, not by number, but by courage and prowesse, vndoubtedly a few resolute men will easily overcome a multitude of cowards. You know your enemies, and the manner of his fight: you are to fight (most worthie knights) with them whom you haue alwaies vanquished at sea, and in iust battell sometimes overcome by land, at such time as with their whole power they assaulted your walls; omitting in the meane time manie hot skirmishes, wherein you euer put them to the worst: Wherefore you and they in the assaults to morrow shall haue such courage as conquerours, and men conquered use to haue. Neither will they fight because they dare fight, but because the great tirant and violent command of their captaines enforceth them thereunto. Wherefore, remembering what you are by birth, what opinion the Christian commonweale hath conceived of you, where you are, and what you haue taken vpon you, take up your armes with iust furie and indignation, and fight against them, following one iudicke youth, as if you saw your selues bearing armes against you: whereunto you are enforced, not onely by the indignitie of the wrong by them offered, but also by necessity, which of it selfe is of power to make cowards valiant and hardie. For here we are in an Island, from whence we cannot escape, and in a citie whose rent and battered walls doe not so much protect and defend vs, as our weapons: wherefore to morrow we must haue either vanquish them, or be therewith to morrow shall giue vnto vs either a most victorie, or a most honourable death.

As he was yet thus speaking, news of the approach of the enemy caused him to make an end, and euerie man halted with speed vnto the place of his charge. The enemy comming fast on, with a most horrible crie (as their manner is) fiercely assaulted the citie in five places, where the English, Spanish, Italians, Narbonenses, and Auergnoys had their stations. To the assault of euerie of which places, Solyman had appointed ten thousand Turkes. Mustapha, the Bassa calling vpon the name of his great prophet Mahomet, and promising vnto the souldiours the rich spoile of the citie, fiercely assaulted the English station, from whence he had been three times before shamefully repulsed. Pirrhus the other great Bassa with like furie assaulted the Italian station. In both places was maintained a cruell and deadly fight; the Turkes fighting for the prey, and the Rhodians for their liues and libertie. Neither was there any, of what degree or order soeuer, which did not that day fight for defence of the citie. The priests and religious were not then exempted, but fought among the other souldiours; women, children, and with them the aged fathers, beyond the strength of their bodies and courage of their minds, brought weapons vnto the defendants, some stones, which they had digged out of the streets, some burning pitch-bartels, some hoopes with wild fire, some scalding oyle, some boyling pitch: which being cast downe vpon the enemies, troubled them so, as nothing was more feared; for vpon whomsoever it fell, it stucke fast, and so scalded their bodies, that they were glad to cast downe their weapons to teare off their clothes, wherewith many of them rent off the skin and flesh also. All which things fell so thicke vpon the Turkes, as if it had rained fire and stones: besides the deadly shot, which amongst such a multitude of enemies neuer fell in vaine. The Great Master having a carefull eye ouer euerie part of the citie, after he had well relieved the Italian station, which was at the first hardly distressed by Pirrhus, left there Antonius Monterollus, one of the knights of the Order, with such companie as he thought conuenient for the safetie of that place, and went himselfe with the rest vnto the English station, which was then hardly laied to by the Bassa Mustapha. But whilst hee was there busied in repulsing the enemy, and had now well relieved the place, a suddaine crie ran alongst the walls, That the Spanish bulwarke was already possessed by the enemy. With which heauie newes he was not a little troubled, but leauing there Emericus Gombaulus, one of the knights of the Order, with a chosen companie of souldiours for defence of that place; he with his guard hastened vnto the Spanish station, which hee found by a wonderfull chance already taken by the enemy. In the beginning of the assault, certaine Turkes to shun the danger of the shot, had for feare hidden themselves at the foot of this bulwarke amongst the stones, which had before been beaten downe with the batterie: in the meane time, other Turks of the same regiment, vnder the leading of the valiant captaine Achimetes, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the bulwarke, not meddling with the bulwarke it selfe, as a thing of greatest strength: the valiant souldiours appointed for the defence of the bulwarke, seeing their fellows and countrey men distressed fast by them on the right hand, could not endure to stand still as lookers on, but left the bulwarke, and went to the place so hardly assaulted. Where whilst they were valiantly encountering the enemy, the cowardly Turkes who had before hid themselves for feare, hearing all silent ouer their heads, and thereby guessing (as the truth was) that the defendants were drawne thence vnto some other place more distressed; to colour their feare, and the glorie of mine empire. This continuall threatnings of the heauens, this immoderat raine, this terrible thunder and lightning, the coldnesse of the weather, the want of necessaries, with the manifold miseries of this long siege, doe much persuaide me, to giue you leaue to lay downe armes and take your rest. But first let vs consider if vnto men of courage it be not a dishonour, for the tediousnesse of raine and tempest, to leaue vnto our enemies the victorie already in our hands, and humbly to forsake our trenches, forts, mounts, ouertopping not onely the wals of the citie but making the heauens, with such other like worke made with my infinit charge and your great trauell, all for the taking of this citie. Truly this warre either should not haue beene taken in hand at all; or being once begun, is to be ended for the honour of the Othoman empire. Which for so much as it could not be accomplished in Sommer; the reputation of mine empire in common, and the regard of the commoditie of euerie one of you in priuat, enforceth me to performe it in winter. For if we shall from hence depart with our armie, who doubts but the enemy, not onely for desire of reuenge, but also strained by necessitie, hauing lost all he had of his owne, will prey vpon your countries, houses, and goods, and will bring you, your wiues, and children, into a farre more miserable slaueerie and bondage than that wherein he himselfe now is? Wherefore I aduise you to continue the siege, and neuer to depart before you haue attained vnto the end of your desires. And admit there were no necessitie in the matter, yet the honour and fame of the action ought to impose vpon you a resolution both of bodie and mind to endure the siege: For the cics and countenances of all nations, especially the Christians, are fixed vpon you; whom when they shall vnderstand not to be able to endure the field one winter, they will of right call you Sommer birds, which so soone as any storme ariseth looke after your houses and places of repose. It is reported, that the Gracians for a strumpet besieged TROY ten yeares; and shall not the Turkes, vexed and oppressed with slaughter, robberies, inuasions both by sea and land, and that more is with the seruitude of 214 yeares, endure one winters siege? They will say, that the terror of your name is but vaine, and that same hath encreased the same (as many other things mo) which not few, are more feared in farre countries amongst men of small experience: And that now euerie man may safely enough abide your force, which make your inuasions rather vpon a furie and brauerie than vpon any good resolution, which in all kind of warre (but especially in besieging of cities) is most necessarie: whereof many being by naturall situation and fortification impregnable, time hath with her handmaidens, Famine and Thirst overcome and vanquished, as it shall doe this citie of the Rhodians: against which beloned in armes there is a secret mischiefe prepared, which may not in this open audience be published; for it is as necessarie that the vulgar sort should be ignorant of some things, as to know the same.

Many thought, that this was spoken rather of pollicie than vpon any good ground: and although his hoar persuasion had little moued the cold courage of his despairing souldiours, yet the regard of dutie in that most loyall nation, with the greedie expectation of so great a secret, ouercame all other difficulties; so that they departed (at leastwise in shew) contented to endure whatsoeuer should befall.

Achimenes author of this great expectation, and the onely hope of Solymans successe, came oftentimes and assailed the Vaumures of the Auergne station, which although they were not verie high, yet were they alwaies valiantly defended by the Rhodians. It fortuned, that this warlike captaine daily attempting the Vaumures, in the end by force obtained the same: and so possessed of the place he so much desired, desperately kept it vntill greater helpe came running in: who with wonderfull expedition (with matter for that purpose before prepared) clapt vp a strong and defensible couering in manner of a penthouse against the towne wall, betwixt the wall and the vaumure, vnder which they shrowded themselves from the defendants; which was an euen matter for such a multitude to doe, the ditches of the towne in that place being now filled wth so high, that the defendants could not out of their flankers scoure the ditch, nor yet without manifest danger come to cast any thing downe vpon them from the top of the wals: for the Turke harquebusiers which lying vpon their mounts, higher than the battered wals of the citie, suffered none to appeare vpon them without danger. So that the Rhodians who erst thought themselves at great quiet, were now ouertaken with a sudden and v unexpected mischiefe: which at the first filled the citie with feare and heauie silence, which straightwaies after brake out into pittifull outcries and lamentations. The Turkes lurking vnder their penthouse, laboured with mattocks and pickaxes to dig vp the foundation of the wall; and Precians forward and courageous to doe what might be done, threw downe vpon the Turkes, fire, scalding oyle, burning pitch, wilde-fire and such things. But when the miserable men which shrunk from the worke for feare of the fire, were againe beaten forward by their imperious commanders, and presently slaine if they made any delay, and fresh men still thrust on in steed of such as were hurt or slaine: the fatall work begun the seuenth day of October, went apace forward, with the great & continuall labor of these wretched slaues. A great number of the common souldiours whom the Turkes call Alapi was employed in this worke: of whom Solyman in this siege of the Rhodians, and other his expeditions, made not much more account but as of pioneers to worke in mines and to cast vp trenches, and oftentimes with their bodies to fill towne ditches to make a way for the Ianizaries to passe ouer vpon: they by the constraint of Achimenes vndermined the wall, and as they wrought, shoared vp the same againe with timber, whereunto they afterwards set fire, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wall: which falling not out according to their expectation, for that they had not farre enough vndermined it, they assailed with great hooks and strong ropes to haue pulled it downe. But the Rhodians with their great ordinance from the Auergne bulwarke, quickly put them from that mad worke with great slaughter, and frustrated all their long labour. Achimenes thus disappointed of his purpose, stood in great doubt whether he should giue ouer the enterprife, for that he saw he laboured in vaine, or else in that dangerous place to expect some better hap, the onely meane to saue him from the tyrants heauie displeasure; who as hee knew measured all things by the euent. Solyman vnderstanding by Achimenes that the wall (although it was not ouerthrowne as was expected) was yet fore shaken and weakened with vndermining, caused his batterie to be planted against that part of the wall so vndermined: which so many waies weakened, and now fore battered, fell downe daily more and more. For remedie whereof, the Rhodians laboured day and night to raise a new wall, in steed of that which was beaten downe.

At the same time Solyman persuaied by the generall opinion of all his great captaines, that the citie was that day or neuer to be taken, determining to giue another generall assault, caused proclamation to be made thorow his campe: wherein he gaue the spoile of the citie vnto his souldiours, and the more to encourage them, spake vnto them in few words as followeth.

Fortune at length vnkant souldiours, hauing notably proued your courage and patience, now offereth vnto you the worthie rewards of your labour and paines. The victorie and wealth of your enemies which you haue so much desired, is now in your hands. Now is it the time to make an end of this mungrell people, of whom more are slaine than left aliue; and they not men, but the shadowes and ghosts of men, feeble and spent with hunger, wounds, wants, and labour: who will I know resist you, not because they so dare, but because of necessitie they so must, enforced thereunto with all extremities. Wherefore now renenge your selues of the fullbood, crueltie, & villanies of these Christians, and make them a woofull example to all posteritie, that neuer man hereafter presume to offer iniurie to a Turke, in whatsoeuer state he be. The way is already open into the citie, there is a faire breach made, whereby thirtie horsemen may at once enter: nothing wanteth but courage in you to assaile the same.

The miserable state of the common souldiours of the Turkes, and the small account is made of them.

The souldiours encouraged with this speech of their emperour, made great shew of cheerfulness, and promised to doe their vttermost deuore, threatening vnto the Christians most horrible death and miserable captiuitie.

In the meane time the great shot flying continually thorow the breach, did beat downe many houses in the citie; but the countermure new built against the breach standing vpon a lower ground, it seldome toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The rattling of the falling houses, the horrible noise of the enemy, with the thundring of the great artillerie, wonderfully terrified the miserable citizens: in euerie place was heard the lamentation of women and children, euerie thing shewed the heauinesse of the time, and seemed as altogether lost and forlorne. The day thus troublesomely spent, the night followed much more troublesome; and after the night, the day of the assault of all other most dreadfull: for with the dawning thereof, the glistering ensignes of the enemy were scene flying in the wind, and the Turkes cheerfull with the hope of spoile and of the victorie, hastened towards the breach with great outcries and songs, after their countrey manner: and there before one of the gates of the citie called S. Ambrose gate, set downe a great number of their ensignes deckt with garlands, in token of victorie. The Turkes great fleet also at the same time sayling too and fro before the haven, made shew as if it would have assailed the citie on that side: who had seene the citie so beset, would have said that it would at one instant have bene besieged both by sea and land; and to most mens judgements, it seemed that the Rhodian state should that day have taken end and been destroyed. Yet for all these extremities, the Rhodians were nothing discouraged, but looking vpon their weapons as the onely remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, vpon the alarm given came running out of their houses by heaps vnto the wals, like desperat men opposing their bodies in steed of the battered wals against their enemies in defence of their country. There needed neither exhortation nor command of capitaine, euerie man was vnto himselfe a perswader to fight valiantly in defence of the citie; and one of them propounded vnto another the cruell death, the miserable seruitude, the mocks and taunts they should endure, if they should chance to come into the proud enemies hand: all which was to be auoided either by honourable victorie or death. The Turkes conducted by Achimetes, fiercely assailed the breach, which was by the Rhodians (standing vpon the tuines of their wals) valiantly defended. In the meane time, the dismaied matrons and maidens, some in their houses with heauie hearts expected the woful destruction of the citie and themselves; other, some in the churches with floods of teares and lamentable cries, poured forth their prayers to the Almighty, crauing his helpe in that their hard distresse, and to protect them against their barbarous enemies. The deadly fight at the breach, was on both sides with great courage and force maintained. The Turkes were in good hope forthwith to win the citie, if they did but a little more straine themselves: and therefore to terrifie the Rhodians the more, oftentimes in their fighting gaue out most terrible outcries: and the Rhodians accounted the Turkes as good as vanquished, for that they being so many in number, and in a place of such indifferencie, had not yet preuailed: beside that, they were greatly encouraged with the greatnesse of the common danger, and the fight one of anothers valour: so that by their inuincible courage the Turkes were enforced shamefully to retire. The Rhodians seeing their enemies turne their backs, gaue a great shout in derision of them: the Turkes disdaining that they in number many (and now victors, if they should with a little resolution maintaine the assault they had begun) should be so derided of a handfull of men as good as already vanquished; with great indignation returned againe to the breach, and more furiously assailed the Rhodians than at the first. At which time the citie had vndoubtedly been taken, had not they which defended the ends of the wall, yet standing on both sides of the breach, out of their baricadoes with their shot ouerwhelmed the Turkes thronging in at the breach; and others with murthering shot out of the flankiers of the new built wall so out them in sunder, that a greater slaughter for the time was hardly in any place seene. Achimetes beholding the wonderfull slaughter of his souldiours, and that he fought with great disadvantage and losse, against desperat men, who resolving to die feared no danger, gaue ouer the assault, and againe retired: leauing behind him in the breach and towne ditch the carcases of fise thousand of his dead Turkes, besides many more which afterwards died vpon the hums there receiued.

This assault was giuen vnto the towne the last day of Nouember, a day dedicated to S. Andrew: after which time the capitaines of the Turkish armie, although they dispaired not of the victorie, yet terrified with so great slaughter of their men, resolved with one accord no more to attempt the citie with any notable assault; but by sundrie great trenches to be made thorow the middelt of the ruines of the wals, to get into the citie; and with mattocks and pickaxes to ouerthrow the new made wall and another baricadoe which the defendants had made within the same: and in the meane time whilest this was in doing, to keepe the Rhodians still busied with continuall skirmishes and alarums. This deuise put in execution by the wonderfull labour of such a multitude of people, serued the enemy to greater purpose than all that he had before done: who daily ouerthrowing or destroying the new fortifications which the Rhodians made in steed of them which were before ouerthrowne, and by little and little creeping on further, draue the defendants to that extremitie, that they were glad to pull downe many of their houses, therewith to make new fortifications, and to make their citie lesse, by casting vp of new trenches: so that in short time they were brought to that point, that they could not well tell which place to fortifie first, the enemy was now so farre crept within them: for the ground which the enemy had thus gained vnto the citie, was almost 200 paces in breadth, and 150 paces in length.

Solyman, although he did now assure himselfe of the victorie, and was by nature cruell and desirous desirous of reuenge; yet perswaded by Achimetes and Cassius (two of his most valiant capitaines) that for the enlarging of his empire, nothing was better than the fame of clemencie; commaunded Pyrhus the old Bassa to proue if the Rhodians might by parley be drawne to yeeld their citie vpon reasonable conditions. Vpon hereupon the Bassa sent one Hieronimus Monilia a Genoe way, vnto the wals, who crauing of the defendants safe conduct, said hee had something to say tending to the common good of the distressed citie. All mens minds were presently filled with expectation of some great matter, and he commaunded to speake. Vpon answered, That hee might not deliuer his message openly, but would either by speech in secret, or by letters deliuer the same vnto one Matthias de Via his countryman, one of the citizens of the Rhodians. When Fra. Formosus one of the knights of the Order, a French man of a cholericke disposition, whose great courage was well seene in all that siege (having as is reported, with shot out of S. Georges tower himselfe slaine 500 Turkes during the time of that siege) being now present, and moued with indignation to heare a motion made of priuat conference with the enemy; bent his piece vpon the messenger, and caused him forthwith to depart without doing his message. Many who in time of the assault feared not any danger, but were become altogether desperat and careless of themselves, after that they vnderstood that the enemy had offered parley, and that they began to conceiue some hope of life: resorted vnto the Great master, requesting him, that hee would prouide for the safetie of his louing people; whose warlike forces was with many assaults fore weakened, the citie beaten downe about their eares, and most of them which were left, either wounded or sicke. They had (as they said) now sufficiently proued both their force and fortune; wherefore he should doe well, to beware least while he were too long in consulting, the enemy should conceiue a further indignation in seeing his offers refused. Vpon these and such speeches they enforced the Great master to send embassadours to Solyman. The men that were sent, were Anthonyus Groleus a French man, ensigne bearer for the Order, a man of great reputation for his wisdom and experience; and with him Robertus Barusius, a man of great grauitie and skill in the Greeke tongue: for whom were receiued as pledges, a kinsman of the great capitaine Achimetes, and a certaine Epyrot which fled out of the citie vnto the Turkes, because one of the Graecian captains had struck him with his open hand; a man of a sharpe wit, and one that could perfectly speake the Greek, Turkish, and Italian tongues, as appeared to his great credit amongst the enemies, being had of them in great regard, although he was not knowne whilest he dwelt in the citie, that he was any such man. After that came also Solymans interpreter, for he himselfe could speake no other language more than his owne, accounting it a great disgrace, and against the Othoman empire to vse any other language. The embassadours admitted vnto Solymans presence, told him, That they were sent to know, for what cause he had sent to requite parley? Who in a flaming heat, as if he had knowne nothing thereof, said there was no such matter: and commanding them presently to void his campe, sent them away with letters to the Great master and the citizens to this effect.

If I had not compassion of humane infirmitie, which oftentimes tumbleth headlong mens ambitious and haucie minds, into most dangerous and vnnecessarie mischietes, truly I would not haue directed vnto you these letters at this time; but as you haue well deserued, persecute you with death and most miserable seruitude: which how easie a thing it were for me to doe, you your selues know. But hauing now sufficiently tried my force, if you be wise make prooffe of my clemencie. You haue already satisfied your owne furie, your owne mad humor: and now aduise your selues, lay your hand vpon your heart, and without delay yeeld your selues as I command; your liues I giue, I giue you your wealth; and more than that, your choise to tarrie there still, or to depart: Refuse not the grace frankly offered, which was of you to haue bene most heartily desired. It shall not alwaies be lawfull for you (as at this present) to make choise of both. From our campe.

Vpon the returne of the embassadours, the poore of all sorts flocke together to the Great master his house not farre from the breach: where after the multitude of the common people was dismissed, and the chiefe of the Burgers sent for, the imperious letter of the Turkish tyrant was openly read before the knights of the Order, and the better sort of the citizens. Wherunto the Great master accounting it both honour enough, and sufficient rearme of life honourably to die, answered in this sort.

Secret Parley

as the instance of his people senteth embassadours to Solyman.

Solymans letters sent to the Great master and the Rhodians by their embassa-dours.

The Great Master his opinion concerning that Solyman demanded by his letters.

You heard (sacred fellows in armes, and valiant citizens of the Rhodæ) these imperious and sorrowfull letters: whereunto how we are to answer, requireth no great deliberation: we must either solve men either yeeld or die; all hope of victorie is gone; except forraine aid come: wherefore if you will follow my counsell, let us with weapons in our hands, untill the last gaspe and the spending of the last drop of our blood, like valiant men defend our faith and nobilitie: received from our ancestors, and the honour which we haue so long time gotten both at home and abroad: and let it neuer be said, that our honour died but with our selues.

This speech of the Great Master seemed vnto many, heavier than the imperious commandement of the Turkish tyrant: and a great while men stood silent, heavily looking one vpon another, many with changing of their countenance and outward gesture, more than by words expressing what they thought in heart. At length a certaine Greeke priest, with great compassion of mind (as it seemed) and teares trickling downe his cheeks, brake forth into these words:

And I would also hold my peace, if I were a priuat man; and not first of all in so great and troubled an assemblie, broach mine owne opinion: But for as much as the regard of our common profusion, can wring a word out of no mans mouth; and all men know, that now is the time to speake and say what every man thinketh best, which shall neither alwaies nor long be graunted vnto vs: I will not let it now ouerpasse and slip away: wherefore let vs suppose, that no command of a most mightie prince besieging vs, were come vnto vs, but that I were reasoning as a priuat man with his neighbor, or one friend with another by the fire side, or in our cups without care, without any great affection in either partie, as men indifferent; not liking or hating (as men oftentimes doe of princes affairs which concern them nothing) and then (as I hope) my speech shall be vnto you neither unpleasant nor unprofitable. We Greekes and Latines, with ioined armes haue now this six moneths withstood our deadly enemies, not onely abroad before our wals, but also in the very bowels of our citie, without any forraine helpe: which as we haue of long time all vainely looked for, so are we now every one of vs out of hope thereof. And yet our enemy either moued with the secret goodnesse of God, or els ignorant of our strength and forces, spent with wounds, slaughter, sickness, and perpetuall labour, doth voluntarily offer that vnto vs, which was of vs to be most of all desired and earnestly sued for. Your publicke and priuat treasures, the bodies of your selues, your wives and children he keepeth vniuolated; he taketh from vs only the citie, which he hath for most part already beaten downe and taken: Wherein the Great Master, and you most valiant Knights, I haue knowne your prowess and valour in many battailes at sea, but especially in this siege; whereof seeing there is no more use in this our desperat estate, I doe appeale vnto your wisdom and discretion. Sithence all is now the conquerors, in that he leaueth vnto vs our liues and goods, is to be accounted gaines, and the yeelding vp of the citie and Island no losse, which the victorious enemy already commaundeth: which although it be a heauie matter and grievous vnto the nobilitie, yet your fortune perswadeth you thereunto. Wherefore if you be to be moued with any compassion, I account it better to yeeld, than to be slaine your selues, or to see your wives and children by law of armes to be led away before your faces into miserable captiuitie and seruitude. If any Christian compassion remaine in your warlike minds, I beseech you seeke not the viter destruction of this innocent people, who (I may with modestie say) hath not euill deserued of you, whom Christ Iesus, whom the enemy himselfe would haue preferred. That I say this which I speake vnto you for Christian charitie and for no other cause, let this be a sufficient testimony. That so long as you were able resist by your owne power, or hoped for aid from forraine princes, I neuer spake word, or once thought of yeelding: but now seeing the fatal ruine of all things about vs, our common estate brought vnto the uttermost extremitie, our deadly enemy in the heart of our citie, no hope, and that the warre cannot longer be protracted; I wish you to yeeld, and for my part had rather make choise of peace than warre, and to proue the enemies fauour than his furie.

Most of them there present, were of the same mind with the priest. But as nothing can be so reasonably spoken as to content all men, so this speech was not of them all liked: Some there were (though not many) which considering the harmes they had done vnto the Turks, and doubting with what safetie they might yeeld themselves into the power of that faithlesse people, had rather to haue fought it out to the last man, and so to haue left vnto them a bloudie victorie. Amongst these, one bold spoken fellow stept forth; and in presence of them all dissuaded the yeelding vp of the citie in this sort:

I haue not been with any thing more vnacquainted, than to deliuer my opinion before princes, or in such great and publicke assemblies: being alwaies more desirous modestly to heare other mens opinions, than impudently to thrust forth mine owne. But now, seeing extreame necessitie will not longer suffer me to keepe my wonted course of silence, I will frankly speake my mind, and tell you what in my opinion is to be answered vnto the heauie message and imperious commaund of the most perfidious tyrant. This cruell enemy hath ouerthrowne our wall, and is entred three hundred foot and more within our citie, and as a most troublesome guest lieth and conuerseth with vs as it were vnder the same roofe. Such as list not longer to endure such an vnnelcome guest and troublesome neighbour, persuade you because he is troublesome, to giue him all: But (worthie and sacred knights) I am of far different opinion: neither doe I thinke a possession of 214 yeares is so lightly to be deliuered vp, and the ground forsaken: but rather that this troublesome intruder is in like manner to be himselfe troubled, and with deadly skirmishes continually vexed: whom after we had by force of armes and valour in himselfe, but helpen by time, which tameth all things: and since his first entrance it is now almost fortie daies, in which time for all his hast, he hath scarcely got forward 30 paces; hindered by the blockes we haue laied in his way, and will not cease continually to lay if we be wise men, and mindfull of our former valour. Destroy me you heavenly powers, before I see with these eyes these sacred knights to yeeld up this famous citie of the Rhodæ; the ancient bulwarke of Christian religion; vnto our mercilesse enemies, polluted with the infamous superstition of Mahomet: who besides the insatiable thirst they haue of our blood, how faithlesse and mischeuous they are by nature, if we know not, we need not make example of our selues, but wee may take example by the calamitie of CONSTANTINOPLE, the late miserie of EVBEEA, and that which later was, of METHONE; as also by the Malukes at CAIRE, miserably slaine contrarie to the league, contrarie to the faith and promise by the Turkish emperour himselfe before giuen. What? doe you not remember how the death of the most noble capitaine at BELGRADE was of late procured by the falshood, craft, and deceit of these same faithlesse miscreants? Let vs then, being men of wit and understanding, trust these mad beasts; let vs giue our selues into their power, which haue no regard of right or reason, of religion, or any thing els; whose conetousnesse and crueltie it is hard to say which is greater; which for these many years haue plotted and laboured nothing more than how by policie or force they may utterly root out the very name of the Rhodians, which they so deadly hate. They keepe vs shut vp and besieged now the sixth month, feeling together with vs extreame dangers and endlesse labours, slaine by heapes before our wals and fortresses, and cannot be remoued hence with thunder, lightning, stormes, tempests, and all the calamities of winter, a time which giueth intermission to all warres both by sea and land; so despite the calamities of reuenge, and greedie of our blood: and that not altogether without cause, for we haue rous they are of reuenge, and greedie of our blood: and that not altogether without cause, for we haue also shed theirs, and gladly would still so doe, if it lay in our power. But seeing it seemeth good vnto God otherwise, and that we are surprised with ineuitable necessitie: yet let vs whilst we are at liberty and God otherwise, and that we are surprised with ineuitable necessitie: yet let vs whilst we are at liberty same and glorie, prepared both in heauen and earth for such as honorably die in defence of their prince and country: which honour it becometh not them to enuie vnto thy most noble name and vertue, and worthis Grand Master, which hauing for many yeares enjoyed the commoditie and profit of peace, and greatly enriched by bountie of this sacred militarie Order, refuse now to beare this last burden of war.

At these words an ancient Greeke, for his wisdom and discretion of great reputation both with the Greekes and Latines, perceiuing his countrymen wrongfully touched, and the desperat holding out of the citie vainely persuaded, tooke hold, and interrupting this yong gallant, in answer of that he had said, spake as followeth:

That greefe of mind and desperation can make men rather eloquent than wise, as you haue many times heard before this; so you might this day perceiue also, most valiant gentlemen: for aduised moderation neuer falleth into obloquie, neither confoundeth falshood with truth; it desireth not the slaughter of the citizens, it persuadeth not furie, nor exhorteth men to madnesse: but it is by nature so engrafted in many, that when they cannot by their owne wisdom and policie deliuer themselves from their troubles, they yet seeke to draw others into the fellowship of the same danger: so greedie haue mallice, and miserie alwaies been of companie. But if you (worthie Commander) will giue me also leave to speake, a man

A most resolute speech of a common soldier, persuading the yeelding up of the Rhodæ.

The former speech notably answered by a Greeke, and the citie urged.

a man amongst his countrymen not of meanest place or authority, which thing both the present calamitie and urgent necessitie might of you easily obtaine; I would alledge such reasons, and lay downe such matter, as should not only refell the copious and glorious words of this sharp witted Orator, (except together of purpose to flourish out the matter, but also such as might stir up your mind, to that which is truest, profitable and necessarie; expelling hatred, feare, trouble, or despair. This gentleman, whom we all know, not only to be a vehement Orator, but sometime a man most terrible, whereas for all his great words he is by nature mild, and so mild, that he neuer had the heart to kill, may not so much as lightly wound any one of them whom he calleth barbarous, mad, cruell, whose perfidious dealing he detesteth, whose cruelty he accuseth, whose manner of liuing he exclaimeth against, as altogether without law, without reason, without order, without regard: and now in time of truce, and whilest the showers of arrows, from bullets, fire and stones doth cease, creeping out of his caue, maketh much adoe, and keepeth a great stir; and not knowing in what danger he is, doth now with glorious words call upon death, whereof he hath been shewed himselfe too much afraid, and all forsooth (as he saith) least he should be enforced to endure the mocking and scorning of the enemy. But this is meere pride, not Christian fortitude or humilitie. But our enemy neither threateneth nor purposeth any such matter, nothing so perfidious or cruell as he would make him, rubbing up the slaughters at CAIRE, EVBEA, METHONE, and CONSTANTINOPLE, cities taken either by force or warlike policie, and not yielded up by composition, upon faith given betwix the besieger and the besieged: who because he would spare us, will not suffer us to doe that whereby we should undoubtedly perish. But wherof proceedeth this new found clemencie? this unmounted fauor towards the people of the RHODIANS? I am not of the tyrants prauie counsell, neither euer curiously sought after the reason of another mans bountie, but am glad to receiue it when I need it. As for all that, I will not dissemble what I thinke in a matter so doubtfull: He is willing (as I suppose) in this siege and conquest of the RHODIANS, to shew vnto other nations whom he purposeth to invade, both his power and his patience: least alwaies satisfying his cruell nature, he should make desolation in places he would raigne ouer, and so for euer alienating the minds of men, be enforced to fight with all men with fire and sword, by which rigour he hath not so much hurt his enemy as himselfe. For this cause (as I suppose) he leaueth vnto vs life & goods, least whilest he is going about to take them from vs by force, & we seeking to keep the by desperatenesse, we should both fall into great destruction, no lesse lamentable to the conquerors than to the vanquished. Besides that, if he should kill all here, truly he might then enter the breaches of the citie on the bodies of the dead, no man now left aloue to resist him. But LERVS is shut up, ARANGIA is strongly fortified, LINDVS is by situation impregnable: here he knoweth are weapons, armour, and men, here he must begin a new war, except he will haue the remainder of your war, the fatal plague of his empire, to prey still vpon his subjects: all which strong places he shall haue without slaughter, without bloodshed (as reason is) if he shall let you and vs poore wretches depart in safetie with a little truce. Except these worldly considerations haue moued him to mercie and compassion: then out of doubt it is wrought by diuine power and the secret fauor of God towards vs, & of our Saviour Christ Iesus crucified. Whereto if you be men well aduised, if religious, if mindfull of the dutie of Christians, it becometh you not to oppose any obstacle, and with the ruin of your selues to destroy this miserable people, which in this halfe yeares siege hath scarcely had so much rest as might suffice the necessitie of nature. Standing for you in battell, enduring both wounds and death for your honour and victorie: by whose faithfull labour and diligence you haue bene alwaies holpen both at home and abroad; whether you invaded the Turke by land in MYTILENE, NAVAECTVS, METHONE, PATRAS, or other parts of P.ELOPONESVS, or els by sea thrust him out of the possession of the Ionian or Egeum: whereby it may appeare euen vnto a blind man, how iniurious it is & far from truth, to object vnto vs, That enioying the fruits of peace, we refuse the charges of wars: nay we neuer refused wars. But now it is come to that point, that if we would neuer so faine make wars, we are not able so to do, the flower of our youth being slaine: and the small remainder that is left, not only weakened in bodie with wounds, sickness, watching, and lesse labour; but also in mind discouraged, whilest all things fall out prosperously to our enemies, and to vs aduerse: the greatest and best part of our great artillerie being broken with continuall use, which if it were whole, we could haue thereof small use or profit, for want of powder, which not only this citie now wanteth, but also your strong holds, LERVS, LINDVS, HALICARNASSVS, ARANGIA. I was neuer desirous or curious to looke into other mens doings, much lesse into your manner of wars: but yet (Great Master) you cannot denie but it is so, who haue caused soldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and gunpowder secretly: by which prouident foresight you haue withstood your forraine enemy these six months, and deuced the trecherie of one or two domesticall traitors. But I gladly admit we haue all these things, things, I stand not vpon the truth, I say not what most men say, but I speake to please a few: and suppose we wanted neither armour nor courage, I would then aske you this, whether they would aduise you to vse them to your defence, or to your destruction? for vnto both it cannot be no more than at once to be a freeman and a slave. To vse them to your destruction, that were madnesse and senselesse pride, hateful to God and man: you should therefore vse them to defence: But how shall we defend a citie (I doe not say, as the truth is) already lost and possessed by the enemy, wherein he raigneth, and turneth all upside down? but hauing the wals battered down, a great breach in the Spanish station, and another not like but euen now as good as made in the Italian station, how shall we be able to keepe this vnfortunat towne, battered and rent at the French, English, and Auergne stattons, and the tower of S. Nicholas? which if it were not so battered and bared of all warlike prouision, but sound and thoroughly furnished with munition and victuall, yet necessitie enforcing, and reason perswading, you ought to forsake it, for so much as all power of further resistance is taken from you. Doe you not see how easily and almost without any trouble the enemy (by means of the castle he hath new built vpon the mount PHILIPPO, not past two miles distant) can take from you all manner of prouision both by sea and land, and restraîne you from going out or in? Truly notable gentlemen, honourable for your martiall prowesse, you see and haue long agoe foreseene these things better than I, altogether ignorant in martiall affaires, altogether busied in the trade of merchandise, and caring for my familie: yet suffer me to say the truth. All the powers wherby this kingdome stood, are departed and gone: against the force of our enemies no policie or force of man remaineth; and to expect armies of angels or soldiours from heauen, and other such like miracles, is in my iudgement more and more to prouoke God to anger, although in his anger he be vnto vs mercifull: wherefore being destitute of all worldly helpe, let vs as we may, prouide for our safetie. I beseech thee (worthie Great Master) by these my aged teares, by the naturall pittie ingrafted in thy noble nature, expose not this miserable citie to the spoile of the enemy, our old and middle aged men to the sword, our wines and daughters to be rauished, our boies and youths to the vnnaturall filthinesse of our barbarous enemies; and to be corrupted with the mad and grosse opinion of the vngodly Mahometane superstition. I would (noble knights) you had scene with what teares, with what mourning our beaue families and children crying about their mothers, sent vs hither, and what prayers they made for vs at our departing: I would you knew with what mind and how great hope they expect their safetie from your clemencie and aduised resolution.

This speech of the aged Greeke might haue moued a heart of flint: but the Great master, who in his countenance shewed a greater courage than his present state required, commanding euery man to his charge: after the matter had bene thus most part of the night discoursed, gaue them no other answer, but, That he would be carefull of all their well doing. The next morning he sent for PREIANES, MARTINIVS, and a few other of greatest iudgement and experience; by whom he was fully resolved, that the citie in so many places by the enemy laid open and shattered, was not possible to be long defended. Wherupon he caused a common counsell to beken, was not possible to be long defended. Wherupon he caused a common counsell to be called, of all the knights of the Order together with the Burgeses of the citie: where after long debating, whether they should fight it out to the last man, or yeeld vpon such conditions as was to be obtained; it was by generall consent concluded, That the citie should be yeilded, and thereupon a decree made, which was by the Great master pronounced. Whilest these things were thus in doing, a truce was taken with the enemy for foure daies, but full of feare and danger. During which time, diuers of the Turkes presuming vpon the truce, came by great companies to be holding the wals and rampiers of the citie: wherewith Fornonius the Frenchman (of whom mention is before made) being fore moued, in his choller without further command discharged a shot before made) being fore moued, in his choller without further command discharged a shot of great ordinance amongst the thickest of them, contrarie to the truce taken. At which time also, the Rhodians receiued into the citie secretly by night a ship loaded with wines out of CRETE, and in her Alphonsus a Spaniard, chiefe pilot of the Rhodian galleys, and with him one hundred voluntarie souldiours all Latines, all which went out of CRETE without the knowledge of the Venetian Senat: for at that time the Venetians were in league with Solyman. The Turkes justly offended with the breach of the truce, and the taking in of new supplies, which they supposed to haue bene farre greater than in truth they were; without command of any captain or ensigne displayed, in great numbers thrust in thorow the ruines of the breaches into the citie as farre as the rampiers and baricadoes new made, and furiously assailed the defendants: in which conflict many were slaine and wounded on both sides. But after the Turkes had to their their cost againe made proofe of the courage of their enemies, as without commandement they began that skirmish, so of themselves they brake it off and retired. After the truce was thus broken, the captaine of the Turkes fencers, a bloudie cruell fellow, hauing taken three Christians prisoners, cut off their hands, eares, and noses, and sent them so dismembred into the citie with letters to the Great master, charging him with the vnjust breach of the truce, barbarously threatening within three or foure daies to make like example of him to all posteritie. Amongst other none was more troubled with this sudden and v unexpected breach of the truce, than Robertus Perusinus, Raymundus Marchet, and Raymundus Lupus, three knights of the Order, men of singular wisdom and grauitie, embassadours at that time in the Turkes campe: whom the barbarous people in their furie had vndoubtedly slaine or put to torture, if they had not feared the like measure to haue beene shewed to their hostages in the citie. But after that Nicholaus Vergotus, and Georgius Sandriticus, two of the Burgeses of the citie, were come into the campe with articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliuer vp the citie, all their furie and rage was quickly appeased. Solyman for his greater maiestie and the more terror of these messengers, beset round about with his great armie, and guarded about with his Janizaries in their richest attire and glistening armour, gaue them audience: who admitted to his presence, with great humilitie offered vnto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yeeld vp vnto him the citie. The chiefe points whereof were, That the churches should remaine vnto the Christians inuiolated: that no children should be taken from their parents: that no Christian should be enforced to forsake his religion and turne Turke: that such Christians as would tarry still in the citie, might so doe at libertie, without paying any tribute for the space of five yeares: that all they which would depart might go with bag and baggage, furnished with conuenient shipping and prouision as farre as Creta, and to carrie with them so much great ordinance as they pleased; and that the Christians should appoint a reasonable day for the time of their departure. All which articles Solyman condescended vnto, and solemnly swore faithfully to performe the same. But how they were indeed performed, the writers of that age doe much varie: it should seeme they were neither altogether kept, nor broken, but so performed as pleased the conquerour: certaine it is, that many great outrages were through militarie insolencie committed by the proud Turkes vpon the poore Christians, contrarie to the mind of Solyman. Iacobus Fontanus a Ciuilian, and at that time one of the iudges of the citie (out of whose writings this historie is for most part collected) reporteth, That the Turkes not expecting the departure of the Christians, brake into the citie vpon Christenmas day, by the gate called Cosquintum, polluted the temples, shamefully abused the Christians, and made hauocke of all things: and that he himselfe falling into their hands, after he had with such money as he had redeemed himselfe, hauing not sufficient to content all their greedie desires, was by them hardly entreated and grievously beaten. The Great master by the counsell of Achimetes, putting on such simple attire as best befecemed a vanquished man that was to humble himselfe before the conquerour, went out of the citie into the campe, attended vpon with a few knights of the Order: where after he had waited in the raine most part of the day, before Solymans tent, at last he had a rich gowne cast vpon him, and so brought into the proud tyrants presence. VV here after they had a while at the first, with piercing eies one earnestly beholden the other; the Great master humbling himselfe before him, was in token of grace admitted to kisse his hand, and welcomed by Solyman in this sort.

speech vnto the Great master.

Although (said he) I might worthely and iustly infringe the articles I haue prescribed concerning the yeelding of the citie, with thy most wicked crossed compieres, the people of the Rhodes, and thee especially such a capitall enemy, from whose deserved punishment, neither faith nor oath ought to stay a most iust conquerour: yet I haue determined to be not onely gracious and mercifull vnto thee so great an offender, deserving exemplarie punishment, but also liberall and bountifull: who if thou wilt by well doing amend the grievous transgressions of thy former life, I promise vnto thee most honourable entertainment, great preferment, and the highest places in my empire, in my armie in time of warre, and in counsell in time of peace. Not to refuse this my offer, both thy present estate perswadeth thee, and the Christians (whose quarrell thou tookest vpon thee to defend against me, with better beginning than successe) deserue at thy hands no better: for what should let thee, forsaken of all thy friends, a man as it were betrayed and vanquished, to cast thy selfe into the perpetuall and protection of a most mightie and mercifull conquerour, of himselfe offering thee this vnderused grace and fauour.

Whereunto the Great master presently answered:

Most mightie and gracious emperour, your offered fauours before your other worthie captaines, I deserue not; neither is my present estate and desert towards you such, as that I dare or ought to receive the same: yet I will speake freely in the midst of your victorious armie, a man vanquished in presence of the conquerour, whose great mercie I neuer dispaired of, and whose faith I neuer doubted: I had rather now I haue lost my soueraignie, forthwith to lose my priuat and vnforsunate life; or else for ever hereafter to liue in obscuritie, than of my people to be accounted a fugitive rather than a vanquished man: For to be vanquished is but chance of warre, and of so great a conquerour no shame to him that is conquered: but afterwards to forsake his owne people and to turne to the enemy, I account it shamefull cowardise and treacherie.

There is a speech of the Great
Solyman.

Solyman maruelling at the courage and maiestie of the hoarie old prince, in his so great extremitie, dismissed him, and sent him againe into the citie, guarded with his owne guard, vntill he was come into his pallace: and vnto euery one of the knights attending vpon the Great Master, was giuen a rich garment, in token of Solymans fauour. VVithin a few daies after Solyman comming into the citie, went to visite the Great Master also: whom he found busie in packing vp his things against his departure. Here when the Great master falling downe vpon his knees would haue worshipped him, he would in no case suffer him so to doe: but with his hand putting aside his vaile of maiestie (which manner of reuerence the Turkish emperours giue onely to God, and their great prophet Mahomet) tooke him vp, and saluted him by the name of Father. To whom the Great master for his wisdom and discretion now to him no lesse admirable, than he was before in time of warre for his valour and courage, spake in this sort.

meth into the citie vnto the Great Master.

If my fortune and successe had been answerable to my heart and courage, I should here be in this citie, rather as a victorious conquerour than a man conquered. But since the fatal destinies would needs ouerthrow the Rhodian estate, I am glad that you are the man before all other by fortune assigned, of whom I should receiue both force and grace. And vnto you, amongst many other your rare and worthie praises, this shall not be the least, That you vanquished the Rhodes, and shewed mercie. By this meanes you haue ioyned vnto your dreadfull power, the fame of clemencie and curesse: an honour not of the highest to be desired, by which alone we come neere vnto God. Wherefore I doubt not but you will keepe the conuenions of the late peace inuiolate, which your owne clemencie perswaded you to grant, and necessitie enforced vs to take. I shall now be an eternall example of the Turkish emperours clemencie and vertue, more than if I had by and by at the first yeelded my selfe: my obstinat wilfulnesse hath made thy glorie and mercie now famous thorow the whole world, and vnto the worlds end.

The speech of
to Solyman.

Whereunto Solyman by his interpreter, answered:

It is to me a great pleasure, that God at length hath put into thy mind to make choise of peace before warre, which I would thou couldest haue liked of from the beginning: then truly thou shouldest at this time, haue receiued of my great and mightie maiestie, more good than thou hast endured harme. Which that I haue done vnto thee, not for any hatred, but onely for desire of soueraignie, and substance: For I make not warre, thereby to heape up wealth and riches, but for honour, fame, immortalitie, and enlarging of mine empire. For it is the propertie of a king royally descended, by strong hand to take from others, and to invade others: not vpon a greedie and couetous mind, but for the honourable desire of rule and soueraignie: which whilest my neighbour withstandeth, I count it enough by force of armes to remoue him.

The notable answer of Soly-man to the great Master.

But the Tyrant (as many supposed) spake all this by way of dissimulation, hauing as it was commonly bruted, giuen order for the rigging vp of a great ship and certaine gallies, for the sudden transporting of the Great master and the knights of the Order to CONSTANTINOPLE; G which report seemeth to haue bene but faigned either of malice, or else by such as least knew Solyman's mind: for if he had so purposed, who should haue let him, hauing them all in his power. Iouius in his little treatise rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the first, reporteth that hee himselfe heard Lilladamus the Great master say, That when Solyman entered into the RHODES attended vpon with thirtie thousand men, there was not any man heard to speake a word, but that the souldiours went as if they had bene obseruant friers: and that when he came to aske leaue of Solyman that he might depart, he was so courteously vsed of him, that turning himselfe to Abraim the Bassa, whom he aboue all men loued, said, Truly I cannot but grieue to see this vnfortunat old man, driuen out of his owne dwelling, to depart hence so heauily.

The Great master embarking himselfe with his knights and such other as wete willing to depart, in vessels and gallies prepared for that purpose, departed out of the island on Newyeares day at night: and after long and dangerous trauell by sea in that Winter weather, landed at last at MESSANA in SICILIA, from whence he afterwards sailed into ITALIE, and so trauelled to ROME where he was honourably receiued by Adrian the sixt of that name then bishop there, a Hollander borne, sometime schoolemaster to Charles the first, and his Vicegerent in Spaine; who if he had bene as forward in the short time of his Papacie to haue relieved the RHODES, as he was to maintaine Charles his quarrell against the French king, it is not vnlike but that famous citie had bene relieved, and the island in possession of the Christians at this day. Thus Solyman, whilst the Christian princes wete at discord amongst themselves, to his great glorie and no lesse griefe of all good Christians, entered the RHODES the five and twentieth day of December, a day dedicated vnto the natiuitie of our Sauour Christ, in the yeare 1522, after it had bene by the knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended against the infidels by the space of 214 yeares, since the time they by force tooke it from the infidels in the yeare 1308: and now being so long holden as was possible, against all the power of the Turkes, was yeilded vp when it had been six moneths besieged. At this siege Solyman lost a great part of his army; for besides them that were slaine at the assaults, which were many, thirtie thousand died of the flux.

Solyman fendeth
Ferhates Bassa against Ali's beg the mountaine
prince.

Whilst Solyman thus lay at the siege of the RHODES, Ferhates Bassa Gouverneur of the Marches of the Turkish empire, alongst the riuer of Euphrates, by the commaundement of Solyman went with a great armie against Ali's beg, whom the Turkes called Schach, Suar-ogli, that is to say, king Suar his sonne: which P. Iouius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxouar-ogli. This Ali's beg, after he had betraied his vnkle Aladenles the mountaine king, vnto Siman Bassa, was by Selymus left chiefe gouernour of that large and wild countrey alongst the borders of ARMENIA and CAPADOCIA, wanting nothing of the honour of a king but the name onely, as is before declared in the life of Selymus. Solyman jealous of his honor, and fearing least he should take vpon him the absolute gouernment of that countrey (which indeed of right belonged vnto him, the children of Aladenles the late king being now all dead) and so to make himselfe king, especially if he should joyne in friendship with the Persian king: after the manner of ambitious men, purposed by any meanes to haue him taken out of the way: and had therefore sent Ferhates to ease him off that care. The Bassa without making any shew of hostilitie, marching with his armie along the confines of his countrey, as if it had bene but to looke to his charge, when he was come as neere as he could to Ali's beg, without mistrust, thought good to assay if he could by policie bring that to passe which he was otherwise with great danger to attempt by force. Wherefore fauning himselfe to be extreame sicke, he sent embassadours to Ali's beg, requesting him as a friend to vouchsafe to come vnto him being at the point of death, vnto whom he had many things of importance from the great emperor to impart, and would if he should die, leaue with him all his charge vntill Solyman should otherwise dispose thereof.

foire fois trea-cherously slaine.

Ali's beg, who from his youth had alwaies honoured the Turkish emperours and faithfully seried them, mistrusting no harme came to the Bassa, accompanied with his foure sonnes, whom the faithlesse Bassa without regard of infamie, caused presently to be put to death with their father, and so reducing all that countrey into the manner of a prouince vnder Solyman's obedience, came to him with twentie thousand men, about the time that the citie of the RHODES was yeilded vp. This is the faithlesse dealing of the Turkes, not with the Christians onely, but with them of their owne superstition also: vsing it as no small policie, vtterly to extinguish the nobilitie in all countries subject to their seruite tytannie.

Solyman

Solyman after he had thus subdued the RHODES, and disposed of the Island as he liked best, returning to CONSTANTINOPLE, brake vp his armie, and for the space of thre yeares after followed his pleasure, not doing any thing worthie of remembrance. During which time and many yeares after, the rich and flourishing countrey of ITALIE, sometime mistress of the world, was miserably afflicted and rent in peeces by Charles the first, (then emperor), and Francis the French king, the one enuying vnto the other the glorie of the empire; and he not content therewith, seeking with immoderat ambition to make himselfe lord of all ITALIE: most of the other Christian princes and states being at the same time either by the one or by the other, drawn into the fellowship of that warre, to the great trouble and foreweakening of the Christian commonweale. Whereupon Solyman waiting all occasions that might serue for the enlarging of his empire, and annoying of the Christians, thought it now a fit time for him to let his foot into HUNGARIE, whereinto he had already laied open a way by the taking of Batonia. He knew right well that Lewes then king of HUNGARIE was but young, altogether vnacquainted with the warres, commaunding ouer his headstrong subjects (especially his rich prelates and nobilitie) no otherwise than pleased themselves, being himselfe rather by them altogether ouerruled. Besides that, he was in good hope, that the other Christian princes neere vnto him, either carried away with regard of their owne estate, would not; or els before vnto himselfe by league fast bound, could not afford vnto him any great aid or succour. The Germanes hee knewe would make small haft vnto such warres as should yeeld them much danger, and but small pay. As for the princes of the house of AVSTRIE, Charles the emperor, and Ferdinand his brother, although they were joined vnto the young king with the neere bonds of alliance (Gemes hauing married Marie their youngest sister, and Ferdinand, Anne, king Lewes his sister) yet was there as he thought small helpe to be expected from them; Charles hauing his hands full in ITALIE; and Ferdinand altogether carefull of himselfe. And that Sigismund king of POLONIA would for the young king's sake breake the antient league he had with the Turkish emperours, he could hardly be persuaded. As for other Christian princes farther off, he stood not in any great doubt. Thus hauing with himselfe singled out this young prince the Hungarian king, whom he had in his greedie mind already deuoured, he set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, and was come on his way as far as SOPHIA in SERVIA with a mightie armie of two hundred thousand men, before that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his coming; so blind & senselesse was that state, which now sleeping in securitie, had long before lost those eyes which euer watch, and neuer spared cost or paines to keepe the same in safetie: instead of whom were others come in place, sharpe of sight and too too prouident for that concerned their owne aduancement; but blind as beetles in foreseeing this great and common danger (wherewith they were shortly after all quite ouerwhelmed) vntill it was now brought home vnto their owne dores. The young king of himselfe but weake, by reason of his youthfull yeares, and nothing strengthened by them for whom he had most done, and should haue bene his greatest stay; was wonderfully dismayed with the fame of the approach of so mightie anemie: yet the better to withstand him, he sent embassadours with all speed vnto the Christian princes his neighbors, requesting their aid against the common enemie: but all in vaine. In the meane time, after the antient manner of his countrey, he gaue out generall summonses for the assembly of his counsell for the waies: whether his great stipendarie prelates (of dutie bound to appeare) came with their troupes of euill appointed horsemen, and not halfe full; who also deliuered in lesse summes of money by farre, than of right they should haue done, towards the maintenance of the charge of that common war. And the temporall nobilitie, forgetting the warlike discipline of their famous ancestors, as fresh water souldiours which had neuer seene the Turkish emperor in his strength, and but little acquainted with some light skirmishes or small inuasions, in their vaine brauerie made light account of the Turkes, proudly vaunting, That although they were in number but few, yet they would easily overthrow the great numbers of them, if euer they came to handie strokes. But about all the rest one Paulus Tomoreus, archbishop of COLOSSA, sometimes a Minorite, who had before been in diuers light skirmishes against the Turkes, with great insolencie did so confidently brag and boast of the victorie he vainly dreamed of, that in his sermons vnto the souldiours, and in open talke with the nobilitie (if he could haue done so much as he vaunted of) it should seeme that he himselfe had been ynough to haue ouerthrowne the Turkes whole armie.

found five and twentie thousand men in all, horse and foot. So that the foolish hardinesse of Tomoreus, and others so forwards to giue the Turks battell, was of most wise men disliked. The old souldiours and men of great experience said plainly, That it was meere follie and madnesse with such a handfull of men to giue battell vnto the enemies, who would bring eight times so many more into the field as they were. Wherefore some wished, that the young king should be withdrawn from the imminent danger: amongst whom Stephanus Verbetius, a noble captain of all the rest best acquainted with the Turkish warres, gaue counsell, that the person of the young king should for the safetie of the common state, whatsoeuer should happen, be kept out of danger in the strong castle of Buda. But the vntruly souldiours with open mouth impugned his wholesome counsell, and said plainly, That except the king himselfe did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was also the rash prelate Tomoreus, perswading them with all speed to giue the enemy battell, and that the noble young king vnder the protection of Almighty God, should in person himselfe goe and giue the signall of battell against his enemies. The king ouerruled by this vnluckie counsell, vpon a brauetie without reason set forward with his armie, and came to a place called Mohatch or Mvache, which is a little countrey village not farre from Danubius, almost in the middle betwene Buda and Belgrade. And now Babheus with twentie thousand horsemen (the forerunners of the kings armie, entred into counsell, Whether it were better to encampe their armie within their wagons alongst the riuer of Danubius, and so to expect the coming of Ioannes Sepsius, countie of Cilia, and Vayuod of Transilvania; (who was then said to be coming towards the king with his Transilvanian horsemen, of all other fittest to haue encountered the Turkes) or els to march on forward, and presently to giue them battell. But Tomoreus, who now commaunded all, knowing that vpon the coming of the Vayuod, he was to giue place, and himselfe to be commaunded (which vnto so proud a man was no small grieue) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carrie away the glorie of the victorie he so vainely hoped for, could not abide to heare of any delay; but hasting headlong to his owne destruction, did with such vehemencie impugn the wholesome counsell of others, who would haue expected the coming of the Vayuod, that he by his franticke persuasions drew on the vnadvised young king into most apparent and manifest danger. For Babheus deuised his horsemen into foure battells, which by turnes skirmished with the kings armie without intermission, and gaue the Hungarians no leisure to rest either day or night, but continually wheeling about, kept them in so straight, that no man could without great danger goe to water his horse at the side of Danubius, which was fast by, or once to stirre out of the campe, but were enforced to dig pits for water in places where they lay: with which necessitie Tomoreus was enforced to put the armie in order of battell, and there was now no remedie, but he must of necessitie fight for the honour of his prince and countrey. His battell was ranged all in length, and his horsemen not altogether (as it was thought) vnstedfastly placed here and there by troupes amongst his footmen; least the Turkes (being in number eight to one) should with their multitude compasse them round; and so enforce them to fight as it were in a ring: for now was Solyman come also with all his huge armie. The Hungarian tents defended with a small garrison, were left a little from the armie on the right hand, enclosed round about with waggones, one chained to another: nere vnto the which, Tomoreus General of this vnluckie battell, had not altogether vndiscreetly placed a troupe of chosen horsemen for defence of the kings person against all vncertaine euents of the battell. But this day (vnluckie to the Hungarian name, but vnto the king himselfe most fatal and vnfortunat) ouerthrew that his purpose, deuised too late for the safetie of the kings person: for at the first encounter the Hungarians, although they had receiued no harme by the Turkish artillerie (being mounted too high, of purpose as it was thought, the gunners being for most part Christians) were easily beaten downe and ouerthrowne, oppressed by the multitude of their enemies, especially Tomoreus with the rest of the prelates and nobilitie being almost all slaine together, and the Hungarian horsemen also either slaine or put to flight. All things going thus to wracke, a companie of Turkes assailed the campe, which was hardly defended by the weak garrison. Which thing the troupe of the chosen horsemen appointed for defence of the kings person, beholding, could not be stayed, but that they would needs helpe them which defended the campe. The young king seeing all his armie discomfited, and himselfe forsaken of the horsemen which he was in hope should haue guarded him, betooke himselfe to flight. But drowned in a ditch.

A But as he was making shift for himselfe, thinking to haue passed ouer a fennie ditch, his horse in plunging out, fell backwards vpon him into the ditch; where being heauie loded with armour not able to helpe himselfe, he was in the midst of that filthie ditch in the mud most miserably drowned. Some few horsemen escaped out of the battell, the rest were either slaine or taken prisoners. This wofull battell neuer sufficiently to be lamented, as the ground of the miseries of that worthy kingdome, was fought the 29. day of October in the yeare 1526.

Solyman hauing obtained this victorie, marched on directly to Buda the regall seat of the Hungarian kings, which was deliuered vnto him with the castle; vpon condition, that he should not violate any man either in person or goods, and at his departure to leaue the same againe vnto the Hungarians: all which things he (according vnto their request) faithfully performed. Being entred into the castle, hee wonderfully commended the same, but lodged not therein, because it is by their auncient law forbidden the Turkish emperour to lodge within any walled place which is not his owne. Wherefore he returned and lodged in his campe alongst the riuer of Danubius.

Whilest Solyman lay thus at Buda, seauen bloudie heads of the bishops and greatest of the nobilitie (slaine in the late battell at Mohatch) were presented to him, all set in order vpon a wooden step: whereat he smiled, to see his courtiers laying their right hands vpon their breasts, and bending their bodies as if they had done them great obeisance, to salute them by name, and in derision to welcome them by the names of valiant popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly enquired what euerie one of them was, it is reported that he most of all detested Ladislaus Salcanius the great bishop of Strigonium, for his miserable couctousnesse, that being a man of infinit wealth, refused to spare part thereof vnto his soueraigne, requesting the same at his great need: Tomoreus he blamed of inconsiderate rashnesse, for that he being a cleargie man, would busie himselfe so farre in matters not belonging to his vocation: On the contrarie part, he commended Franciscus Perenus bishop of Veradivm, a man honourably defended, for his wise counsell (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported, that he as a true prophet foretelling the common slaughter ensuing, had sharply said in the counsell at such time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turkes, and was not by any means to be removed from that his fatal opinion, That he did foresee what that their frierlike Generall would the next day doe; and that he would with so great an enterprise effect no more, but to make one holiday the more in the Christian kalenders, in remembrance of thirtie thousand Hungarian martyrs, most miserably slaine of the Turkes in vnequall battell, for defence of the Christian faith and religion (for at that time, they which willingly exposed themselves to death in defence of the Christian faith, were all accounted for Martyrs): Georgius Sepsius and the others he called rash fooles, that would adventure with so small strength to encounter so strong an enemy. At such time as the counterfeites of King Lewis and Marie his wife were shewed vnto him, he honourably said, That he was sorie for the young king, that it was his euill hap to haue so vnadvised counsellors in a matter of so great importance, as to persuaade him against all reason to fight at so great disadvantage: And that he came not into Hungarie to take his kingdome from him; but only to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by the Hungarians: And that if he had escaped the danger of the battell, he would assuredly haue againe restored vnto him the kingdome of Hungarie, his confederat, so strongly enough to haue saued the nephew of Sigismund king of Pollonia his confederat, so strongly allied with the honorable house of Austria. All which he commaunded to be told to Marie the queene, who was for feare fled from Buda to Possonium. Which might perhaps all seeme to haue been either dissemblingly spoken, or falsely reported of the equitie and courtesie of the barbarous king, if he had not shortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his bountie and liberallitie, without any desert, giuen the same kingdome of Hungarie to Ioannes Sepsius, not borne of any royall blood, and then retaining the mind of a verie enemy. After that, he tooke away three goodly images of brasse of ancient workmanship, which were placed in the entrance into the kings pallace, by that renowned king Mathias Coruinus the great fauourer of rare qualities and vertues: these images represented the formes of Hercules with his club, of Apollo with his harpe, and Diana with her bow and quier: all which he placed in the tilyard at Constantinople, as a trophie of the Hungarian victorie. Howbeit these images were since taken downe by the persuation of the Musli, &c molten (as contrarie to their superstition) and great ordinance dinance made of them. He carried also away with him three pieces of artillerie of most excellent and curious workmanship; and certaine brazen pillars of chamfired worke, which supported the Chapters of the gates. He tarried at BUDA about twentie daies: In which time to satisfie the cruell nature and greedie desires of his souldiours, he sent out diuers troupes of horsemen into the country thereabout, by whom all the country betwixt RAB and the riuer of Tibiscus was by that sudden and vnexpected incurfion so destroyed, that it is reported that about an hundredth and fiftie thousand people of all sorts were either slaine oryled away into most miserable captiuitie. All which done, he returned againe by the same way he came, to CONSTANTINOPLE.

About the same time Ioannes Sepusius Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, with a great power came now too late into HUNGARIE to haue aided the king: but glad, as was thought, of his death, as tending to his owne aduancement; for as much as he was now (the king being dead without issue) a man of greatest account amongst the nobilitie of HUNGARIE. Wherefore as one of a deepe and reaching wit, and in great hope to obtaine the kingdom, he began cunningly to labour with the nobles, and instantly to request them, that at the next parliament they would not betray the honour of their country, in suffering the royall dignitie of that auncient kingdom to be transferred vnto a stranger, of such a nation as happily loued them not: for why, the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they had receiued in former times, in chusing forraigne kings and strangers to raigne ouer them, and in following their vnfortunat ensignes against the Turkes; which thing the wofull miseries of times past might notably proue: which either Sigismundus of BOHEMIA, or Ladislaus the first of POLONIA, by their vnfortunat battels, once at NICOPOLIS, againe at CULMEBARIUM, and last of all at VARNA had brought vnto the Hungarians. But to speake, nay once to remember the harmes receiued by the long cowardise of Ladislaus, or this late rashnesse of his sonne king Lewes, would make any noble mind to blush and be ashamed: vnder whose gouernment all militarie discipline, and the glorie of HUNGARIE might well be thought to be vtterly lost. And yet he said there remained of the nobilitie of HUNGARIE, men honourably descended of most auncient houses, worthe of the kingdom, which bare noble minds, and were of sufficient courage, discretion, and power, in this time of common heauinesse to restore the honour of the estate, and worthily to defend the kingdom: Amongst whom (said he) I would not be accounted so base minded, or heauie headed (although there be many which for the honour of their houses and wealth may seeme to go before me) that I will therefore confesse, that any of them is for valour, prowesse, or fortune better than my selfe, either for conducting of an armie, or gouernment of a kingdom: for I shall be a king of courage and valour sufficient, if by your fauourable good will I shall be thought worthe of your consent and suffrages. The Vayuod taking this course, by his earnest sute and labour had woun the good wils of many; and so much the easier, for that Stephanus Bator (a man of greatest nobilitie among the Hungarians) was a little before gone into BOHEMIA vnto king Ferdinand, who was then greatly busied (by reason of a parliament there summoned) in procuring the fauour of the nobilitie and commons of that realme against the time of the parliament, wherein he was in good hope to be chosen king; as he was in short time after.

At that same time the Hungarians were with great solemnitie celebrating the funerall of their late king: whose dead bodie after the departure of Solyman from BUDA, was found whole, by the demonstration of one Cotricus one of the squires of his bodie, who was present when he was drowned; and so was brought out of the fens of MOKATCHZ to ALBA REGALIS, where it was with great pompe buried amongst the sepulchres of the other kings of HUNGARIE his predecessours. Which solemnitie funerall once ended, the generall militarie parliament (by the authoritie and voice whereof the kings of HUNGARIE were by their auncient lawes and customes to be chosen) was called: in the shutting vp whereof, John the Vayuod hauing in that common heauinesse no competitor, nor any of the greatest nobilitie which durst stand against him, was with the great applause and consent of all there present chosen king. To whom forthwith Peretrus Perennus came and presented the auncient crowne of the kingdom of HUNGARIE, which was in his keeping, made after an homely fashion of pure gold; with which the lawfull kings of HUNGARIE vsed alwaies to be solemnly crowned. It is reported, that it was the crowne of Stephanus first king of HUNGARIE, and was by an auncient custome alwaies kept in the castle of

of VICOGRAD. And so John the Vayuod was orderly crowned, and consecrated by the hands of Paulus bishop of STRIGONIVM, lately chosen in steed of Ladislaus Salcanius, slaine in the battell at MUGACE, and by the hands of Stephanus Brodaricus bishop of VACIA, whom he chose for his secretarie. And vnto Americus Cibachus he gaue the honor of the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, being but a little before chosen bishop of VRADIVM. In his preferment, he was greatly holpen vnto the kingdom by the nobilitie which followed him out of TRANSILVANIA, men of great account both in peace and warre; amongst whom descended of the Hungarian bloud, were chiefe, Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Antandrus, Gregorius Peschenius, Nicolaus Glessa, and Ianus Docia. But whilest this new king is in this sort busied in rewarding his friends and strengthening himselfe in his kingdom, he was aduertised, That Ferdinand his competitor of the Hungarian kingdom was chosen king of BOHEMIA: who out of the old controuersie betwixt Mathias Coruinus and Fredericus the emperours great grandfather, alleadged great claime vnto that kingdom, deriued from the time of Ladislaus, who was reported to haue bene poisoned at the time of the solemnization of his marriage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius Pogibracius; who affecting the kingdom of BOHEMIA, shortly after obtained the same. And now it seemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the kingdom of BOHEMIA, and strengthened with the power of his brother Charles the emperour, not forgetting his right, might vpon good ground lay claime vnto the kingdom of HUNGARIE, vnto him (as he pretended) of right belonging euer since the time of Albertus the emperour. Neither did Ferdinand beside the strength of AVSTRIA & BOHEMIA, want the furtherance of diuers of the princes of HUNGARIE; hauing in his court many of vnquiet spirit, halfe fugitiues, desirous of change, which eniued at the Vayuods royall preferment (as if it had been taken from themselves, more worthe thereof than he) by the rash and tumultuous fauour of the vulgar people. For besides Bator, who in most mens judgement might most worthely haue required and obtained the kingdom, there were others also almost of like nobilitie and valour, as Valentinus Turaccus, Stephanus Maylatus, Ianus Scala, Gasper Scredius, Baltasar Pamphilus, and Ferentius Gnarius; to whom also was joyned Paulus Babinus borne in SERVIA, a valiant gentleman, who being entered into the Mahometane religion, to auoid the Turkish slauietie got away vnto the Christians, and hardly escaped from the battell of MOKATCHZ. By the persuation of these noble men, Ferdinand of his owne disposition readie ynough to D claime his right, especially a kingdom, and trusting vnto his strength in AVSTRIA, BOHEMIA, RHETIA, STIRIA, and CARYNTHIA, marched directly towards BUDA. With whose coming, John the new king being wonderfully troubled, as a man beset with want of all things, hauing neither sufficient strength whereupon to rest in his new got kingdom, neither any great assistance of the fidelitie of his subjects, like ynough either for feare, or of their naturall inconstancie to fall from him, determined not to abide the coming of his enemy to BUDA: but exhorted his captaines to follow him, although he were glad to depart and giue place to his euill fortune for a time, with such power as he had brought with him out of TRANSILVANIA, & such other as he could otherwise leuie, he passed ouer the riuer to PESTVM: and not daring any where thereabouts to rest, by long marches passed ouer the riuer Tibiscus, and there encamped at TOCAI, which was a strong castle vpon the further side of the riuer. His departure being knowne, Ferdinand marching on, obtained BUDA without resistance: where he staid a while, and consulted with his captaines, Whether he should pursue his flying enemy, or not: But it was quickly resolved, That the discouraged enemy was to be speedily pursued, before he should gather greater strength, or enter into greater policies. Wherefore Ferdinand committed all his armie vnto the nobilitie of HUNGARIE, his friends, whom we haue before named; who marching with all speed possible, came to the riuer Tibiscus: where passing ouer vpon a bridge made of boats, which they brought with them in waggons for that purpose, they came with ensignes displayed vnto the castle of TOCAI, where the king lay with his armie in order of battell. But the terrified with the suddaine coming of his enemies, and debating with his captaines of the greatnesse of the danger, took a course vnto himselfe rather safe than honorable: For his captaines desiring nothing more than to ioine battell, and in manner contemning their enemies, persuaded him to withdraw himselfe a little out of the battell, and to keepe him out of danger; and if things fell out otherwise than well, to referue himselfe vnto his better fortunes: as for themselves they would most resolutely fight against those traiterous fugitiues, for as much as it were great dishonour.

dishonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike people by nature, to refuse battell being offered by the enemy. Amongst the chieftaines in the kings armie, Ferentius Bodo, an old captain of great experience and courage was cheefe, to whom the king deliuered his ensigne with his owne hands, and he with great skill ordered his battell, for the number of his souldiours: he himselfe stood in the maine battell with the Hungarians, placing the Transiluanians in the wings. In Ferdinands armie, Valentinus Turacius led the maine battell with the Hungarians vnder Ferdinands ensigne, strengthened on the one side with troupes of horsemen out of STIRIA, and on the other with the horsemen of AVSTRIA. But Paulus Bachitius according to the manner of the Turkish warres (wherewith he was well acquainted) with a companie of light horsemen lay close in ambush in a conuenient place for that purpose, a good distance off, against the left wing of the enemies armie, readie as occasion should serue to take his most aduantage. It was not greatly needfull for the captaines to vse any persuasions to encourage their souldiours, readie enough of themselves to fight. The great ordinance once discharged, the armies came fast on and joynd battell, where the wings of both battells fought with diuers fortune. The Stirian horsemen were not able to endure the force of the Transiluanians, but were put to the worse: and on the other side, the left wing of Bodo his armie, consisting for most part of raw and vnexpert souldiours, was by the horsemen of AVSTRIA ouerthrowne. At the same time both the maine battells (being almost all Hungarians) fought with equall courage, and that so eagerly, as seldome had been seene a more fierce or cruell battell. But by a fresh charge giuen by Ferdinands horsemen, who had now put to flight the right wing of Bodo his battell, all Bodo his armie fighting most valiantly, was disordered and put to flight: Bodo the Generall labouring to restore the battell, and to saue the ensigne to him before by the king deliuered, was by the comming in of Paulus Bachitius with his light horsemen, taken. The other captaines seeing all lost, and past hope of recouerie, betooke themselves to flight: all the kings artillerie and ensignes were taken by the enemy. The king seeing the ouerthrow of his armie, for safeguard of his life fled into POLONIA. Ferdinand his captaines following the course of the victorie, entered into TRANSILVANIA, where the people yeelding themselves at the first, all the whole prouince submitted it selfe vnto the authoritie of Ferdinand. Bodo and the rest of the noble men that were taken prisoners, with the ensignes taken from the enemies, were sent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo hauing his libertie promised, could not be persuaded to renounce his oath giuen to king John, and to beare armes against him, he was by Ferdinand his commaundement cast into a darke dungeon, where shortly after, consumed with sorrow and greefe, he miserably ended his life.

crowning of
Alba Regalis.

Shortly after Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally submitting themselves vnto him) was by their common consent saluted king, and crowned with the same old crowne wherewith king John had been crowned, which the same Perenus (a man of little constancie) brought vnto him; and with him was also crowned Anne his wife, the only sister of the late king Lewes: all which solemne ceremonies were celebrated at ALBA REGALIS, the vsual place for the coronation of the Hungarian kings. Ferdinand by rare felicitie thus possessed of two kingdomes, whereunto he was not borne, returned into BOHEMIA, and left his deputies for the gouernment of the kingdom of HUNGARIE. These were Stephanus Bator, whom hee appointed viceroy, with whom he joynd Paulus bishop of TRIGONIVM, who had also reuolted from king John: and made Berehsaxius secretarie, and Alexius Tursonus a Morauian, treasurer.

King John thus miserably distressed, and thrust out of his kingdome, by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronimus Lasus, a man for his honourable descent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation amongst the Polonians: who glad of so honourable a guest, was more carefull of nothing, than with all possible kindnesse and courtesie how to comfort him, wrapt vp in so many calamities with the losse of his kingdome; he frankly promised vnto him all his owne wealth (which was not small) for the recouerie of his former estate: and that which more was, for the reuiuing of his former felicitie, the vttermost of his wit and deuise, which in the compasing of all great matters was accounted wonderfull. That bountifull entertainment of this poore king by Lasus, was not altogether vnpleasant to Sigismund king of POLONIA, although because he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was joynd in friendship and alliance, he seemed to most men plainly to forget himselfe in shewing so small kindnesse vnto king John, whose sister Barbara he had sometime married: which was the cause that Lasus forgot no point of courtesie in entertaining his guest, and yet the credit of Sigismund with king Ferdinand not toucht. But when

A when they had spent almost a month in consultation and debating of matters too and fro, Lasus accustomed with his deepe wit sharply to reason and aduisedly to determine of most weightie causes, at last rested vpon this one point, That readie helpe in so hard and desperat a case, was onely to be hoped for of the Turkish emperour Solyman: being of opinion, that he being a most mightie prince, and of an honourable disposition, answerable to his greatnesse, would not reject the humble prayers of an oppressed and exiled king; especially, if that being by his mercie and power restored, he could be content for so great a benefite to hold his kingdome, as of the bountie of the Othoman kings. For Lasus saw, that Solyman (so great and prouid an emperour) was not so desirous of kingdomes (whereof he had so many as could not easily be reckoned, then commaunding ouer a great part of the world) as of glorie and renowne, wherewith he vnderstood him to be wonderfully delighted about all other kings of the East; naturally carried away with that windie vanitie. This counsell (as in effect it prooued) was vnto king John wholesome and reasonable, if a man doe but respect the poore estate of a king, so greatly wronged, liuing in exile; but respecting the Christian commonweale, it was vndoubtedly most dangerous and lamentable for one mans particular profit to bring the whole state into most dreadfull and horrible danger: but the sicke minds of worldly men, liuing in small hope of doing well, and at the point of desperation, refuse no worldly remedies, be they neuer so doubtfull or dangerous. And not long after, vpon this resolution with the king, Lasus desirous by noble actions to create the honour of his name, tooke the matter vpon him, and went as embassadour from the exiled king to Solyman to CONSTANTINOPLE. The report was, that Sigismund did not only not stay him, but secretly gaue him his safe conduct with letters of credence, wherein he commended him vnto the Bassaes and other great men in Solymans court, descended of the Polonian blood, as his faithfull and louing subject sent thither vpon an extraordinary and special embassage. Lasus as soone as he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, with wonderfull dexteritie had in short time wooon the fauour, not of the Bassaes only, but of the other courtiers also; presenting them with such gifts as might for the finenesse and rarenesse thereof, rather than for the value (as he thought) be most acceptable and pleasing to their wiues: for amongst that barbarous and corrupted people nothing is better welcome than gifts, whether they proceed of simple good will, or other respect, is no great difference. Amongst the great Bassaes at that time of greatest power and authoritie, was Lustebius, or rather Lutis, who had married Solymans sister; and Abraham borne at PARGA, a base village in ACARNANIA, brought vp in the court from his childhood with Solyman: he was then visier or cheefe of the Bassaes, and keeper of the emperours seale, and was by his office to subscribe all such graunts or letters as passed from the emperour: by which his great place, and the special fauour he had with Solyman, he in magnificence power and authoritie farre exceeded all the rest of the Bassaes, doing whatsoeuer pleased himselfe; and that with such souerainetie and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly said, he was the commaunder of his thoughts. Lasus thus insinuated into the court, and oftentimes talking with the Bassaes without an interpretour, for that hee could well speake the Sclauonian tongue, (the familiar speech of the Turkish courtiers) earnestly solicited the kings cause, wonderfully commending him: for at his first comming after he had saluted Solyman, and was about to haue declared the cause of his comming, he was after the manner of the Turkish court turned ouer to the Bassaes: for Solyman vsed not to admit any Christian to talke with him in his court. Lasus the Bassaes: by the Bassaes, That king John wrongfully thrust out of his kingdome by request of Solyman, by the Bassaes, and the treason of certaine of the Hungarians, might by the Turkish power be againe restored vnto the kingdome of HUNGARIE, which he would hold by homage of the Turkish emperour, as of right belonging vnto him, since the time that Solyman with victorious hand reuenging his wrongs and subduing his enemies, had by law of armes (fortune so judging) gained the same. Promising that king John, who for his worthinesse was by the generall good liking of the Hungarians lawfully chosen to be their king, and so after the auncient manner of that kingdome crowned; if he were now receiued into Solymans protection and by him restored, should neuer forget so great a benefite, but alwaies most faithfully and thankfully to honour the maiestie of Solyman, paying him such yearly tribute as it should please him to impose, and to make it knowne to all men that he was his vassalle. VVhich thing if it would please him to grant, it should be no lesse honour and glorie to Solyman himselfe, than profitable and comfortable vnto the distressed king. dishonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike people by nature, to refuse battell being offered by the enemy. Amongst the cheefest in the kings armie, Ferentius Bodo, an old captain of great experience and courage was cheefe, to whom the king deliuered his ensigne with his owne hands, and he with great skill ordered his battell, for the number of his souldiours: he himselfe stood in the maine battell with the Hungarians, placing the Transiluanians in the wings. In Ferdinands armie, Valentinus Turacus led the maine battell with the Hungarians vnder Ferdinands ensigne, strengthened on the one side with troupes of horsemen out of STIRIA, and on the other with the horsemen of AVSTRIA. But Paulus Bachitius according to the manner of the Turkish warres (wherewith he was well acquainted) with a companie of light horsemen lay close in ambush in a conuenient place for that purpose, a good distance off, against the left wing of the enemies armie, readie as occasion should serue to take his most aduantage. It was not greatly needfull for the captaines to vse any persuasions to encourage their souldiours, readie ynough of themselves to fight. The great ordinance once discharged, the armies came fast on and joynd battell, where the wings of both battells fought with diuers fortune. The Stirian horsemen were not able to endure the force of the Transiluanians, but were put to the worse: and on the other side, the left wing of Bodo his armie, consisting for most part of raw and vnexperiend souldiours, was by the horsemen of AVSTRIA ouerthrowne. At the same time both the maine battells (being almost all Hungarians) fought with equall courage, and that so eagerly, as seldom had been seene a more fierce or cruell battell. But by a fresh charge giuen by Ferdinands horsemen, who had now put to flight the right wing of Bodo his battell, all Bodo his armie fighting most valiantly, was disordered and put to flight: Bodo the Generall labouring to restore the battell, and to saue the ensigne to him before by the king deliuered, was by the comming in of Paulus Bachitius with his light horsemen, taken. The other captaines seeing all lost, and past hope of recouerie, betooke themselves to flight: all the kings artillerie and ensignes were taken by the enemy. The king seeing the ouerthrow of his armie, for safegard of his life fled into POLONIA. Ferdinand his captaines following the course of the victorie, entered into TRANSILVANIA, where the people yeelding themselves at the first, all the whole prouince submitted it selfe vnto the authoritie of Ferdinand. Bodo and the rest of the noble men that were taken prisoners, with the ensignes taken from the enemies, were sent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo hauing his libertie promised, could not be persuaded to renounce his oath giuen to king John, and to beare armes against him, he was by Ferdinand his commaundement cast into a darke dungeon, where shortly after, consumed with sorrow and griefe, he miserably ended his life.

Ferdinand crowning king of Hungarie
at Alba Regalis.

Shortly after Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally submitting themselves vnto him) was by their common consent saluted king, and crowned with the same old crowne wherewith king John had been crowned, which the same Perennis (a man of little constancie) brought vnto him; and with him was also crowned Anne his wife, the only sister of the late king Lewes: all which solemne ceremonies were celebrated at ALBA REGALIS, the vsuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian kings. Ferdinand by rare felicitie thus possessed of two kingdomes, wherunto he was not borne, returned into BOHEMIA, and left his deputies for the gouernment of the kingdome of HUNGARIE. These were Stephanus Bator, whom hee appointed viceroy, with whom he joynd Paulus bishop of STRIGONIUM, who had also revolted from king John: and he made Berethsaxius secretarie, and Alexius Tursonus a Moravian, treasurer.

King John thus miserably distressed, and thrust out of his kingdome, by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronymus Lasus, a man for his honourable descent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation amongst the Polonians: who glad of so honourable a guest, was more carefull of nothing, than with all possible kindnesse and courtesie how to comfort him, wrapt vp in so many calamities with the losse of his kingdome: he frankly promised vnto him all his owne wealth (which was not small) for the recouerie of his former estate: and that which more was, for the reuiuing of his former felicitie, the vttermost of his wit and deuise, which in the compasing of all great matters was accounted wonderfull. That bountifull entertainment of this poore king by Lasus, was not altogether vnpleasant to Sigismund king of POLONIA, although because he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was joynd in friendship and alliance, he seemed to most men plainly to forget himselfe in shewing so small kindnesse vnto king John, whose sister Barbara he had sometime married: which was the cause that Lasus forgot no point of courtesie in entertaining his guest, and yet the credit of Sigismund with king Ferdinand not toucht. But when

A when they had spent almost a month in consultation and debating of matters too and fro, Lasus accustomed with his deepe wit sharply to reason and aduisedly to determine of most weightie causes, at last rested vpon this one point, That readie helpe in so hard and desperat a case; was onely to be hoped for of the Turkish emperour Solyman: being of opinion, that he being a most mightie prince, and of an honourable disposition, answerable to his greatnesse, would not reject the humble prayers of an oppressed and exiled king; especially, if that being by his mercie and power restored, he could be content for so great a benefit to hold his kingdome, as of the bountie of the Othoman kings. For Lasus saw, that Solyman (so great and prouid an emperour) was not so desirous of kingdomes (wherof he had so many as could not easily bee reckoned, then commaunding ouer a great part of the world) as of glorie and renowne, wherewith he vnderstood him to be wonderfully delighted aboute all other kings of the East; naturally carried away with that windie vanitie. This counsell (as in effect it prooued) was vnto king John wholesome and reasonable, if a man doe but respect the poore estate of a king, so greatly wronged, lying in exile; but respecting the Christian commonweale, it was vndoubtedly most dangerous and lamentable for one mans particular profit to bring the whole state into most dreadfull and horrible danger: but the sicke minds of worldly men, living in small hope of doing well, and at the point of desperation, refuse no worldly remedies, be they neuer so doubtfull or dangerous. And not long after, vpon this resolution with the king, Lasus desirous by noble actions to increase the honour of his name, tooke the matter vpon him, and went as embassadour from the exiled king to Solyman to CONSTANTINOPLE. The report was, that Sigismund did not only not stay him, but secretly gaue him his safe conduct with letters of credence, wherein he commended him vnto the Bassaes and other great men in Solymans court, descended of the Polonian blood, as his faithfull and louing subject sent thither vpon an extraordinarie and speciall embassage. Lasus as soone as he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, with wonderfull dexteritie had in short time wooon the fauour, not of the Bassaes only, but of the other courtiers also; presenting them with such gifts as might for the finenesse and rarenesse thereof, rather than for the value (as he thought) be most acceptable and pleasing to their wiues: for amongst that barbarous and corrupted people nothing is better welcome than gifts, whether they proceed of simple good will, or other respect, is no great difference. Amongst the great Bassaes at that time of greatest power and authoritie, was Lustebius, or rather Lutis, who had married Solymans sister; and Abraham Bassa, borne at PARGA, a base village in ACARNANIA, brought vp in the court from his childhood with Solyman: he was then viceroy or cheefe of the Bassaes, and keeper of the emperors scale, and was by his office to subscribe all such graunts or letters as passed from the emperour: by which his great place, and the speciall fauour he had with Solyman, he in magnificence power and authoritie farre exceeded all the rest of the Bassaes, doing whatsoeuer pleased himselfe; and that with such soueraignie and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly said, he was the commaunder of his thoughts. Lasus thus insinuated into the court, and oftentimes talking with the Bassaes without an interpretour, for that hee could well speake the Sclauonian tongue, (the familiar speech of the Turkish courtiers) earnestly solicited the kings cause, wonderfully commending him: for at his first comming after he had saluted Solyman, and was about to haue declared the cause of his comming, he was after the manner of the Turkish court turned ouer to the Bassaes: for Solyman vsed not to admit any Christian to talke with him in his court. Lasus requested of Solyman, by the Bassaes, That king John wrongfully thrust out of his kingdome by Ferdinand duke of AVSTRIA, and the treason of certaine of the Hungarians, might by the Turkish power be againe restored vnto the kingdome of HUNGARIE, which he would hold by homage of the Turkish emperour, as of right belonging vnto him, since the time that Solyman with victorious hand reuenging his wrongs and subduing his enemies, had by law of armes (fortune so judging) gained the same. rather for giuing than receiuing: it was easie to be seene, how greatly it did concerne the profit of the Othoman kings to be neighboured with a weake and tributarie king, rather than with Ferdinand, a prince of great power, lately chosen king of BONEMIA, supported by the strength of his brother Charles the emperor, commaunding ouer the warlike nation of the Germanes; which was as much difference as was betwixt the maintenance of a continuall heauie warre vpon his borders, and the safe enjoying of a most assured peace. Beside that, it concerned the Turks to be ware, that such things as they had got by the sword, they should also by the sword defend; and not to suffer any one to grow greater than the rest in riches and power. For it might so fall out, that Charles, growne to be a prince of mightie power, might draw the rest of the Christian princes to joyne with him in the common cause of the Christian religion, and in that quarrell, as the Christian kings of EVROPE had in former time done, with vnited forces to seeke to recouer againe what they had before lost: whose force it would be hard to withstand. These things being sharply deliuered, and by the Bassas againe reported to Solyman, who standing at a secret window, had before heard them as they were by Lascus vnto the Bassas declared; it was no great labour to persuaide the Turkish emperor, of himselfe desirous of glorie and soueraignetie, againe to yndertake the Hungarian warre, and to graunt king John his request, promising according to the successe of the victorie, to giue him that he desired, so that he would faithfully performe what he had promised, and not shew himselfe therefore vnthankfull.

Solyman graunteth
request.

In the meane time, Ferdinand vpon great reason thinking it necessarie by all meanes possible to confirme himselfe in possession of the kingdome of HUNGARIE: and fearing no force but the Turks, determined to proue Solymans disposition, and to seeke for his friendship; hoping by reasonable meanes to compasse it, by shewing vnto the barbarous prince (not altogether abhorring from the commendation of justice) his antient title and claime, and that he was by the antient lawes of the countrey right heire thereof: thinking that Solyman hauing obtained so many victories, and ruling ouer so many kingdomes, would now at length giue himselfe to peace, as a man contented with his glorie already gotten. His desire was, to be receiued into his friendship, and to joine with him in league vpon the same conditions which Ladislaus and his son Leues had for certaine yeares before obtained of the Othoman kings, and Sigismund king of POLONIA then also with like quietnesse enjoyed. Wherefore hauing found out a fit man, whom he might send vpon this embassage to CONSTANTINOPLE, one Ioannes Oberdanfscus, a Hungarian, he furnished him accordingly, and gaue him gifts, such as hee thought good to bestow vpon the great Bassas. But when Oberdanfscus was come vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, he found Solyman harder to be entreated than he had before hoped, and the Bassas altogether vnwilling to heare of any league: for although he was courteously receiued of Solyman, and most patiently heard, whilst he both eloquently and discreetly before the great Bassas, deliuered his embassage; yet in the shutting vp of all, he receiued no more but a proud and insolent answer: for Solyman said, it was farre from the manner of his auncestors, to receiue them into grace and fauour which had done iniurie vnto the Othoman name: wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to invade another mans kingdome, and to thinke to hold it to himselfe: for as much as his old title and claime which he stood so much vpon, was altogether extinguished and lost by law of arms, by his late victorie against king Lewes: for which causes hee adjudged him vnworthie of his friendship and fauour, purposing sharply to reuenge the wrong he had receiued, and proclaiming warre to come againe into HUNGARIE with such a power as should be sufficient to invade Ferdinand either in AVSTRIA or GERMANIE. Wherefore in stead of friendship and league, he denounced vnto him all the calamities of warre: and so commaunded the embassage with speed to depart from CONSTANTINOPLE. But Oberdanfscus when hee was come backe againe as farre as VIENNA, and had there told the kings lieutenants, of the threatening words of Solyman, and that he would shortly come thither with his armie, he was not of any of them beleecued, but reputed for a vaine man. Wherefore to shun the hatred of them which mistooke truth for falshood, he made hast to come vnto Ferdinand, who was then at SPICES, labouring for voices to further his sute, for that at the next assemblie of the states of the empire, which was then at hand for the coronation of his brother Charles, he himselfe as he well hoped was to be chosen king of the Romanes. The newes brought by Oberdanfscus, did not a little trouble king Ferdinand, foreseeing as it were what would happen: for that the Turkish tyrant vsed not lightly to breake such promises, but to performe them to the vttermost: and that more increased his care, he knew he should come in euill time to craue helpe of the Germanies, for the defence of his kingdome in HUNGARIE against so mightie an enemy, especially his brother Charles the emperor being busied in his warres in ITALIE, and he himselfe wanting money, the only meanes to raise an armie to withstand the Turke. The Spring now come, and all things fresh and greene; Solyman altering nothing of his former determination, hauing leuied an armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand men, set forward from HADRIANOPLE, his European horsemen going before him conducted by Abraham the great Bassa and Achomates, Michael-oglu Generall of the Acanziz or voluntarie horsemen: and his Asian souldiours led by Becrambeus Bassa following after him: he himselfe with his Ianizaries and souldiours of the court keeping in the middle. And marching on this sort came in fiftene daies to BELGRADE, where king John accompanied with Lascus and such of the Hungarian nobilitie as tooke his part, came vnto him, of purpose to make himselfe knowne vnto him which was to protect him; and doing him all the honour he possibly could, to request him to proceed to reuenge his quarrell. Solyman with graue and yet friendly countenance, raising himselfe a little from the cushion wheron he sat, gaue him his right hand, protesting, That nothing could happen vnto him better, or that he more desired of God, than to be able to relieue distressed princes, especially such as were wrongfully oppressed by his enemies: wherefore he willed him to be of good comfort, promising of his bountie frankly to bestow vpon him whatsoever he should in that warre win with the sword from the enemy. King John obtained this rare fauour of Solyman by the earnest mediation of Abraham the commaunding Bassa; whom he had before at CONSTANTINOPLE by his embassage Lascus so wooen with gifts and requests, that he thorowly tooke vpon him the defence of the kings cause: wherein Lascus was especially holpen by Aloysius Grittus the Duke of VENICE his sonne, who then followed the Turkes campe, and was for his fathers sake and the great sufficiencie he held himselfe, had in great reputation amongst the Turkes; and in such fauor with Abraham who did all in all with Solyman, that he could persuaide him to any thing he would. For this Aloysius Grittus, borne and brought vp in CONSTANTINOPLE, and wonderfull eloquent in the Turkish tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himselfe, and the great port he kept in his house, so thorowly possessed Abraham (that all commanded) that he would manie times bring Solyman himselfe ouer the hauen to PERRA, to solace himselfe in Grittus his pleasant gardens and banquetting houses, which he had there most sumptuously made after the Italian manner: whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chiefe man in receiuing of the Turkes customes.

Solyman enureth
Buda without resistance and besiegeth the castles

The same of Solymans comming directly from BELGRADE to BUDA, so terrified the citifens of BUDA, that they almost all forsooke the citie and fled vnto other places further off, some to STRIGONIVM, some to ALBA REGALIS, some to POSSONIVM: so that at his first comming he entred the citie (almost desolate) without any resistance: the castle holden by a garrison of Germanes, he commaunded to be besieged. The captaine of the castle was one Thomas Nagas, a man of great account among the Hungarians, both for the honour of his house and his qualities answerable to the same, graced with singular learning: He perceiuing his souldiours dismaied with the sight of so great an armie and willing to surrender vp the castle, (as be seemed a valiant captaine) forbade his souldiours to haue any talke with the enemy, commanded the great artillerie to be bent and discharged vpon the Turkes: and seeing his souldiours slacke and timorous, reproved them of cowardise and treason, threatening them with shamefull death if they did not hold out the siege to the vttermost, and shew themselves valiant men, both for the honour of their countrey, and of king Ferdinand whose pay they receiued, and of whose bountie they were to expect rewards and preferments answerable to their deserts. But they misdoubting by the running too and fro of the Turks, that the castle was vndermined; and smelling, or at least wise imagining themselves to smell the sent of the gunpowder, which they supposed to be in the mine, and doubting to be presently blowne vp; were stricke with such a sudden feare, that neither the feare of future punishment, neither the shame of so foule a fact, nor the reuerence of so worthie a captaine could stay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliuer vp the castle: which when they could by no meanes persuaide the resolute captaine to consent vnto, but that he still with sterne countenance exclaimed against their cowardise and treason, they laid hands vpon him, and bound him hand and foot, and so presently concluded with the enemy to yeeld vnto him the castle, so that they might in safetie depart thence with bag and baggage: which their request request Solyman granted. But when the garrison souldiours (in number about seauen hundred) were about to depart with their baggage towards POSSONIVM, as was before agreed; and the Ianizaries comming into the castle, hauing loosed the capitaine, were about to let him go also: Solyman aduertised of the treacherie of the garrison souldiours, and of the fidelitie of the captain, changing his mind, judged such villanous minded men vnworthie of his mercie, and in detestation of their perfidious dealing with their capitaine, gaue them all to his Ianizaries to be slaine: but to the capitaine himselfe he offered honourable entertainment, which when he refused, Solyman courteously sent him away; holpen therein by the commendation of king Iohn, although his sister was married to Stephanus Maylat his deadly enemy. Which bloudie execution done by the commaundement of the cruell tyrant, the Turkes said was not onely lawfully done, but also to the immortall glorie of his name in the execution of justice: which might peraduenture seeme reasonable, if the perpetuall hatred of that most barbarous nation against the Christians gaue not just occasion of suspect, that it proceeded rather of their auncient malice than of any regard of justice. For why should the Germans, who had offended to his great good, and therefore obtained his safe conduct, be thought worthe of so cruell death? when as Solyman himselfe in punishing the perjurie of another, ran into wilfull perjurie himselfe; peruerting the commendation of justice which he so much desired, by his most bloudie and vnjust sentence.

BUDA the chiefe citie of HUNGARIE thus taken by Solyman, he resolved forthwith to besiege VIENNA the chiefe citie of AVSTRIA: in good hope, that by the carriage away of that, the other cities of lesse strength both of HUNGARIE and AVSTRIA would without any resistance be yielded vnto him. Wherefore he sent before him Achomates with the voluntarie horsemen, who according to the manner of the Turkish warres, running thorow the heart of HUNGARIE, and entering with fire and sword into AVSTRIA, passed by VIENNA, miserably burning and destroying the countrey before him as farre as LYNTZ. The poore people not knowing where to hide themselves from the furie of their enemies, nor of whom to craue helpe, fled as men and women dismaied, carrying with them their beloued children, the vnfortunat pledges of their loue, and what else they could, as things saued out of the midst of the fire. For whatsoeuer fell into the enemies hand, was lost without recure: the old men were slaine, the young men led away into captiuitie, women rauished before their husbands faces, and afterwards slaine with their children, young infants were ript out of their mothers wombs, and otherwise taken from their breasts were cut in pieces, or else thrust vpon sharpe stakes, yielding vp againe that breath which they had but a little before receiued; with many other incredible cruelties, which were then by the mercilesse enemy committed. Solyman himselfe shortly after followed these forerunners, and setting forward with all his armie from BUDA towards VIENNA; by the way tooke the castle of ALTENBURGE, whether by force or composition, is diuersly reported: of the garrison souldiours there placed by king Ferdinand, he reserved three hundred Bohemians, whom he commaunded to follow his campe. He also assaulted the little citie of NEAPODIS seauen times in one day, and was as often repulsed: but being loath to spend any longer time about a towne of so small importance, he forooke that, and held on his way to VIENNA; whether he came about the six and twentieth day of September, and encamped in fiue places round about the citie, with such a world of people, that vnto them which viewed his campe from the highest tower in VIENNA, it seemed that the ground was for the space of eight miles all couered with the multitude of his tents and people. King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his embassador Oberdanscus receiued the hard answer from Solyman, alwaies stood in doubt of his comming; had beside his owne forces (which were not great to oppose against so mightie an enemy) craued aid of the Christian princes his neighbours; especially of the princes of the empire: who granting him aid against the common enemy, appointed Fredericke countie Palatine of RHEINE and duke of BAVARIA, Generall of their forces. But whilest the Germans after their manner, slowly set forward, and made lesse hast than the greatnesse of the present danger required; Solyman comming in the meane time, had so belaid the citie, that it was not possible for the duke Frederick by any meanes to get into it, but was glad to stay with his army at CHREMS about twelue miles from VIENNA. A few daies before by good hap, vpon the report of the losse of BUDA, twentie thousand souldiours horsemen and foot out of diuers countreys, were in good time come to VIENNA: amongst these, the cheefe commaunders was Philip the Paulgraue, duke Fredericks nephew (a young gentleman of great courage and hope,

A sent thither but a little before with a few companies of horsemen and footmen, by Fredericke his vnle, who was comming after with a greater power himselfe, but was now shut out of the citie by Solyman) Nicholaus countie of SALMA, the L. William Rogendorff steward of the kings household, Ioannes Caxianer, a noble man of CROATIA; and afterwards gouernour of VIENNA: and next vnto them Nicholaus Turrianus, Ioannes Hardetus, Leonardus Pelsius, Hector Ramfak, men both for their birth and valour of great account amongst the Germans: The citie of VIENNA as it was of some good strength toward the North, by reason of Danubius, so in other places it was at that time neither by art nor nature strong. The ditches, such as they were, were altogether drie, and easie to be passed ouer: the wals of bricke, built round without any flankers, and neither high nor thicke, but after the auncient simple manner of fortification of cities: for before that time neither had king Ferdinand, fearing no enemy, neither they of VIENNA who had not of many yeares seene an enemy, had any care to fortifie the citie: but as men altogether buried in securitie, and nothing fearing the comming of so mightie an enemy, (although they were thereof before admonished by Oberdanscus) had not so much as cast vp any rampier or bulwarke, more than at the gate of CABINTIA, whereon they might conveniently place their great Ordinance: so that of a hundred great peeces, and three hundred others of lesse charge, which might haue wonderfully annoyed the enemy, a great part serued to no vse, for want of convenient place to mount them vpon. Yet as the suddain comming of the enemy and the shortnesse of the time gaue leaue, such bulwarkes as they could vpon the suddaine, they cast vp, and plahted their ordinance thereon. The citie was diuided into diuers quarters, and to euery part a strong garrison appoynted for defence thereof, all the gates of the citie were mured vp, except such as were of purpose reserved for sallie out at. Now had Abraham the great Bassa encamped himselfe vpon a high hill, where stood a ruinous castle, from whence he might ouerlooke all the citie, yet so, as that he lay out of the danger of gunshot. Becrambeus, Solymans great commander in ASIA, lay at the gate called PVRGATORIA, neere the church of S. Vladerich. In the third campe towards the rising of the hils, lay Michael Ogli, towards the church of S. Vitus. At the Scottish gate towards Danubius, lay the Alapi, with diuers companies of the Ianizaries: which with shot out of their trenches, suffered no man to appeare vpon the wals into the citie, as if they had fallen out of the clouds; that hardly could any man stirre in the citie vnarmed, but he was forthwith wounded. Solyman himselfe lay neere vnto S. Markes church, compassed about with the Ianizaries and other souldiours of the court, defended also with the bricke wals of the gardens thereabouts. Whilest the Turkes were thus encamping themselves, the Christian defendants oftentimes fortunatly sallied out vpon them, and slew many of them. In one of which sallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant capitaine, with certaine old souldiours of the Spaniards was slaine, fighting most valiantly at the gates of the castle: and in another skirmish Christophorus Zetlitz a man of great courage, sallying out of the citie with fiue hundred horsemen, euen vnto the enemies trenches, was intercepted and taken with six of his fellows vpon him; who were all compelled by the Turkes to carrie so many heads of their slaine fellowes vpon poles, and so presented vnto Solyman: of whom he enquired many things as well concerning Ferdinand himselfe, and where he was, as concerning the princes which had the charge of the citie, whether they were in hope to defend the same against his mightie power or not. Whereunto Christophorus aptly and wisely answered, although not altogether so truly, That king Ferdinand lay not farre off at the citie of LYNTZ, expecting the assembly of a great armie: and that the princes of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, MORAVIA, and of diuers other places were comming vnto him, with great aid; so that if he would but stay a little vntill his forces were come together, he should then see whether of them were of greater strength and power: for as much as it would not be long before the king would come and giue him battell. As for the princes in the citie, he said he knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the souldiours from the highest to the lowest, had solemnely sworne to defend the citie, and not to giue it ouer vnto the last man, reposing their hope not in the wals and fortresses thereof, but in their weapons and valour, being men of great resolution, and not easily to be vanquished or discouraged. With which answer although Solyman was a little moued, yet dissembling his present heat, said, he had heretofore made warre against diuers nations, and alwaies had the victorie, whereof he doubted not now also: But as for him, and the others taken with him, they knew they were in his power to saue saue or kill at his pleasure: Yet to make them know that he could shew mercie vnto his vanquished enemies, he frankly graunted them their liues and libertie: charging them, that after they were againe returned into the citie, they should in his name with the defendants of themselves to yeeld vp the citie, which it was impossible for them long to defend against his mightie power, which neither the strong citie of BELGRADE, nor the famous citie of the RHODES were able to withstand; and to accept of such reasonable conditions as he should graunt vnto them, promising, that amongst other things proceeding of his infinit bountie, hee would take order, that they should in safetie depart thence with bag and baggage: in which doing they should well prouide for the safetie of themselves and of their goods by flying vnto his mercie in time, before the furie of the warre was growne to further extremitie: all which it would be too late to expect after the victorie, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruell death, murder, and miserable destruction. Wherefore it were good for them well to consider of the matter, and not foolishly to refuse that was now frankly offered them of mercie, which they should not afterwards obtaine with any prayers or teares: for why, he was resolutely set downe (as he said) not to depart thence before he had taken the citie. When he had thus schooled them, he gaue vnto euery one of them three Hungarian duckats, and so sent them away. They being receiued into the citie with great joy, made relation vnto the princes and great capitaines of all the threatening and proud speeches of the Turkish tyrant; which they tooke in such disdain, that they would not vouchsafe to returne him any answer. Solyman not a little displeased, that his great words were so lightly regarded, by way of derision sent word vnto the citie, That if they wanted helpe, he would send them the three hundred Bohemians, whom he tooke in the castle of ALTENBURG: to whom answer was returned by them of the citie, That they needed no helpe from him, wherefore he might dispose of his prisoners as he thought good. By this, Solyman perceiued, that VIENNA was not to be won with words, nor the defendants to be discouraged with great looks: wherefore he began to vse his force, and with such ordinance as he had brought with him, to batter the wals: which because it was not great, but fitter for seruice in field than for batterie, did not much more harme than to beat downe the battlements and such little standings, made of timber and boards in manner of galleries, hanging here and there ouer the wall, for the small shot to play out of, a simple deuise in stead of flankers. His great artillerie prouided for batterie was comming vp the riuer of Danubius, which he daily looked for: but by good hap, Wolfgangus Hoder, a forward captain, hearing of the Turks comming vp the riuer, went out of POSSONIVM with certaine small vessels well appointed: and meeting with the Turks, set vpon them with such courage and resolution that he slew many of them, and suncke diuers of their boats and pinnaces, amongst whom were they which were bringing vp Solymans great peeces for batterie to VIENNA: which was there all suncke in the riuer, with the boats that brought it. By this good seruice, Solyman was disappointed of his great artillerie, and the citie deliuered of a great danger. So Wolfgangus hauing made great spoile amongst the Turks, and lost some few men, returned with victorie to POSSONIVM. Yet another part of the Turkes fleet comming vp to VIENNA, at the first comming brake downe all the bridges: for a little about the citie, the riuer of Danubius deuiding his channell, maketh diuers Islands, which by sundrie bridges are joyned together, ouer which lieth the way from AUSTRIA vnto the citie. This fleet so kept the passage, that no man could without danger either by water or by land goe in or out of the citie. Solyman hauing lost all his peeces for batterie, and seeing how little he preuailed with his field peeces, fell to vndermining of the citie, hoping by that meanes to ouerthrow the wals, and to make a way for his men to enter. This worke, as the Turkes cheefe hope, was with wonderfull labour and diligence attempted in fifteene sundrie places: which was not so secretly done, but that it was by drums laied vpon the ground, by bassons filled with water, & sounds made into the earth, perceiued by the defendants; and so with countermines met withall, that most part of those works were vterly frustrated, and in them eight thousand of his Turkes either slaine or buried quicke.

Solyman to baffle the defendants that they should not so perfectly discouer his mines, diuided his armie into foure parts, appointing the orderly to succeed one after another in giuing alarms to the towne, that filling their eares with continuall noise, he might keepe them alwaies occupied. In the midst of which hurly burly his workes in the mines went forward with all speed possible, neither was he in that his expectation deceived: for one of the mines brought to perfection vnperceiued by the defendants, and suddenly blowne vp, shooke and ouerthrew a great part

A part of the wall neere vnto the gate which leadeth towards CARINTHIA; whereat the Turkes gaue a great shout as if the citie had now been taken, and withall courageously stepping forward pressed in on all sides, by the ruines of the wall to haue entered the breach, charging the defendants with their small shot and Turkie arrowes as thicke as haile. uing them with deadly shot and push of pike, in such furious manner, that the Turks for all their multitude, vnable longer to maintaine the assault, began to retire. VVhich thing Solyman perceiuing, sent in new supplies, and so renewed the assault before giuen ouer, but with no better successe than before: for hauing received a great ouerthrow, as men forgetting both duetie and martiall discipline, they retired, not expecting any signe of retreat. At this assault so many of the Turkes were slaine, that the ground neere vnto the towne lay couered, and the ditches filled with their dead bodies. Not long after, the wall was blowne vp in two places more ouer against S. Clares church; by which breach being not verie great, the Turks seeking to haue entred, made a bloudie fight with the Germanes which defended that place, which they fought so desperately to haue entred, that without regard they thrust one another vpon the points of their enemies weapons: who glistering in good armor, readily receiued them being for most part naked men, and slew them without number, and so enforced them againe disorderly to retire, hauing before filled both the breaches with their dead carcasses. Three daies after ensued a most cruell fight, when as another part of the wall (neere vnto the gate of CARINTHIA), and not farre from the first breach) was so suddenly ouerthrowne, that the Turkes thorow the new made breach seeing the Christians as they stood readie to come to the defence thereof; and likewise the Christians them, now approaching; for eagernesse and hast on both sides, threw away their pieces and bowes, and came to handie blowes in the middle of the breach; the Turkes with their scimiters, and the Germanes with their long swords. At which times, as the Christian capitaines encouraged their fouldiours with cheerfull persuasions: so the Turkish Comimaunders enforced forward their Turkes both with words and wounds. The assault began so terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and deadly fight was neuer seene from the beginning of the world: which was with greater resolution maintained by the Turkes, for that many of their most valiant horsemen forsaking their horses; thrust in with their targets and scimiters, or else with their launces amongst the lanizaries and other footmen; and there fought most desperately. At last, after this furious fight had endured by the space of thre houres; and many of the Turkes best capitaines and fouldiours lay dead vpon the ground by heapes; the Turkes seeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the assault, and retired to their campe.
The Turkes the third time retreated.
Long and tedious it were to recount euerie assault giuen during the time of that dreadfull siege, with euerie particuler accident nor worthy the remembrance, which for breuitie I wittingly passe ouer. Yet amongst this rest (the most valiant leader, though afterwards vnfortunat) the Lo. William Rogendorffe is not to be forgotten; who oftentimes perceiuing many of the Turkes stragling disorderly abroad in the country, one day vpon the sudden sallied out vpon them with certaine troups of horsemen, with such violence, that at the first onser he ouerthrew them; and hauing them in chase, did such speedie execution, that of 5300; scarcely 140. escaped his hands: after which time his name became terrible vnto the Turks. Solyman was exceedingly grieved with the often and bloudie assaults by him in vaine giuen to the citie, but purposing now to proue the last and vtermost of all his forces, he called vnto him the chiefe commanders of his armie, whom at the first he sharply reprobued as men of no courage, which being many times as good as in possession of the victorie, had most cowardly contrarie to the manner of that vicious nation, turned their backs vpon their enemies, in the breaches already halfe won. Wherefore he willed them to plucke vp their hearts, and to make all things readie for a new assault, wherein hee expected that they should with courageous forwardnesse and resolution, recompence their late cowardise: for why he accounted it a great dishonour to forsake the siege begun: wherefore they should resolve the next day as victorious conquerors to take the citie, or else there as faint-hearted cowards to end their daies. The next day after this heauie charge giuen, which was the fifteenth of October, the great Commanders of the Turkes armie with all their forces assailed the citie, thrusting their men into the breaches by heapes, as if they would, if no way else, yet with verie multitude (if it had beene possible) haue discouraged or ouerborne the Christians: they were come to handie blowes, and the fight was in euerie place most terrible, ble, the Christian defendants still repulsing the with greater courage than they were able to assault them. Besides that, to the great advantage of the defendants, many pieces of their great ordinance skillfully mounted in places most convenient, and continually discharged amongst the thickest of their enemies as they pressed on, made such slaughter amongst them, and so cut them off, that being thoroughly discouraged, they shrunke backe, and could not by any threats or command of their captaines be thrust forward, chusing rather to be slaine of their owne captaines (as some of them were) than to be rent in sunder with the murdering shot of the Christians. So that the captaines seeing now no other remedie, gave over the assault and retired, leaving behind them many thousands of their dead Turkes in the towne ditches.

The next day after this assault, Solyman despairing to win the citie, and fearing the coming of king Ferdinand and the countie Palatine with a strong armie, as it had been to him reported, considering also that Wint was now coming fast on, determined to raise his siege: and to colour the dishonour thereof, he sent certaine of the chiefe prisoners which he had taken, richly apparelled with their purses full of money into the citie, to tell the captaines that he came not with purpose either to besiege or take the citie, but to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by his enemy king Ferdinand, and to haue fought a battell with him for the kingdome of HUNGARIE: whom for as much as he could not draw vnto VIENNA, he would remoue thence to seeke for him, as his capitall enemy: Wherefore they should doe well to yeeld themselves, which if they would, he promised not to enter their citie, but to receiue both the citizens and souldiours into his protection, reseruing vnto them their liues and goods with perpetuall freedome. Which he offer the defendants scornfully refused as proceeding of meeke desperation. The next night following Solyman with more than barbarous crueltie, caused all the prisoners in his armie to be slaine, which pitifull outcries was of the souldiours heard into the citie, not knowing what the matter should be, vntill that the next day after the departure of the enemy they found the dead bodies of men, women, and children in all places of the campe wallowed in their one blood, a most lamentable spectacle to behold. Solyman purposing to forsake the siege, caused Abraham the great Bassa to shew himselfe in order of battell, as if he would haue giuen a fresh assault: in the meane time he himselfe rose vpon the sudden with the rest of his armie, and returned towards BUDA in such hast, that he neither put any garrison into such places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any tribute. After whom the Bassa followed, keeping himselfe a daies journey behind him: and so in fise daies he arrived with all his armie at BUDA, 32 Germane K miles from VIENNA.

This siege was giuen over by Solyman about the sixteenth of October, wherein he is reported to haue lost eightie thousand men, amongst whom was his great lieutenant of ASIA, with many other of his forward captaines and best souldiours. Of the defendants few or none of name were lost, but of the countrey people it is supposed that there was about sixtie thousand slaine, and carried away into captiuitie: all the countrey about VIENNA was miserably spoiled, all their trees and vines being by the Turkes cut downe to the ground. Solyman according to his promise, restored BUDA vnto king John, who by solempne writing acknowledged himselfe his vassalle, and to hold the kingdome of HUNGARIE of him as his lord and soueraigne: Vnto him Solyman joyned Aloysius Grittius as his legat, to helpe him to prouide such things as should be needfull for the defence of that kingdome.

It happened one day whilst Solyman lay at BUDA, and had giuen king John with diuers of the nobilitie of HUNGARIE access into his pavilion, that he fell earnestly in hand with king John to pardon Paulus bishop of STRIGONIVM, and Petrus Beremus, who had taken part with king Ferdinand, and to receiue them into his former fauour: which men king John could in no case like of, because that they as traitors vnto their prince and countrey, forgetting their faith and oath, had performed the like dutie vnto Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done vnto him at the time of his coronation: wherein he shewing himselfe vnwilling to be entreated, said: That their mutable minds fraught with infidelitie, would neuer containe themselves within the bounds of loyalty, but find occasion to commit some fouler treason than they had before: whereunto Solyman (raising his voice a little as one somewhat moued, most honourably replied: Can any thing (said he) happen vnto thee in this life better or more honourable, than if by thy kindnesse shine enemies shall be of all men accounted ingratefull, that is to say, men noted with eternall infamie: when as in thy selfe the commendation of a good and courteous prince shall for ever remaine? And so not long

A long after fearing the cold of *Wint*er then approaching; dangerous for his beasts for carriage, especially his camels bred and brought vp in the heat countries of ASIA, he set forward to BELGRADE, and so travelling through THRACIA returned to CONSTANTINOPLE.

All this while that Solyman thus raged in HUNGARIE and AVSTRIA, Charles the emperor lately reconciled to Clement the seauenth of that name; then bishop of ROME, with a strong armie besieged FLORENCE, by his lieutenant Daualus (who might haue done much against the Turkes, if he had been so well imployed) labouring by all meanes to repress the libertie of the citizens, whereunto they had but a little before aspired, and to bring them againe vnder the subjection of the family of Medices, whereof Clement was the chiefe. Which thing with much adoe he brought to passe, inuelling Alexander the bishops nephew in the dukedome of FLORENCE, and afterward giuing him his base daughter in marriage; forgetting his brother Ferdinand in the meane time, thrust out of the kingdome of HUNGARIE by Solyman, and the dukedome of AVSTRIA wasted by the Turkes, with the citie of VIENNA in danger to haue been lost. Which common calamities might well haue moued both the emperor and the bishop, to haue had more regard of, than by oppressing the libertie of one free citie to seeke how to serue their owne priuie respects.

The yeate following, which was 1530; Solyman with great solemnitie and triumph, after the Turkish manner, circumcised three of his sonnes, Mustapha, Muhamet, and Selymus; at CONSTANTINOPLE.

Solyman hardly digesting the dishonour he had before receiued at VIENNA, and oftentimes solicited by king John for aid against Ferdinand, who with greater stomacke than power ceased not continually to molest him: but most of all pricke forward with the insatiable desire of enlarging his empire, after the manner of the Othoman kings, accounting his neighbour princes alwaies his enemies, and their dominions the objects of his victories, and spoile for his souldiours; raised such an armie as for the greatnesse thereof might worthely haue bene a terrour vnto the world: Not so much purposing the protection of king John, which he in shew most pretended; neither the siege of VIENNA, as was commonly bruted; as the conquering of AVSTRIA, CARINTHIA, CROATIA, STIRIA and the rest of king Ferdinands dominions, and so afterwards of all GERMANIE. For the accomplishment whereof, he had in his immoderate desires refined vnto himselfe the space of three yeares, which the great monarchs of ROME could not performe in more than so many hundreds: It was commonly reported that the proud tyrant would manie times say, That whatsoever belonged vnto the empire of ROME, was of right his, for as much as he was rightfully possessed both of the imperiall seat & scepter of Constantine the great Commander of the world, which his great grandfather Mahomet had by law of armes woon from Constantine the late Christian emperor, whom he slew at CONSTANTINOPLE. And therefore both in his common talke and writings, as oft as hee had occasion to make any mention of Charles the emperor, he would proudly and as it were in disdain teame him by the name of the king of Spaine, but neuer by the name of emperor.

The discord of the Christian princes, and the great troubles euen then arising in GERMANIE about matters of religion, did not a little encourage the barbarous tyrant to take in hand this great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly aduertised that Solyman was in person himselfe setting forward with his huge armie, sent vnto him three embassadours; whereof Leonardus Ne-garola a noble gentleman, well learned, and skillfull in diuers languages, was chiefe, with rich presents and reasonable offers to intreat with him for peace. Who meeting him vpon the borders of SARVIA, were by him courteously receiued, and patiently heard: yet obtained of him no other answer, but that they should follow his campe, and attend his further pleasure. The report whereof brought a generall feare vpon all GERMANIE, but especially them of AVSTRIA, in whose fresh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding wounds of their countrey, their brethren and friends slaine, their wiues and children led away into captiuitie, their goods and cattell lost, their houses and fields burnt, and thousands of other grievous calamities which they had endured in the late inuasion of the Turkes. Charles the emperor had in verie good time (a little before) for a while well appeased the discention then arising in GERMANIE about matters of religion, putting them in hope of a free and generall Counsell to be holden for the deciding of all such matters: and in a great assembly of the states of the empire holden at RATISBON, shewing the greatnesse of the imminent danger, so puissant an enemy threatening vnto them all the calamities calamities of warre, with the manifold mischeefes like to ensue, if they should in so vnshort time fall at variance amongst themselves: offering with great resolution to goe in person himselfe with all his old expert souldiours in defence of the common Christiani cause, so much preuailed with the princes of the empire, and the embassadours of the free estates, that they highly commended his forwardnesse; and all other matters for that time set apart, agreed all with one consent at a prefixed day to send vnto VIENNA such warlike forces as they had in any time before set forth, for the defence of the Christian religion, and the maiestie of the empire. Whereupon he wrote vnto Alphonſus Vaſius (his lieutenant Generall in ITALIE, and one of the greatest captaines of that age) that he should without delay call together the old captaines, and to leuie so many companies of harquebussiers as they possibly could; and with them and the Spanishe souldiours to repaire forthwith vnto him into AVSTRIA. He also enjoined Andreas Awis, his admirall, that hee should with like diligence rig vp a strong fleet of gallies and marchants ships, and to goe against the Turkes nauie into GRACIA. At the same time he sent for his choise horsemen out of BYRGVNDIE and the low countries, and many noble gentlemen and old souldiours out of SPAIN: for the guard of his owne person he entertained twelue thousand Germanes, such as had longest serued in his warres in ITALIE, ouer whom commaunded Maximilian Herbersthene, and Tamissius, both famous captaines. At the same time Clement the seventh then bishop of ROME, although his cofers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine warres, which had cost him ten hundred thousand ducats; yet to make some shew of his deuotion in so dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare vnto the emperor, after he had with greuous exaction extorted from the cleargie a great masse of money (whereunto his rich cardinals contributed nothing, as if it had been a thing utterly vnlawfull for them in so good a cause to haue abated any jot of their pontificall shew in the court of ROME,) sent the young cardinall Hippolytus Medices his nephew, being then about twentie yeares of age, a man indeed fitter for the warres than for the church, as his legate vnto the emperor, accompanied with mo good captaines than cleargie men, and his cofers well stuffed with treasure: whose coming to RATISBONE was vnto the emperor and the Germanes very welcome, for besides that hee was a young gentleman of very comely personage and exceeding bountifull, he entertained for those warres (besides the companie he brought with him) eight thousand Hungarian horsemen, of all others best acquainted with the Turkish warres.

See, Geronimus besieged by king Soliman.

King Iohn vnderstanding, that the formost of Solymans great armie were come as farre as SAMANDRIA in SERBIA, thought it now a fit time to write from king Ferdinand (such townes as he yet held in HUNGARIE, wherefore he sent Aloisius Grittius (whom Solyman had left as a helper for his estate) to besiege STRIGONIVM; which is a citie of HUNGARIE, situate vpon the side of Danubius, about thirtie miles from BUDA, the castle whereof was at that time holden with a strong garrison of king Ferdinands: whereunto for all that Grittius laid such hard siege both by the riuer and by land, that the defendants doubting how they should bee able to hold out, especially if Solyman should take that in his way, as it was most like he would; sent for releefe to Cazarianer, a warlike captaine, then gouernour of VIENNA, and generall of all king Ferdinand his forces: by whose appointment certaine small frigots, were sent downe the riuer of Danubius from POSSONIVM, well manned: who suddainly setting vpon the Turkes fleet (which so kept the riuer that nothing could that way be possibly conueyed either in or out of the castle) should by their vnexpected coming open that way: but Grittius hauing intelligence thereof by certaine Hungarians, which though they serued king Ferdinand, made no great account to flee sometime to the one part, sometime to the other, as best fitted their purpose; presently resolved to send his fleet vp the riuer, and by his sudden coming to oppresse his enemies, in like sort as they had thought to haue done him. And the more to encourage his souldiours, hee promised great rewards to all such as should performe any extraordinarie peece of seruice in that action: and so hauing thorowly furnished all his fleet with good souldiours, but especially with Turkish archers, sent them vp the riuer to seeke their enemies: who fearing no such matter, as men surprised with the same mischeefe they had prepared for others, were at the first exceedingly dismayed, yet considering that they were reasonably well prouided for their coming (although they yet wanted such helpe as Cazarianer had appointed to send them) they thought it a great shame to flee, and therefore putting themselves in order of battell, came downe the riuer, and with great courage encountred their enemies. There began a sharpe and cruell fight, many being slaine and

A and wounded on both sides: but at last they of POSSONIVM, not able longer to endure the deadly shot of their enemies, and especially of the Turkish archers, who with their arrowes sore gauled both the souldiours and the mariners, they turned their backs and fled: in which fight of sixtie frigots which came from POSSONIVM, onely thirteene escaped, with Corporanus the Generall, all the rest being either sunke in the fight, or els taken by the enemy, being run ashore and forsaken by the Possionians, trusting more vnto their legs by land than their oares by water. Besides this losse of the frigots, there was slaine of the Possionians almost fiftie hundred. After this victorie, Grittius hoping that they in the castle of STRIGONIVM, despairing now of releefe, and fearing the coming of Solyman, would not long hold out; left off to batter or undermine the castle, wherewith he perceiued he little preuailed, purposing, by lying still and keeping them in the castle from all releefe, to enforce them in time to forsake the place. Thus whilst the deuided Hungarians with their owne hands inconsiderately sought one anothers destruction, with the ruine of their country; Solyman the great enemy of all Christians was readye at their backs to deuour both the one and the other, as in few yeares after he did.

Much about this time the old Spanishe souldiours in ITALIE, drawne together by Vastius, as the emperor had before commaunded, were come to the Alpes. In this campe, of one sort of men and other, was about twentie thousand, whereof almost the third part was not seruiceable: for the old souldiours, enriched with the long warres in ITALIE, and the spoile of the rich country of LUMBARDIE, wherein they had of late bene billited, brought with them all their old gotten spoiles and substance, not forgetting so much as their women, and whatsoeuer els serued C their pleasure: for carriage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of carriages and vn-necessarie people, all which serued for no other vse but for the souldiours pleasure, and to consume victuals. Which their licentious wantonnesse Vastius desiring to reforme, gaue straight commaundement thorow all the campe, That they should leaue behind them all such vn-necessarie baggage, and appointed what carriages should suffice for euery companie: whereat the souldiours began at the first to murmure, and presently after to arise vp in mutinie: for many of the captaines being rich, and disliking of that long and dangerous expedition, covertly incited the common souldiours to crie out vpon Vastius the Generall for their pay, alreadye due. Which thing once put into their heads, and the matter set on foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one voice said flatly, That they would goe no foot further, before they had receiued their pay. Vastius D although he well perceiued that tumult to be raised by some of his enemies, which sought thereby to lighten his credit, was glad for all that for the present to dissemble the matter, and yeelding to the necessitie of the time, to content the mutinous souldiours with one months pay, promising them their full contentment, at such time as they should come vnto the emperor: and so when he had with much adoe appeased that tumult, he set forward into GERMANIE.

Immediately after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with such cheerefulness offered themselves to that seruice, that euery captaine brought with him twice so many in his companie as was expected: so that Vastius (who before doubtfull of their forwardnesse in so dangerous a warre, especially in the aid of the Germanes, of whom they had in the late warres receiued great harmes, had by great and earnest persuaasions induced diuers of the nobilitie, and others of the better sort, to enter into that honourable action, in hope that they would draw after them great numbers of their friends and tenants, as indeed they did) was now glad to send backe again many of the common souldiours, by reason of the multitude; and also to his great discredit, and the offence of many, full sore against his will to displace most part of those forward gentlemen whom he had but a little before made captaines, who to their no small charge had gallantly furnished themselves, according to their degrees and places: for the emperor had then appointed what number of Italians he should bring, and also giuen commaundement, That rejecting the rest, he should commit the leading of them onely to those old expert captaines of whose valour and discretion he had before had good experience. These were Martius Columna, Petrus Mavramaldus, Pyrrhus F Stipicianus, and Camillus Columna, being all men of great worth and approoued faith towards the emperor.

In these Italian companies were fourteen thousand select footmen, beside many other braue men who voluntarily resorted from diuers places to VIENNA. After these footmen followed Ferdinand Gonzaga with two thousand horsemen, and certaine troupes of Grecians and Spaniards, forthwith granted, and two men of great account sent for hostages for him into the citie with G Solymans safe conduct. Which being receiued, the Governour went forth, and was by Abr- ham the great Bassa honourably receiued into the campe, and commanded to sit downe by him in his tent: where he was by him first by the way of courtesie demanded, whether hee had re-couered his old infirmities wherewith he was troubled at such time as he was sent embassadour vnto Solyman at CONSTANTINOPLE? After that, whether the wounds he had receiued in the last assault, were dangerous or not? but last of all, and that which most concerned the matter, vp-on what hope he alone had so long and so obstinately withstood the mightie Sultan Solyman; when as all his neighbours round about him had so willingly submitted themselves: saying further, That he marvelled much why he reposed any confidence in the lingering king Ferdinand.

Vvhereunto the Gouvernor modestly answered, That he was (thanks be to God) well deliuered H of his old disease: and that his wounds were without danger: but as concerning his holding out, he said, that he for his great wisdom knew, that it was the dutie of a good souldior valiantly to withstand his enemies, & not to be troubled with any euill hap, or discouraged with any chance of warre: as for himselfe, he said, when mans helpe failed, he had reposed his full trust in God, by whose power he had bene hitherto preferred, which as he well hoped, should neuer faile him at his need: and that king Ferdinand was not so farre off, but that he would before it were long be there present with a great armie: wherefore hee did not greatly maruell, that he was not releued before that time, for as much as many lets and occasions might chance which might hinder the kings purpose, considering that fortune alwaies by nature vnconstant, was in nothing more like vnto her selfe in her vnconstancie than in martiall affaires. The Bassa wondering at the inuinci- I ble courage of the Governour, said, That although the great emperor Solyman might now at his pleasure utterly destroy the towne, with all that therein was; yet being by nature of a most honourable and mild disposition, and a great louer of valiant and courageous men, had commanded him in his name to giue him that towne, and the liues of all them that were in it, as a reward of his valour shewed in the defence thereof: yet so, that he should sweare obedience vnto him, and receiue some few Turkes into the towne, in token that he had yeelded the same. The politicke Gouverneur knowing that of eight hundred valiant souldiours he had scarcely a third part left, and them also fore weakened with wounds and want of rest, thought it necessarie to make his peace in best sort he could: For what could haue happened vnto him more witheliedly, than with his great honour to keepe the towne still, and with the losse of a few pleasing words K to deliuer himselfe, with so many of his friends, from extreame feare and perill? and so in all his talke shewing no signe of feare, and with great words setting forth the strength of his garrison (which was indeed brought to an extreame weaknesse) said he was readie at the first to haue yeelded vp the towne, for the old acquaintance he had with him at CONSTANTINOPLE, but was alwaies letted by the Germanes and Spaniards which were there in garrison, fierce and cruell souldiours, whose hard hearts were (as he said) hardly entreated to suffer him at that time to come out of the citie into the campe: Vvherefore he could promise to be a friend to all such Turkes as should passe that way, and to releeue them with such things as his wasted country could afford; and further, in token of his submission, to set vp one of Solymans ensignes in the cheefe tower of the citie: but as for receiuing any Turkes into garrison, in token that hee had yeelded vp the L towne, he was willing so to doe, but that he was greatly afraid they should be euill entreated by the Germanes and Spaniards, who deadly hated the Turkes: whereof it was to be thought, that new waies would euenly arise. In conclusion, he so cunningly vsed the matter, that the great Bassa was contented with this small token of submission, That he should receiue in at one of the gates of the citie, one of Solymans captaines with ten Ianizaries: which, being done accordingly, and they courteously for a while entertained and againe dismissed, the great Bassa held himselfe with that simple submission well contented: when as the Gouverneur had neither Germane nor Spaniard as then in garrison. So when Solyman had with his great armie lien at the siege of GVNZA by the space of eight and twentie dayes, and in that time to his great losse assaulted the same thirtene times, he rose with his armie, glad of a little fained submission for the safegard of M his honour: and leauing VIENNA on the right hand, whither most part of the Christian armie was assembled, tooke the way on the left into CARINTHIA, and so came to the river Mura, and from thence to the citie GRATIA. This turning of Solymans out of the way from VIENNA, where he knew his enemies lay, put all feare out of the minds of the Christians, which they had before

A before not without cause concealed, in so much, that he but a little before feared as a prince of great pride and power, shamefully repulsed at the little towne of GVNZA, and now flunning his enemies at VIENNA, began to grow into contempt as if he had been running away for feare:
Which disgrace the Turkes sought by diuers excuses to couer, as that the strong citie of NOSTAT lay betwixt him and VIENNA, which could neither without much difficultie be taken, nor danger left enemy behind him: Besides that, Winter began to approach, which caused him (as the Turkes gaue it out) to content himselfe with the spoile of the rich countries betwixt the rivers Sausus and Dranus, and so in good time to returne againe to BELGRADE: But they which seemed to see farther into the matter, were of opinion, That Solyman vnderstanding by his espials, and secret aduertisement from his friends, that the princes of GERMANIE had with one consent B joyned their forces with the emperours, brought out of ITALIE, SPAINNE, and the low countries, which at his setting forth he least feared; and that the Christian armie in number great, consisted not of raw souldiours, but for the most part of such as had bene trained vp in warres; men both for courage and skill nothing inferior to his Ianizaries and best men of war; chose rather to take the spoile of the country, as he might with safetie, than to aduenture his person and state to the hazard of a most doubtfull and dangerous battell.

Whilest these things were in doing, Michael-ogli by the commaundement of Solyman sent C Cafon with fifteene thousand of his voluntarie horsemen (who in Solymans expedition against VIENNA, had run thorow the country of AVSTRIA as farre as LINTZ) charging him without stay to spoile all the country farre and neere which lieth between Danubius and the Alpes, thereby to learne what he could of the state and strength of the emperours campe; and by doing all the harmes he could possibly, to leaue a most lamentable remembrance of the Turkes being in AVSTRIA. Cafon was of himselfe forward enough, and desirous of the spoile; but so much the more, for that he was by the former road into that country become both famous and rich: Wherefore diuiding his horsemen into three companies not farre distant one from another, he suddenly oppressed an infinit multitude of all sorts of people in the fields and country villages as he went; all which hee either slew without mercie, or carried away as miserable prisoners.
Thousands of men and women tied together in chaines and ropes, were by the cruell Turkes enforced to run as fast as their horses, the country villages were burnt downe to the ground and in them the poore children of the Christians, whose parents were either slaine or carried away D captiues: so that all the country euerie way for the space almost of an hundred and fiftie miles, was couered with smoke and fire, within three miles of LINTZ; where king Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himselfe farther off to STRADINGA, where his brother Charles the emperor lay. This cruell Turke, according to his charge hauing with fire and sword without compulsion wrought all the wo he could possible vpon the poore Christians, and now loded with the spoile of the country and multitude of prisoners, began to returne the same way he came, thinking to find Solyman either at the siege of GVNZA where he left him, or neerer hand at NOSTAT com-ming towards VIENNA. But he as is before said, rising with small honour from GVNZA, and feating the power of the Christians, was gone quite another way as farre as GRATIA, the metropoliticall citie of STIRIA, standing vpon the river of Mura; which turned to the vtter destru-E on of Cafon and all his followers. For as soone as it was perceived by the burning of the coun-trei all about, that the Turkes were come neere vnto LINTZ, the Christian captaines with their companies went out of the campe, some one way, some another, as was thought most conuenient for the meeting with of these mischieuous Turkes, which neuer rested in one place: wherin they vsed such diligence in taking the passages, that it was not possible they should escape vnfought withall. Foure companies of Spanish and Italian horsemen vnder the leading of Lewes Cone a valiant captaine, first lighting vpon them in a valley neere vnto NOSTAT, and desperately charging them, were by the Turkes for most part slaine: But Cafon perceiuing how he was on F the night following with more than barbarous crueltie slew foure thousand of the Christians he had before taken prisoners, because he should not be hindred by them in his flight; and the diuiding his armie into two parts, about midnight began to set forward, vsing the benefit of the night to haue escaped from his enemies out of these vallies wherein he was enclosed. One part of this armie led by Ferises taking the way Southward, did with incredible labour cut a way thro-row the thicke and ouergrown woods (a thing thought altogether impossible) and so with li-die or no losse came to Solyman into STIRIA. Cafon with the other part of the armie breaking out of the valley of STORAMBERG, chanced vpon the Palatine (Generall of the forces sent from the German princes) who with ten thousand footmen and two thousand horsemen, and certaine field pieces brake the battell of the Turkes, and slew of them a great number in which consist Cafon his chiefe ensigne was taken. He fighting most valiantly in the rearward to giue others time to escape, was himselfe there slaine; whose gallant headpiece presented afterwards to the emperour, confirmed the report of his death. They which escaped from the Palatine in their flight fell into the hands of Lewes and the Marquesse of BRANDENBURG, by whom they were slaine like beaſts. The Hungarian horsemen led by Valentinus Turacus, lighting vpon them which fled from Lewes and the Marquesse, had the killing of them for the space of seauen miles; and of all others did vpon them the cruellest execution, following them hard at the heeles with their fresh horses, and fiercely insulting vpon them in their owne language. Those few dispersed Turkes which escaped the furie of the Hungarians, fell into the hands of the country people about VESPRINUM and the lake of Balaton, which came out on euerie side in hope of spoile, who shewed them small fauour: so that of 8000 Turkes which were with Cafon, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

The emperour vnderstanding that Solyman was gone as farre as GRATIA in STIRIA, called his chiefe captaines together into the castle of LINTZ, to know their opinions, whether it were best to follow the enemy into STIRIA or not. The cities of LINTZ, GRATIA, and VIENNA are situate almost in forme of a triangle: but from LINTZ to GRATIA is three good daies journey of bad rough way by horse. Some said it was best to fight with the Turkes in that vneuen mountaine country, where the Turkes chiefe strength consisting in the multitude of his horsemen, should stand him in small steed, but should be enforced to trie the battell with his footmen, wherein he was inferiour to the Christians. This counsell although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the most approved captaines, so moued the emperour, that he presently sent Spontius a Spaniard (the most famous captaine Antonius Lena his lieutenant) to take view of that passage: who shortly after returned againe to LINTZ, bringing word that all the country as hee went was desolat and for feare forsaken of the inhabitants: but concerning the place of the enemies abode, he could learne no certaintie. Whereupon it was by generall consent concluded, that they should all go to VIENNA, whether all the strength of the Germans was already assembled, there to take a generall view of the armie, and to giue the enemy battell if he should againe retorne. Some there were of great courage which openly disliked of that going to VIENNA, saying, That the emperour should rather in that distresse of the prouinces of STIRIA and CARINTHIA pursue his enemy, than turne out of the way to VIENNA. But others of greater judgement, whose opinion preuailed, said, It was one thing to invade, and another thing to defend: so that the emperour might with honour enough encampe himselfe in the fields of VIENNA, and from thence to expect & deride the base expedition and vaine brags of his proud enemy, who a farre off chalenged him into the field, and then like a coward durst not come neere him.

at Vienna.

The emperour comming to VIENNA, and taking a generall view of the armie, found therein two hundred and sixtie thousand men, whereof nintie thousand footmen, and thirtie thousand horsemen were accounted old expert soldiours, and of them many whole companies and bands of such as had before ben generals, captains, lieutenants, antients, or other officers & men of marke in other armies, and now were content to serue as priuat men. It was thought that so many worthie captaines and valiant souldiours, were neuer before in the memorie of man assembled together into one campe: for the princes and free cities had not sent thither common souldiours, but their chosen and approved men; struing as it were amongst themselves, who should send the best. All the flowre and strength of GERMANIE from the riuer of Vistula to the Rhene, and from the Ocean to the Alpes, was by the princes of the empire and free cities either sent thither, or of themselves voluntarily came thither. A thing neuer before heard of, that all GERMANIE should as it were with one consent, be glad to take vp armes for their common safetie, in defence of their honour and libertie; especially against people brought out of the furthest parts of ASIA, SYRIA, and EGYPT. Beside the great number of Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians; the Bohemian campe lay not farre off, strengthened with them of SILESIA and MORAVIA. There were also some troupes of Polonian horsemen, not sent thither by publike authoritie, but serving as voluntarie men: king Sigismund winking thereat, who as he was carefull not rashly to breake the league he had made with Solyman; so least he should seeme carelesse of the Christian common cause, by notable dissimulation left place for such of his subjects as would (as if it had beene without his knowledge) to shew their valour in the most honourable warre.

The Christian armie ready to receiue the enemy, lay in a great field neere vnto VIENNA. The order of the Christian armie. Three great squadrons of pikemen, standing one squadron a great way distant from another, were so placed against the enemy with like and equall front, that all the horsemen diuided into two parts, might well be receiued into the great spaces betwixt the three squadrons: for it was not thought conuenient to oppose so small a number of horsemen in open field without the footmen, against almost three hundred thousand of the Turkes horsemen. The right wing of the horsemen was led by the emperour himselfe, and the left by king Ferdinand. Before and behind, and on euerie side of the three squadrons of pikes, sauing in those places which were left open for the horsemen, about thirtie paces off, were placed twentie thousand nimble harquebusiers ranged in length, and but five in a ranke; so that whilest the first discharged, the second, and after them the third, and so the rest readly and orderly comming on; might without let deliuer their bullets vpon their enemies: neither was it thought any disadvantage to place them so thin, for that if they found themselves by the enemies oppressed, they might easily retire amongst the pikes, standing fast at hand. Before the harquebusiers was planted the great ordinance, whereof the emperor had such store and so well placed, that he could therewith (as with a most sure trench) haue compassed in his whole armie. Only the Hungarians, men well acquainted with the manner of the Turkes fight, chose to lie in the open field in two great wings, vnder the leading of their two valiant captaines Valentinus and Paulus. Many noble gentlemen beholding this goodly armie, wept for joy, conceiuing a most assured hope of victorie, if the proud enemy durst with all his forces ioyne in battell. But Solyman, who by all means sought with his great number of horsemen to keepe the wide and open fields, certainly aduertised both of the emperors strength and the manner of his lying, got him ouer the riuer of Mura, and at MARPURCH by bridges which he made on the sudden, passed ouer the great riuer Dranus. And so he which that Sommer held almost all the world in suspence, with the doubtfull expectation of the successe of that war; hauing with all that his huge power wherewith he threatened the world, done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in euerie place either overcome or else shamefully repulſed; left STIRIA & returned the same way he came, directly betwixt the riuers of Sauus and Dranus to BELGRADE, and so to CONSTANTINOPLE, leauing here and there some remembrance of his barbarous cruelty, and still looking behind him if the emperour were not at his heeles: at such time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian horsemen did still pursue the taile of his armie. It is reported that he carried away with him thirtie thousand Christians into captiuitie, besides many thousands of poore country people slaine by the mercilesse Turkes; but especially by Cafon and his followers: and so to his eternall infamie was twise in the space of a few years diuen out of GERMANIE. The emperour vnderstanding of Solyman's departure, determined with all speed to retorne into ITALIE, although king Ferdinand his brother most earnestly entreated him before his departure, in so fit a time to employ those great forces against king John, who now as it were forsaken of Solyman, might easily with so puissant an armie haue bene thrust not onely out of BUDA, but also quite out of the kingdome of HUNGARIE, wherein he was by Solyman as his vassall placed. But the emperour, for that Winter began now to approach, and the plague was got into the campe, yea euen into his court, continued in his former purpose of departing into ITALIE: yet yielding so farre vnto his brothers request, as to leaue behind him all the Italians, who ioynd with king Ferdinand's owne forces were thought sufficient for the accomplishment of the Hungarian warre.

Over these Italians, one Fabritius Maramaldus was by the means of Alphonſus Vicinius appointed Generall: but no order taken for the payment of their wages, whereby the souldiours might be the more encouraged to take in hand that warre, and also kept in obedience. Which thing at the first much offended the minds of the other captaines, thinking themselves disgraced by the preferment of Maramaldus, a man of no greater account than themselves: but as soone as it was knowne abroad, the vnder captaines and officers of the bands, led with the credit and fauour of their old captaines, said plainly, That they would not go into HUNGARIE, except either king Ferdinand would in person himselfe go, or else one of the great Commanders, Vasilius arise in mutinie.

or Lena were appointed for their Generall: and the common souldiours said flatly, that they would aske leaue to depart, except they had three moneths pay, which they knew well they should neuer get of that poore king, already brought vnto great wants. Vastius to appease this mutinie, trauelled greatly with his souldiours, perswading them to remember the faith of souldiours, and by their constant perseuerance to maintaine the honour they had got by their cheerdious, full comming: telling them, That valiant souldiours neuer wanted pay, furnishing themselves by their victories with all things necessarie from the enemy. And as for Maramaldus their Generall, they had no just cause to mislike him being an old capitaine of great experience, for courage and pollicie not inferiour to any of the greatest Commanders, and placed by the emperor to his owne appointment as a man most sufficient, whose judgement they ought not in any case to dislike. When Vastius had with these and such like reasons well appeased the tumultuous souldiours, and was gone out of the campe into VIENNA to take further order for the remedying of all difficulties; night, the nurse of sedition came on, whose darkenesse excluding all modestie and feare, gaue further scope and place vnto the mutinous souldiours insolence: By chance there was at that time brought out of the citie into the campe verie course, hoarie, moulded bread, which some of the souldiours hauing bought, and thrusting it vpon the points of their speares, shewed it vnto their fellows in great choller, railing against king Ferdinand, which in his owne kingdome in the beginning of the warre had made no better prouision, but with such corrupt and pestilent bread to feed them being strangers, which were onely for his defence and quartell to aduantage their liues. And but a little before, a certaine Spaniard being but a common souldiour comming into the Generals tent, and casting the like bread down at the feet of Vastius, bitterly cursing the emperor and king Ferdinand, had raised a wonderfull tumult: wherefore the Italian souldiours flocking together out of their tents, gaue many hard speeches concerning their pay, their victuals, and the difficulties of the Hungarian warre. There one Titus Marconius of Volaterra a man of a troublesome spirit, but reasonably well spoken, was by the other souldiours set vpon a great heape of saddles, that he might be the better heard, and by diuers seditious captaines requested frankly to speake his mind, so farre as he thought concerned the safetie and welfare of them all. Where it is reported that he spake vnto them in this seditious manner as followeth:

The seditions or reason of Titus Marconius, to the mutinous Italians.

And shall the Spaniards (said he) beloued companions and fellowes in armes, as you have heard, K go into ITALIE? and to our great hurt againe returne into their old wintering places? and that which I am ashamed to say, as notable guests lie with our wines? and we Italians as banished men fight this winter with ice and snow in HUNGARIE? and that forsooth for a most beggarly king, and him also to the Hungarians a foreiner and meere stranger, against a naturall borne prince, of his subtilties well beloued, and strongly backed with the power and wealth of the Turkish emperor? And that which might iustly grieve any couragious mind, under the conduct of Maramaldus, who oftentimes blinded with anger and hastie cruelty, hath so furiously thrust vs thorow with his sword, that he seemeth not more to desire the name of a capitaine for any thing, than for the killing and murdering of vs now his souldiours. Neither can I beleue that you, who haue oftentimes bene captaines and auantients your selues, will be so mad, as to serue under a common capitaine, without hope of any pay, or any prouision, of victorie or returne. Truly it delighteth me not so much to haue come hither for the honour of the Italian name (no more reckoned of than a rush) although I haue eleven times stru'd: as it doth this day shame me to see this shamefull end of the warre, ended before it was well begun. But in Regall dignitie is no shame, nor equitie in rewarding the souldiour: for kings now adies make account of souldiours onely according to their necessitie; this is it alone that giueth vs pay, this is that getteth vs loue, this is it maintaineth our reputation; all which, peace once by victorie obtained, leese their grace. So fareth it with vs at this present (fellow souldiours) the emperor and his brother king Ferdinand, deliuered from the feare of a most dangerous warre, to ease themselves of this multitude of vs, seeke to thrust vs into HUNGARIE as beasts to the slaughter, by the spending of our blood: hoping to purchase vnto themselves victorie; and by the losse of vs to take no harme themselves; though M the Turkes and Hungarians should with sword and famine utterly destroy vs, shut up with the ice of Danubius and the snow of the Alpes. But peradventure you understand not these desires; no more than you understand what this terrible and bloudie comet, shooting his beames towards ITALIE, pretendeth. Verily it is not fatall either to Solyman or Cæsar, but rather threatneth vnto vs death and destru-

A destruction: for they with like counsell, full of safetie and discretion, would not open any way vnto their owne destinies; but warily withdrew themselves one from the other, and shunned all the dangers of the field: wherefore if it were lawfull for them without any blemish of their Maesties, so notably to provide to keep themselves out of danger, when as on each side halfe the world lay as a reward of the victorie; shall not we looke to our selues that we be not thrust thither from whence appeareth no hope of returne, but with utter destruction? when as we may doe it without offence and by good right, especially seeing no pay is offered vs. Thus you see what a goodly end is made of this notable warre, wherein onely we the Italians in stead of commendation and reward reape iniurie and disgrace, and are peradventure of purpose exiled into HUNGARIE, that this floure of chivaltrie being drawn out of ITALIE and sent farre out of the way, colonies of Spaniards and Germans may be placed in our steads. Truly it seemeth hard dealing to be sent out of the way into a barbarous country, where we shall find all hostilitie, and no place of refuge to receive us, being distressed. Beside this, we shall also whether we will or no feele how heauie and intollerable it will be both to our bodies and minds to endure the miseries of this winter and dangerous warre: and in the meane time, with no small heauy griefe imagine what things our children, our brethren, our kinsmen, yea and our wives, suffer at home of the Spaniards and Germans: wherefore worthie companions, it concerneth vs more at this time to haue a good foresight, than valiantly to fight. The occasion presented vnto vs fauour safetie and welfare, standeth vpon a tickle point, it must be done without delay, and we must haue vs hence before that the Spaniards trusse up their baggage; and so preuenting the emperours foremost companies, come first our selues into ITALIE: for if we shall stay but a little to consult vpon the matter, Vastius C and our other proud commanders will presently be here, the very betrayers of the Italian blood, who for their owne gaine and our mischeefe haue brought vs into these straits; who I know will most earnestly intreat vs, and with many subtilties seeke to seduce vs, by offering vs great pay and what soeuer els we shall require: which will all proue but words. But you, if you be men, refuse to talke with them, as with your common enemies, or rather in reuenge of their old iniuries kill them. Here wanteth not in this assembly valiant men, for courage and integritie of life their betters farre, which can lead you forth, order your battell, and fortunately use this your courage and forwardnesse. Wherefore if you be wise, set forward resolutely, and good fortune no doubt will attend you in your hast, for the full accomplishment of your desire consisteth in your hast onely.

D Marconius had no sooner made an end of this mutinous speech, but the tumultuous souldiours in every band began highly to commend and approue the same, and by and by such a confused noise was heard thorow all the assemble, as vnto to rise amongst the discontented vulgar people, readie to rise in armes: but the drums presently striking vp a march, they made no longer stay, but without delay plucked vp their ensignes, and forward they go directly towards NEOLISTAT. In this tumult, in stead of their old captaines which either were not then present, or refused to goe with them, they chose others to bee their leaders: who once named by the seditious multitude, might in no case without danger refuse to take the charge vpon them, were they neuer so vnwilling. These were Montebellius, Nerius, Melcarius, Sanctius, and the two twins of MILLANE, called Glusani: who drew after them eight thousand souldiours; the rest partly for shame, and partly for feare, staid still with Maramaldus their new appointed Generall. When they were thus gone, Vastius and diuers other great captaines hearing thereof in the citie, posted after them six miles, and at length ouertaking them, requested them to stay, and not to dishonor themselves with so foule a fact, telling them, that their pay was readie for them, and omitting nothing wherewith they might haue ben moued to stay, mingled their prayers with grievous threats: but they resolutely set downe, would neither heare, nor stay; but as men enraged with furie, and their own guiltie conscience, with sterne lookes discharged some small shot vpon them. Whereupon Vastius would there haue staid the companie; and did what hee possibly could by threatening and otherwise to haue terrified their leaders, and to haue brought them backe, he was oftentimes in danger to haue been slaine. In the end he was glad to forsake them, and to returne as he came. F King Ferdinand by this sudden departure of the Italians, for that time disappointed of all his hope of recouering the kingdome of HUNGARIE from king John, in great choller writ vnto his subjects of STIRIA and CARINTHIA, whereby the Italians were to passe, that they should shew them no manner of courtesie in their passage: whereupon ensued great hurt on both sides. Yet for all that these Italians in despite of what could bee done, at length recolected TITUS

VENTUM

Charles the emperor returned into Italie.

VENTUM in the borders of ITALIE, where they disbanded themselves, and returned euerie man to his owne dwelling, leauing king Ferdinand vnto his owne forces. The emperor also breakeing vp his armie at VIENNA, and purposing now as before to returne into ITALIE, appointed Ferdinand Gonzaga to goe for most with the light horsemen, with whom also he went himselfe: after him followed Vassius with the Spaniards: two dayes after came the cardinall, whose traine was of all the greatest; last of all followed the mercinarie Germanes: in which order he returned in safetie into ITALIE.

This was the end of those wonderfull preparations made by the two great monarchs Solyman and Charles the first, in the yeare 1532, which held the world in great suspence, with the fearfull expectation of some matuellous alteration; and so much the more, for that at the same time appeared a great blasing starre by the space of fifteene daies: All which for all that, God so appointing, soited to farre lesse harme than was of most men feared.

Auria goes aboard the Turkie.

Now whilst Charles the emperor was thus in Armes against Solyman in AVSTRIA, Auria by his appointment with a fleet of 35 tall ships and 48 gallies, wherein he had embarked 25000 good souldiours well appointed, did in the meane time wonderfully annoy the Turkes in PELOPONESVS. With this fleet Auria departing from MESSANA in SICILIA: and passing alongt the coast of ITALIE into the Ionian, neere vnto the Iffe of ZACYNTHVS, met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian admirall with a fleet of sixtie gallies, set forth by the Venetians for defence of their territories; who offered vnto Auria all possible kindnesse; but excused himselfe, that he could not joine with him in that warre against the common enemy; by reason of an old league betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians, which Solyman had but a little before renewed. So that at that time the Venetians stood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the emperor and Solyman, offering like kindnesse to both, but taking part with neither, yet in readinesse to fall out with either, if they should by sea or land offer any iniurie to their state: wherein they bare themselves so indifferent, that it was thought, that they at one and the selfsame instant aduertised Auria, That Himerales the Turkes admirall lay with his fleet of sixtie gallies, euill appointed in the bay of AMBRACIA, where he might easily be surprised: and gaue likewise warning to him of the coming of Auria with a strong fleet, wishing him in time to prouide for his better safetie, by retiring his fleet into some other place of more affurance, which he presently did: for knowing himselfe too weak, he departed from AMBRACIA to the strong haue of CALCIDE. Which thing with other like well considered, might giue just cause to any Christian heart to bewaile the state of that time, wherein the Christian princes being either in mortall warres among themselves, or entangled by Solyman with leagues of no assurance, omitted the fairest oportunitie that could haue beene wished for the abating of the Turkes greatnesse: for if the Venetians joyning their forces with Auria, had in time pursued the Turkish admirall, it was like, that not onely all Solymans power at sea had beene vterly discomfited; but also most part of GRACIA, mindfull of their ancient empire and libertie, and then readie to haue rebelled; and joynd hands with the Christians, might haue beene recovered out of the Turkish thraldome; yea and the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE greatly endangered, few or none being left for the defence thereof, beside yong Ianizaries, and effeminat eunuchs, the heartlesse keepers of the Turkes concubines, Solyman himselfe being then far off in HUNGARIE, and hauing drawne with him the greatest strength of his empire.

Auria besiegeth Corone in Peloponessus.

Auria taking his leaue of the Venetian admirall, with much honour done at sea on both sides, was shortly after aduertised, that the Turkes admirall was fled to CALCIDE. Wherefore now out of hope to doe any good against him, he directed his course to CORONE, which is a strong citie vpon the coast of PELOPONESVS, about twelue miles distant from MODON, with purpose to besiege it: which when hee had well viewed, and considered of the strength thereof, he laid siege thereto both by sea and land, battering it most terribly, at one time with foureteene great peeces of artillerie by land, and a hundred and fiftie by sea, so that a more terrible batterie had not beene lightly heard of: for all that, the Turkes valiantly stood vpon their defence, and manfully repulsed the Italians, which vnder the leading of the countie of SARNE assaulted the citie by land. The Turkish garrisons lying about in the country of PELOPONESVS, did what they might to haue releued the citie, who by the valour of the said countie were discomfited, and Zadares their cheefe leader slaine, whose head with others of the slaine Turkes was set vp vpon stakes to the terrour of the defendants.

At

At length the Turkes wearied with assaults, and terrified with the thundering shot which neuer ceased, and driuen also from their greatest strength towards sea by the desperate assault of certaine resolute Christians, whom they had now full sore against their wills receiued as it were into their bosomes, fearing also to want victuall and poulder; if they should longer hold out without any hope of releefe; yeelded the citie & castle to Auria, vpon condition, that they might in safetie depart thence with bag and baggage. CORONE thus taken, and a strong garrison of Spaniards there placed, and the Christian Greekes which dwelt in the citie sworne vnto them, Auria put to sea with his fleet, and sayling againe by ZACYNTHVS, came to PATRAS, another ancient citie of PELOPONESVS, which he easily tooke and ransacked: for the Turkes distrusting the strength of the citie had strongly entrenched themselves neere vnto the castle, which place also together with the castle they in short time yeelded to Auria; couenanting, that they and especially their wines might with their garments onely depart in safetie into ETOLIA: which was by Auria so precisely performed, that when three thousand of them passed along thorow the armie of the Christians raunged on both sides, and some of the souldiours began rudely to handle some of the women, and to take from them some of their jewels, he caused them presently to the terrour of others to be hanged. Auria leauing his armie at PATRAS, with commandement to follow him by land, sailed alongt the coast of PELOPONESVS, vntill he came to the strait of NARPACTVM, now called LEPANTO, which is the entrance into the gulf of CORINTH, passing PELOPONESVS from ETOLIA with a strait somewhat narrower than the strait of HELLESPONT: Vpon this strait stood two castles, the one called RHIVM vpon the coast of PELOPONESVS, and the other MOLYCREVM in ETOLIA, which Baiazet had wonderfully fortified and stored with ordinance for the keeping of that strait. Auria threatening all extremities vnto the capitaine of the castle on PELOPONESVS side, if he did enforce him to plant his batterie, so terrified him, that he without delay yeelded to him the castle, couenanting only, That he and his souldiours might in safetie depart thence: which graunted, and the Turkes departed, Auria gaue the spoile of the castle vnto his souldiours which came with him by sea; whereby he so offended the minds of the other souldiours which came by land from PATRAS, that they were about to haue forsaken him. The other castle vpon ETOLIA side was not so easily taken, being valiantly defended by a garrison of old Ianizaries, appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet in the end by furie of the ordinance a breach was made, whereby the Christians forcibly entring, slew three hundred of the old garrison souldiours, not taking any to mercie: the rest fled into a strong tower in the middelt of the castle, where seeing no remedie but that they must needs fall into the hands of their enemies, they desperately blew vp themselves and the tower with a great part of the castle with gunpoulder, in such sort, that it seemed all the sea coast to haue been shaken with an earthquake, and the gallies which lay a bow shoot off were almost ouerwhelmed with stones blowne out so faire off. The great Ordinance taken in this castle, was valued at seuentie thousand duckats; whereof certaine peeces of a wonderfull greatnesse, with Arabian letters written vpon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to GENVA, and in remembrance of the victorie mouint vpon the bulwarke at the mouth of the haue. All these things thus happely atchieued, Auria strongly fortified the citie of CORONE, storing it both with munition and plentie of victuall, committing the defence therof to Mendoza, a valiant Spaniard, with a strong garrison of Spaniards, promising of his owne charge to relieue him whensoever he should need, if the emperor should desire to doe it. The strait of NARPACTVM laid open, Salusiatos with the gallies of MALTA, scoured all alongt the gulf of CORINTH, doing great harme vnto the Turkes which dwelt on both sides of the gulf, spoiling and terrifying them euen as farre as CORINTH. Not long after Winter now approaching, Auria receiuing letters from the emperor, of Solymans departure out of HUNGARIE, returned with his fleet loaded with the spoile of the Turkes to NAPLES, and so from thence home to GENVA.

In the beginning of the Spring following (which was in the yeare 1533) it was wisely reported, that the Turkes were comming with a great fleet towards PELOPONESVS: and not long after, Mendoza Governour of CORONE by letters aduertised Peter of TOLEDO viceroi of NAPLES, that he was both by sea and land hardly besieged by the Turkes; and that he would to the vttermost of his power valiantly defend the citie, so long as he had any prouision of victuall: Wherefore he most earnestly requested, that if the emperor would haue the towne kept, hee should in time send him reliefe, wherupon the oppressed Grecians taking heart were like enough to rebell, and to helpe to expulse the Turkes quite out of PELIOPONNESVS. But about all things G he forgot not to craue speedie helpe of Auria, and to put him in mind of the faithfull promise he had made to relieue him at his need. Vpon this newes, Charles the emperor commaunded Auria his Admirall to rig vp a conuenient fleet for that seruice, promising forthwith to send vnto him twelue gallies, which hee had new built in SPAINE. He also requested the knights of MALTA to aid him with their gallies against that common enimie. Wherefore Auria hauing with wonderfull celeritie rigged vp thirtie tall ships, and as many gallies, came to NAPLES to take in his souldiours: there the old garrisons of the Spaniards which for want of pay were risen in mutinie against the great Commaunder Vasilius and the viceroy, and had risened the citie of AVERSA, and done no little harme all about in the countrey of CAMPANIA, were againe pacified by a pay giuen vnto them, and presently embarked for CORONE, vnder the command H of Rodericus Macicauis their Generall; at which time also Frederick of TOLEDO the viceroy his sonne, with a companie of braue gentlement went aboard, vowing vnto the sacred warre that their first seruice. The knights of MALTA came thither also with their gallies. But whilest these things were a doing, Auria to encourage them of CORONE, for feare least they despairing of helpe should fall to some hard composition with the Turkes, sent Christopher Palaucine a resolute young gentleman of an inuincible courage, with a most swift gallie to CORONE; who by daylight passing thorow the midst of the Turkes fleet, safely recovered the haven, to the great joy of the besieged Christians: and shortly after, when he had well viewed all things he was sent for, with the strength and manner of the enemies lying, and filled the mindes of the defendants with assured hope of speedie rescue; about noone time of the day he suddenly brake out againe I thorow the midst of his enemies, and as it were miraculously escaped in safetie for all that they could doe, although they ceased not to giue him chase so long as they were in any hope to haue ouertaken him. Auria departing from NAPLES came to MESSANA, where he certainly enformed of the enemies force both by sea and land, with the number of their gallies, and seeing that the chiefe hope of relieuing of the citie consisted in celeritie, staied not for the gallies he expected out of SPAINE, but held on his course towards GRÆCIA: for it was told him that the enemies fleet daily increased by the coming in of the Turkish pirats; and that Assam-beg otherwise called the Moore of ALEXANDRIA (an arch pirat) was still looked for, in whose good directions the Turkish captaines reposed the greatest hope of their victorie. Vhen he was come as farr as ZACYNTHVS, he was enformed by the Venetians, That Lustibius Bassa (or rather Lut-zis Bassa, the Turkes great Admirall and Solyman his brother in law) with Solyman of ACARNANIA, and the Moore (men for their skill at sea of great fame and reputation) lay before CORONE with eightie gallies, manned with diuers companies of the old Ianizaries; so that it was thought a matter of exceeding perill for him to aduenture to relieue the town, except he tooke the advantage of some prosperous gale of wind. Wherefore Auria to haue yet more certaine knowledge of the enemies fleet, sent before him Christopher Palaucine with one gallie, againe to view the manner of the enemies lying: who passing the promontorie of ACUTES, saw all the Turkes great fleet lying in verie good order before the citie: and so returned to AVRIA, confirming that the Venetians had before reported, and that the Turkes fleet was greatly encreased, and lay ready as it should seeme to giue him battell as soone as he should approach the citie. For all that, Auria nothing dismayed with the greatnesse of the Turkes fleet, made no stay but still kept on his course, and with a faire gale of wind passing the promontorie of ACUTES, came directly towards CORONE. Two great Gallions, of all the fleet the most warlike ships, came foremost; whereof the one was Auria his owne which hee had built with a wonderfull charge, and the other was of SICILIA: These two great ships were appointed by Auria to turne a little vpon the left hand, and at such time as the enimie should set forward from the shoare to cast anchor betwixt both the fleets; that as occasion should serue, they might as out of two strong castles beat the Turkes gallies with their great ordinance, wherewith they were for that purpose wonderfully stored. Next vnto these great Gallions followed the other warlike ships with full sailes: after whom came the gallies in three squadrons, whereof Saluiatus had the leading of the right wing, which consisted of the bishop of ROMES gallies, and them of MALTA: in the left wing and nere vnto the enimie commaunded Antonius Auria; and in the middle was Auria himselfe. At the first sight of the Hungarian fleet the Turkes moued not from the shoare, but discharged their ordinance at them a faire off, and then begun to set forward and to draw neerer; especially the

A the Moore, who with greater courage than the rest, assailed the side and reareward of the fleet: for the Christians keeping on their course right forth to CORONE, and turning nothing to the left hand as was before appointed, seemed as if they had fled; and so much the more, for that the gallies in the right wing, for feare of the Turkes great ordinance did get a great compass farther off into the sea, and many of the middle Squadron and of the left wing also, had disorderly thrust themselves in amongst the ships, although they had receiued little or no harme of the enemies great shot.

In this confusion of the Christian Nauie, the Moore requested Lut-zis the Admirall not to let slip so faire an occasion, wherein the Christian fleet might easily haue bene ouerthrowne: but whilest Lut-zis doth slowly and considerately set forward, Auria in the meane time had put B his fleet againe in order, and with a faire wind was come to CORONE. Two of the ships by the way falling foule one on another, staied behind, being not able to keepe way with the rest: about which all the Turkes gallies presently flockt, and tooke the lesser of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therein. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloudie fight had woon the forecable and waste of the ship: when Auria accounting it no small dishonour to haue his ships so surprisid at his heeles, caused all his gallies to turne againe vpon the enimie to rescue those ships. The Turkes seeing that, and with the WESTERNLY wind by little and little fallen downe so farr with the ships, that they were come within the danger of the shot of the towne, began C with great hur to forsake the ships, and to betake themselves to their oares, and so in manner of flight withdrew themselves. Whom Auria pursued, a good way to MODON, thundring in their poupes with his great shot, which hee liberally bestowed amongst them. There the Spaniards which meane time Antonius Auria came to rescue the two distressed ships. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their close fights, began now as men reuiued to shew themselves, and courageously to make resistance: and they which came with Antonius Auria to their rescue, entring with wonderfull celeritie on either side, slew and tooke three hundred Ianizaries, which with great courage had entred those ships, and were there left by the sudden departure of their fellowes. Amongst whom was taken one Iosuphius and old captaine of a thousand Ianizaries, to whom Auria after he was come to CORONE, gaue a faire sute of apparell and a chaine of gold, and so set him at libertie without any raunsome, thereby to prouoke the Turkes to the like kind of courteous dealing with the Christians. Assam-beg the pirat, and the D other captaines of the Turkes fleet wonderfully blamed Lut-zis the Admirall, for that he would not then fight with the Christians, when as he was thereto most earnestly requested both by the captaines and souldiours in general, and had a faire opportunitie of victorie offered at such time as the Christian fleet was disordered: but he excused himselfe, saying, That it was giuen him in speciall charge from Solyman the emperor, that he should in any case respect the safetie of his nauie, and not to come to the hazard of a battell. The Turkes which besieged the citie by land, vpon the approach of the Christian fleet forsooke their trenches & fled: at which time Mandoza the Gouernor falling out, tooke great store of victuall and warlike prouision which the Turkes had for hast left behind them. So Auria to his great honour, hauing driuen the Turkes from CORONE both by sea and land, furnished the citie with store of corne, wine, victuall, powder, E and shot: and committed the defence thereof to Macicauis, and the companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from NAPLES: comforting the Greekes, and exhorting them patiently for awhile to endure those calamities of warre, telling them that the emperor would the next Spring make warre against the Turkes both by sea and land in PELIOPONNESVS, and free them from the Turkish bondage. And so embarking the old garrison of Spaniards, departed from CORONE and came before MATHON, where he lay as it were brauing the Turkes. Admirall, hoping thereby to draw him out of that strong harbour to battell. But when he saw that the enimie could by no meanes be allured out of his strength, or assailed as he lay, he departed thence to CORCYRA, and so backe againe to MESSANA in SICILIA.

Within a few dayes after Assam-beg the Moore of ALEXANDRIA and most famous pirat, lying in wait for the marchants ships of VENICE coming out of SIRIA with marchandise, by chance met with Hieronimus Canalis vpon the coast of CRETE: where in the night time was fought betwixt them a fierce and cruell battell, wherein of the Moores thirteene gallies foure were sunke, three taken, and the rest hauing lost most part of their rowers, fled to ALEXANDRIA. In this fight was slaine three hundred Ianizaries which were going to CATA, and a thouthousand other Turks: of all them that were taken there was scarcely one saved; but the Moore G himselfe, who greuously wounded in the face, for safegard of his life was glad to discover himselfe: for the Venetians maintaining their state by trade and trafficke, doe of all other shew least fauour vnto pyrats. When the Moore had made himselfe known vnto Canalis, there was great care taken for the curing of his wounds, and either of them began with notable dissimulation to excuse the matter to other, saying, that they were both deceiued by the likenesse of the gallies, and mistaking of their friends for enemies: when as for all that they knew one another right well. For the Moore said, that he tooke those Venetian gallies for to haue bene part of Auria his fleet: and Canalis excused himselfe, by saying, that he mistooke him for Barbarussa, who a few yeares before had surpris'd three of the Venetian gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the matter, by their embassadour sought to excuse that was done, as a thing H happening by error and mischance: of which excuse Solyman excepted, and said moreover, that Canalis had done well and foldior like, to repulse by force the wrong that was offered him. Three of the emperors gallies staying behind the rest of the fleet, were neere vnto the promontorie PALINVRVS, vpon the coast of APVLIA, intercepted and cartied away by Sinam, sur-named the Iew, a notable pyrat of that time also.

The Winter following, the Spaniards and Greekes in CORONE began to want victuals, especially wine and flesh: for the Turkes had so blocked vp the citie, that nothing was to be had out of the country; wherefore the souldiors requested Macicauus their Gouernour and General to lead them forth to some peece of seruice against the enemy, for so much as they were not to hope for any reliefe elsewhere before Aprill, wishing rather valiantly to die like men in fight against the Turkes, than to languish within those dead wals for want of victuall. But Macicauus mindfull of his charge, fought by many reasons to dissuade them from such purpose, shewing them what an offence it were rashly to depart out of the citie committed to their custodie, which might be vnto them dangerous, although they should speed neuer so well; and that those wants which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be overcome by sparing and patience: and therefore told them plainly, that hee was resolutely set downe to keepe the citie for the emperor, and to endure all hardnesse, rather than to incur the infamie, That he had forsaken the citie, and betrayed his garrison. Yet for all this, the matter was so vrged by Didacus Touarres and Hermosilla, both great captains, and by the generall importunitie of the souldiors, that Macicauus was enforced to yeeld to their desire, and to promise them to goe: yet earnestly protesting, that he did it altogether against his will, rather enforced than persuaded vnto that, whereof he had no great hope of successe. Amongst other that were so forward in this action, was one Barbatius, a most valiant Greeke, who could perfectly speake the Turkes language, and of all others best knew the bywayes and secret passages of the country: he vnderooke to be their guide, and by vnkowne wayes to bring them vnto the enemies vndiscovered in the dead time of the night, when as they feared no such matter. So Macicauus commending the custodie of the citie to Liscanius and Mendesius, with charge that they should suffer no man to goe out of the citie after his departure, for feare of giuing any knowledge vnto the enemy, set forward about ten a clocke in the night towards ANDRVSSA, Barbatius being his guide, who shunning the common beaten wayes, brought them by secret and vncouth pathes that night halfe the way to ANDRVSSA: but vpon the rising of the Sunne he brought them into a secret woodie valley, where they rested and refreshed themselves all that day, and setting forward againe at night, came to ANDRVSSA before day. In this towne, which was of no great strength, lay one Caranius, a warlike capitaine, with three thousand footmen, whereof the one halfe was of the Ianizaries, and in the suburbs lay Acomates with a thousand chosen horsemen, with which garrison the Turkes kept all that day of PELOPONESVS in awe. Macicauus brought by his guide vnto the place where his enemies lay, went directly to the towne to haue surpris'd it: Hermosilla in the meane time standing still with certaine companies of Spaniards oueragainst the place where the horsemen lay. But this could not be done with so great silence, but that some of the horse boyes being awake, discovered them by the fire in their matches; who first awaked the negligent watchmen, and afterwards raised an alarum in the suburbs: whereupon Hermosilla courageously set vpon the horsemen, being altogether vnreadie, and slew many of them before they could arme themselves, and set fire also vpon the stables wherein the Turkes horses stood, with the rage whereof many of the Turkes perished, with their horses and armour. Great and terrible was the

A noise raised vpon the sudden in the suburbs, but especially of the horses, which burnt as they stood fast tied in the stables, or by chance breaking loose, ran vp and downe with their tailes and maines on a light fire: by occasion whereof, an alarum was raised in the towne, and the Turkes, got to the wals before the Spaniards could enter. Macicauus himselfe labouring to breake in at a posterne, was shot in the head with a small shot, and slaine: diuers others neere vnto him were slaine also. The Turkes perceiuing the small number of their enemies, sallied out vpon them, and enforced them to retire to Hermosilla, who had already made great spoile amongst the horsemen, by whose skilfull direction the Spaniards retired in so good order, making many stands, with their harquebusers all drawne into the reward, that such of the Turkes as were most forward to pursue them, did by their death cause the rest to make lesse hast. Acomates with such of his horsemen as had escaped the fire, hastened thither also, bringing with him two hundred harquebusers, which he had caused his horsemen for hast to take vp behind them vpon their horses: but whilest he sought eagerly to be reuenged vpon his enemies, and with too much heat pressed on with the formost, he was shot into the bodie with a bullet and slaine. So the horsemen which had before receiued a great losse as they lay in their lodgings, accounting it in their good haps that they were not there all slaine, and hauing now lost their capitaine, ceased any further to pursue their enemies, but returned. The Spaniards and Greekes, although they were wearied both with their long march and euill successe, retired still as resolute men readie to fight, and so returned to CORONE. Presently after, the Turkish garrison removed from ANDRVSSA to MEOLOPOLIS, now called LONDARIVM: after whose departure the Christian souldiors of CORONE came thither, and buried the dead bodies of their slaine fellowes (which till then lay vnburied) and brought backe with them the head of Macicauus their late General, which the Turkes had there set vp vpon a long pole, which they honourably buried at CORONE. Not long after the plague began to grow hot in CORONE, so much the more grieuous, for that it came accompanied with many other hard difficulties. For which causes, the Spaniards as men at once enforced with many extremities, embarked themselves with all the great ordinance and such Greekes as would goe with them, in certaine ships which came with corne out of SECLIA, and so departed, leaving the towne empty for the Turkes to come vnto.

Macicauus slain

Corone forsaken by the Spaniards

It was commonly reported, that the Spaniards left CORONE not without the secret consent of the emperor, which was the rather thought to be so, because that they which forooke the place, receiued thereby no disgrace, and the emperor himselfe had offered to giue the towne to Clement bishop of ROME: the Venetians and the knights of MALTA, who all refused to receiue it, as loath to be at so great a charge in keeping a place seruing for no greater purpose; the verie cause why the emperor was so willing to depart with it. Now Clement the great bishop had by meanes of Aloysius Grittus made a motion of a peace, to haue bene concluded for ten yeares betwixt Solyman and the Christian princes, and therupon the towne to haue been againe deliuered vnto the Turkes: which peace Solyman was not altogether vnwilling to grant, being then wholly bent to inuade the Persian king. Ferdinand was also in good hope that his brother Charles the emperor, would for the yeelding vp of that towne haue couenanted with the Turke some great matter for his benefit in HUNGARIE, which as was thought would also haue bene easily obtained. But whilest the emperor drawne diuersly with the consideration of his honor in keeping it, and of his profit in giuing it vp, stood too long in resolving; the towne in the meane time was by the Spaniards (their necessitie daily increasing) abandoned, and so left to the Turkes for nothing.

Solyman now purposing to returne his forces against the Persians, of whom hee had in the frontiers of his dominions receiued great hurt, especially in COMAGENA; renewed the league he had with the Venetians, and some other Christian princes; but of all other his affaires with the Christians, he was most carefull of the interest he had already gotten in HUNGARIE. For it was reported, that king Iohn his vassale, induced by the continuall sollicitations of his subjects, was desirous of peace with king Ferdinand, vpon condition that hee might quietly enjoy the kingdom during his life: and after his decease it to remaine to king Ferdinand and his heires. Wherefore Solyman, that nothing should be there done in his absence without his knowledge, sent Aloysius Grittus the Duke of VENETIE his sonne (of whom we haue before spoken) a man both for the honour of his house, the good carriage of himselfe, and the special commendation of Abraham the chiefe Bassa, in great credit with him: with commission as his Lieutenant to be assistant assistant vnto king Iohn, in such magnificall sort, as that without him the king might conclude nothing in matters of state, concerning either peace or warres, with any other the Christian princes. With this proud commission from the Graund seignior, Grittus entred into TRANSILVANIA, then a part of the kingdome of HUNGARIE (much about the same time that Solyman set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE against the Persian) attended vpon with seauen thousand persons of one sort and other, amongst whom were Vrbanius Batianus and Ianus Docia, two famous Hungarian capitaines with their companies, and many of the Turkes Ianizaries also. At his first comming, to make his authoritie the more knowne, he sent out his proud commaund vnto the great men and Gouvernours of the cities of that warlike prouince, charging them forthwith to reparaire vnto him as great Solymans deputie, authorised by him to heare and determine all the controuersies and matters of state concerning the kingdome of HUNGARIE. At that time Americus Cihachus bishop of VERADIVM, a man of great nobilitie and power, withall singularly well qualited, was Vayuod or gouernour of TRANSILVANIA, an honour next vnto the king: he vnderstanding that Grittus was come into his prouince, and making small halt to welcome him, as one not greatly moued with his comming, or much regarding the commandement of Solyman; wonderfully offended Grittus, who desired nothing more than at his first entrance to haue confirmed the opinion of his authoritie in the minds of the vulgar people by the prest and readie attendance of the Vayuod. But it was commonly bruted, that the stout bishop vpon a Christian zeale detested the friendship of the Turkes, and could not well brooke that they should be too much acquainted in his prouince, for feare least that fruitfull countrie abounding with men and horses, should by one meanes or other fall into their hands. Grittus was come to BAXOVIA when he vnderstood by many messengers, that the Vayuod was comming with a great traine, and lay about ten miles off, encamped with diuers gallant troupes of horsemen in warlike manner appointed: for the bishops of HUNGARIE being wonderfull rich, were by old custome bound to keep great numbres of horsemen, which as occasion serued they vied to bring into the fields against the Turke; accounting it great honour with their religious hands to defend the cause of religion. But then especially the nobilitie of the countrie well appointed, resorted on euerie side, of courtesie to honour and countenance their great bishop and Gouvernour, at whose commaundement they were: in so much as the bishops retinue made shew of a good armie. Which thing moued Grittus exceedingly, that he should be enforced contrarie to his expectation to parley with the bishop in the open fields, as with an enemy in sight of all their followers. Hereof rise enuie, a deadly mischiefe alwaies repining at another mans honor; when as the one swelling with Turkish pride could not then abide any equall, and the other jealous of his honour could by no meanes endure any superiour, in such place as he had the foueraigntie of. When these two great men had met together in the open fields, and there dined more like enemies than friends, without any shew of friendship or good will: Grittus inwardly chafed at his bare entertainment, couertly threatened to bee reuenged vpon all such as should make so light account of his authoritie: and immediatly as he departed from the banquet, taking his cap from his head (which was after the Turkish manner made of a high fashion, of rich fables) and opening it with both his hands, said, This cap will not hold two heads, and therefore it must be fitted to one, and so put it on againe. Ianus Docia one of the Hungarian capitaines, his followers, who deadly hated the Vayuod (for that he had long time before, for his malapert speech in a great assembly, given him a blow with his fist) tooke hold of that speech of Grittus, as a fit occasion for him to worke his reuenge: and said, Your honour maketh a fit comparison, neither can this prouince containe two equall gouernours or commanders, nor you euer enjoy your power and authoritie, except you doe this day with speedie and manly resolution defend both Solymans credit and your owne. You know not this proud beast Americus, whose pride and insolencie if you but say the word, I will quickly put downe: for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the king, and of you he maketh no account at all, for why he aspieth vnto the maiestie of a king, and saith that the *Vayuod*ship of TRANSILVANIA well becometh a king: for that in this countrie Decebalus the Dacian sometime reigned, whom the warlike emperor Traian with all the force of the Roman empire hardly subdued. No man can more proudly or arrogantly set himselfe forth than he, neither more craftely or cunningly dissemble to serue his turne. Indeed he hath for fashion sake presented your honour with a few simple presents, and given you his hand also, better knowne for his falshood than his faith; to the intent that when you are once past his countrie, he may scoffe and teast at your decrees: wicely he deadly enuieeth at you.

Americus bishop of Veradivm and Vayuod of Transilvania, controuerteth Grittus.

Ianus Docia incensed Grittus against the Vayuod.

A your honour and felicitie, and grudgeth in his heart, that you should set downe the lawes of peace and warre in HUNGARIE: and whereas he doth manifestly aspiere vnto a kingdome, he feareth you aboue all others, least you should trouble his designs, abate his credit, and chastise his insolencie. Verely, he that thus maligneth your happinesse, and contemneth your authoritie, is not to be suffered, but by good reason to be taken away: thereby at this your first entrance to defend the credit of your commission and honour of your name. For nothing is more dangerous than a faithlesse companion and a secret enemy; especially when you shall leaue him at your backe behind you: for when he shall as occasion serues shew forth his hidden malice, he shall so much the more stily and desperatly indanger your person. Grittus entred with his speech more than before, thought it best to make hast, & to vse his authoritie to the full; he commended Docia, and promised him in short time to requite his good will towards him, especially if he would by some notable attempt abate the bishops pride. It is reported, that Grittus gaue him no other charge but to take the bishop, that so he might after the Turkish maner haue sent him in chaines to CONSTANTINOPLE, & bestowed the honor of the Vayuod vpon Hieronimus Lasus the Polonian, who in hope of that honourable preferment vnto him promised by king Iohn, had done him great and faithfull seruice, as his embassadour both vnto Solyman and also to the French king. But when king Iohn perceived that he could not conueniently with our manifest danger place him, being a Polonian (who could scarcely speake the Hungarian language) gouernour ouer such a warlike people; he as it were enforced by necessitie, preferred this Americus the bishop of VERADIVM, a man of them both reuerenced and feared: Which so grieved Lasus a man of great stomacke and experience, and thereunto excellently learned, that he would neuer admit any excuse of the kings, but alwaies after complained that he was by the king deluded. Yet for all that, he kept himselfe within the bounds of loyalty, and enjoyed certaine lands and townes which the king had giuen him in the borders of POLONIA; and estranged neuertheless from him in mind, was now become one of Grittus his followers, hoping of his better preferment by his meanes vnto Solyman; and for that cause was not so forward to doe the king such seruice as he had in times past. Now by the commandement of Grittus, a strong companie of Turkish horsemen, and certaine troupes of Hungarians, were deliuered to Docia, who secretly departing that night from BAXOVIA, came suddenly to the Vayuods campe, hauing a little before by his Hungarian spies learned that he lay in the open fields in his tent, by reason of the great heat, without any watch or guard, attended on only with his pages and household seruants, as a man without feare; and that all the rest of his retinue lay dispersed in the countrey villages round about. All which serued so well for Docia his purpose, that the Vayuod ignorant of his death so nigh at hand, who rather contemned than feared his enemies, was suddenly oppressed by Docia his souldiours: so that whilest he was yet lying in his bed, and scarcely well awaked by his chamberlaines and the noise of the enemy; Docia breaking into his tent, cut off his head as he lay. All they which lay neere, amazed with the suddennesse of the matter, fled away for feare, and left their horses and other things for a prey to the Turkes, and other of Docia sent to Grittus his followers. Docia hauing done so great an outrage, returned to Grittus presenting vnto him the Vayuods head, which he brought in his hand by the care. Lasus was then present, but altogether ignorant of the murder, who as a man moued with a naturall compassion in so sudden and horrible a fact, and forgetting all former grudge (as in like case it oftentimes chaunceth) stood as one dismaied, nothing reioycing at the vnworthie death of his enemy. To whom Grittus turning himselfe said, Lasus, Doe'st thou not know this shauen pate, truly it is a great mans head, but of such a one as was verie ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Lasus replied, Truly though I loued him not, yet I thought it not so whilest it stood vpon his shoulders: disallowing therein the crueltie of the fact. Which thing Grittus perceiuing, began to repent him, of that was done, and said openly, That although he was worthily slaine, yet he could haue wished rather to haue had him taken prisoner: The report of this horrible murder on the bruted abroad, the bishops kinsmen and friends, yea almost all the people of that prouince rising in armes against Grittus, to reuenge the death of the reuerend bishop, whom liuing they had both loued and feared: Neuer did any people in reuenge of a common wrong, enter into armes with greater desire, more heat, or quicker speed: so that in a few daies there were assembled together fortie thousand horse and foot, vnder the leading of Stephanus Maylat a noble gentleman, who of all other most honored the bishop, and in that common grieue tooke vpon him as chiefe, the persecuting of the authors of such inhumane crueltie. Grittus perceiuing how grievously the matter matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himselfe what course were best for him to take. To go forward, and to fall into the hands of the furious people, the same was present death; and to returne and leaue the honourable deputation he had with so great expectation of all men taken vpon him, was vnto his aspiring mind no lesse torment than death it selfe. Thus perplexed, he with al speed got himselfe with his followers to the strong town of Mogin, in hope to shroud himselfe vntill such time as the rage of the country people were either of it selfe appeased (as it oftentimes falleth out in such sudden tumults) or else he might be relieved by king John, or the Turkes Sanzacks which had the charge of the frontiers of the Turkish empire. The townsmen of Mogin seeing Gritus accompanied with so many Turkes, shut the gates against him: yet at length by the persuation of the two Hungarian captaines Docta and Batianus, they gaue him leaue to enter into the bafe towne, hauing before retired themselues with all their substance vnto the higher towne, which in manner of a strong castle commanded the lower. Here whilest Gritus with all carefulnesse fortieth the place, and dispatcheth the messengers vnto his friends abroad for aid; his enemies with hideous noise & outcries approaching the town, at their first comming attempted to haue scaled the wals and rampiers thereof: which thing whilest they disorderly did, with greater furie than discretion, they were easily repulsed and many of them slaine by the Turkes Ianizaries and harquebusiers. After which losse, by the direction of Maylat their Generall, they withdrew themselues out of the danger of the shot, and encamped on euerie side of the towne, hoping as the truth was, that their enemies vnprouided of victuall could not long hold the place, but must of necessitie either starue with famine or yeeld it vp. In the meane time Gritus resolutely enduring all the calamities of a man besieged, fell sicke, and so much the more for that he could heare nothing of any aid which he expected fro his friends: For king John glad in his mind of the distresse of the ouerfer, or rather competitor of his kingdom; and also knowing that he could not without great discontentment of his subjects oppose himselfe against such a multitude risen vpon so iust a cause, yet for fashion sake sent certaine troupes of horsemen to his reliefe: who not altogether ignorant of the kings mind, made such hast, as men that purposed not to come in time to doe him good. As for the Turkes Sanzacks of Belgrade and Samandria, they enuying at his homage, flatly refused to depart from their charge to relieue him, without expresse commaund from Solyman himselfe: and Laschus (before one of Gritus his chiefe followers, but now a beholder of his distresse) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him some reliefe as he promised, did now in this extremitie forsake him also. The citizens in the vpper towne, who a great while had stood looking on from above as men indifferent; perceiuing the full resolution of their countrey men to be reuenged, and the difficulties wherewith the Turkes were inclosed, assailed them also from the high towne. Gritus thus beset on euerie side, offered vnto the Transiluanians a great masse of money, to suffer him to passe forward into Hungarie: but their furious minds more desirous of reuenge than money, were not to be moued with any gold. In fine he sent rich jewels vnto the Governour of Moldavia his friend, to be readie at a certain houre when he would fallie out of the towne, to receiue him with certaine troupes of horsemen; so if it were possible to saue himselfe and his children. Gritus (whether it were vpon a doubtfull hope, or vrged by inevitable destinie) fallie out of the towne at the appointed time, with Solyman's commission in his hand, and misling of the Moldavian, fell vpon Francis Schenden the late bishops nigh kinsman; and Maylat his familiar friend; who furiously running in vpon him with tumultuous speech, violently raught from his head his rich cap of Sables, and with his horsemen tooke him, being weake with sickness and making no resistance. His followers, especially the Turkes, encloed on euerie side, were either slaine or taken. But Gritus himselfe being brought to the Generals tent, beset round with his armed enemies, and there examined, Why he had commaunded the Vayvods to be slaine: earnestly protested, That he neuer commaunded any such thing, and that it was done without his knowledge. Which his answer serued not his turne, all the people crying out against him with one voice, that he should as a sacrifice be offered vnto the Vayvods ghost. Whereupon he was by Maylat deliuered againe to Francis Schenden to be executed, who without delay caused his head to be stricke off. The nobilitie and the Vayvods kinsmen (after the manner of that people) dipped some part of their garments in his blood, the longer to keepe in mind the remembrance of the reuenge. This was the shamefull end of Aloysius Gritus the duke of Venice his sonne, Solyman's deputie in Hungarie, with whom he was in such credit as neuer was any Christian, abounding in wealth and worldly felicitie: but climbing too fast vp the euill staired ladder of ambition, suddenly fell and neuer rose more. The executioner stripping his dead bodie, found about him so many pretious stones and jewels as were valued at fortie millions of duckats. And not long after, Lafus sent for by the king to Byzantia was straightly examined vpon torture concerning Gritus his commission and purposes, and was in great danger of his life: but at last by the intercession of Sigismund king of Polidonia he was set at libertie, and so fled out of Hungarie vnto Sigismund his countie. Piotom who after hee had long time wearied himselfe and aduentured his life in the Hungarian state, Docta the author of this Tragedie, was by the furious people afterwards rent in peeces and so perished. The same time that Gritus went from Constantinople into Hungarie, Solyman the Turkish Emperour dreading no danger out of Exar, took in hand two great expeditions both at one time, the one by land into Asia against the Persians, and the other by sea into Affricke against the Moores: promising vnto himselfe in this inhospitable deserts the monarchie of the whole world in short time, if he might subdue those two great nations whom he had already in hope deuoured. But for as much as all cannot be told at once, which was at one time in diuers places so farre distant done; omitting for a while the expedition made in person himselfe against the Persians, we will first declare what he did by his lieutenants against the Moores. Haridenus surnamed of the Christians Barbarussa, who succeeded his elder brother Horruccius in the kingdom of Alexandria in Affricke, had by many victories so enlarged the kingdom before gotten by his brother, that his name and power was now become terrible both to the Christians and wild Moores; and his fame grown great in the Turkish court, was the chiefe author and persuer of Solyman to invade Affricke. But it shall not (as I thinke) be far from our purpose here briefly to rehearse by what means those two Mexilene brethren, basely borne, crept out of a small gallie vnto the maiestie of great kings, that herein they which come afterwards may also admire the wonderfull changes and chances of these worldly things, now vp, now downe, as if the life of man were not of much more certaintie than a stage play. These two brethren, Horruccius and Haridenus, bothe at Mexilene in the Island of Lesse, so wearie of the poore and bafe estate they led at home with their father, a renegade Grecian; stealing a little gallie, committed themselues and all the hope of their good fortune to sea, where by chance they comforted themselues with Camales, a most famous pyrat of that time, vnder whom Horruccius the elder brother for his forwardnesse became a captain: and growing rich by many purchases, and also strong with gallies and slaues which he had at sundrie times taken, and at last comforting himselfe with Haidin, Sinam the Jew, Salco, and other lesse pyrates, which afterwards became men of great fame and account, ouer whom he commaunded as an arch pyrat, came seeking after purchase as far as Mavritania. At which time Selymes king of Libia Casaria, which now we call Algers, was in armes against his brother Mechemetes, competitor of the kingdom: who aided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, put his brother in great doubt of his estate. Selymes glad of the coming of Horruccius & the other pyrats his followers, with a great masse of money paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the rest to take vpon them the defence of him and his kingdom against his brother: VVhich thing Horruccius so happily performed, especially by the meanes of his harquebusiers, as then no small terror to the wild Moores and Numidians, that in short time he repulsed that savage people, and set Selymes at peace in his kingdom. Horruccius being a man of a sharpe wit, and by nature ambitious, noting in the time of his seruice the kings mild and simple disposition, void of all distrust; and that the naked Moores were no souldiors, but a light and ynconstant people, alwayes at variance among themselues; and that the wandering Numidians liuing barely, decuded into many factions, were easily by reward to be wooon, or by force constrained: suddenly falsified his faith, and villanously slew Selymes the king, as he was bathing himselfe, mistrusting nothing lesse than the falshood of the pyrat; and in the same hurle murdering such as he thought would withstand his desire, and with bountie and crueltie ouercomming the rest, so wrought the matter, that he was by generall consent chosen king of Algers. Thus of a pirat become a king, he shortly after by policie surprised Cirello, a famous citie (about sixtie miles distant from Algers) by his souldiors sent thither in the habite of marchants. After that, he by his brother Haridenus (no lesse valiant than himselfe) troubled all the Medeterranian sea from Algers with his gallies, & all his neighbors: himselfe by land with daily incursions, leauing nothing vntoucht which which might by force or policie be had: so that his power dayly increased, men of seruice continually resorting vnto him, as the cheefe man in all those parts. Not thus contented, he resolved to enlarge his kingdome, draue the Spaniards out of Bvda, a citie famous both for the great trade thither, and for the Mahometane schoole: sometime there kept; at the taking whereof, he lost his right hand with a shot, and in stead thereof ever after used a hand of yron, wherewith hee obtained many worthie victories against his enemies: for neere to Alexandria hee ouerthrew an armie of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vars their generall. And shortly after, at such time as Hugo Moncada returning out of ITALIE with the old Spanishe souldiours, landed in his countrey, hee enforced him againe to sea; where he with all his expert souldiours either perished by shipwracke, or driuen on shore, were slaine or taken prisoners by Horrucius, and thrust into his gallies. A litle hauing in sundrie battels overcome the king of TRAMISSA, Charles the emperor his confederat, and thrust him out of his kingdome, he stirred vp both the Christians and Numidians against him: so that comming to take ORA and PLOTVS, two strong holds kept by garisons of Spaniards sent thither to aid the king of TRAMISSA, he was by them and the Moores at the first repulsd, and afterwards quite ouerthrowne: where most part of his armie being slaine or taken prisoners, he with a few of his friends sought to saue themselves by flight over the desert lands; and seeing himselfe hardly pursued by his enemies, scattered many peces of gold vpon the lands as he fled, thereby to haue staied their hastie pursute: but they more desirous of him than of his gold, followed so fast, that at the last they ouertooke him, and without further delay stricke off his head, which was afterwards sent into SPAIN, and carried vpon a launce thorow all the townes and cities alongst the sea coast; to the wonderfull reioycing of the people; vnto whom he had in former time done great harme.

After the death of Horrucius, Hariadenus inferior to his brother neither in courage nor martiall prowesse, by the generall consent of the souldiours tooke vpon him the kingdome of ALGERS. He, made hither not onely of his brothers kingdome; but of his vertues and haue thoughts, and of the surname also of Barbarussa, began forthwith to aspire vnto the empire of all that part of AFRICK, accounting what he had already gotten; too little and too base to answer his desires. Wherefore he entred into armes, and became a terror both to the Moores and Numidians, holding peace with some, and warres with others, as best serued his purpose; and with his gallies robbed and spoiled the coasts of SPAIN, SARDINIA, and the Islands BALARES; fortune to fauouring him in all his enterprises, that he became both famous and fearefull vnto his enemies. He slew Hamet, a great commander among the Numidians, & chased Benchades and Amida, two of their greatest princes, out of the countrey: and with like fortune at sea ouercame Hugo Moncada, a famous Spaniard, who sore wounded, had much adoe to saue himselfe by flight, when he had lost diuers of his gallies. He also in battell at sea ouerthrew Rodericus Portundus, admirall of SPAIN: in which fight the admirall with his sonne were both slaine, and seuen of his gallies taken: In token of which victorie, he sent part of the rich spoile there taken with the admirals ensigne, as a present vnto Solyman, whereby he became famous in the Turkes court; but much more after he had repulsd Auria from CERCENNA, and taken two great Genoway ships which were comming to Auria loaded with men and munition, the losse whereof filled the citie of GENVA with much sorrow. All things sorting thus according to his desire, and his name become no lesse terrible in SPAIN, ITALIE, SICILIE, and the Islands of the Mediterranean, than it was in the greatest part of AFRICK; Solyman grieved with the losse of CORONE, PATRAS, and the castles vpon the straits of LEPANTO, taken from him by Auria, Himerales his admirall being shamefully put to flight by the counsell of his Bassaes, but especially of Abraham the cheefe Bassa, sent embassadours vnto him to ALGERS, offering him the greatest honours of his court, and to make him admirall of all his fleet, if hee would forthwith repaire vnto CONSTANTINOPLE: for why he was the onely man in all mens iudgements, who for his yeares and great experience at sea, as well as for his inuincible courage and glorie of his late atchieued kingdome, was to be compared with Auria, and to bee opposed against the Christian fleet. Sinas a great man in Solymans court, was with this embassage sent, and speedily transported to ALGERS by Mangalis, a famous pyrat, then gouernour of the RHODES: who at his landing was honourably receiued by Barbarussa, and audience giuen him. Barbarussa vnderstanding the cause of his comming, was exceeding glad thereof, presently conceiuing no small hope of obtaining the Monarchie of AFRICK, if he might once come to Solymans presence, and

A and at large shew vnto him the state of AFRICK, and power of the Christians, with their continuall discord amongst themselves. Wherefore without further delay committing the protection of his sonne Afenes, (then aboute eightene yeares old) and the gouernment of his new gotten kingdome to Kamada and Agis, two of his nigh kinsmen and assured friends, of whose fidelitie he doubted not: he with fortie of his owne gallies, in most warlike manner appointed, set forward with Solymans embassadour towards CONSTANTINOPLE, where by the way hee met with a fleet of Genoway ships bound for SICILIE for coine, which after a sharpe and cruell fight he tooke and burnt. After that, landing by night in the Island of ELBA, not farre from NAPLES, he suddenly surpris'd RHEVMA, a rich citie; where loading his gallies with the wealth thereof, and carying away with him all the inhabitants into captiuitie, he arrived at CONSTANTINOPLE in the yeare 1533, where he was by the great courtiers brought to Solyman, of whom he was joyfully receiued, if it were but for the presents which he gaue him: which were fair boyes and young maidens sumptuously apparelled, euniches, and wild beasts of LYBIA, as Lyons, Leopards, and such like. But after he had certaine daies discoursed at large with the great Bassaes of the state of AFRICK, the strength of the Christians, and how the warres were to be managed, he was afterwards by them seldomer sent for, and offering himselfe into their companie, was hardly admitted: for enuie (the inseparable companion of growing honour) had quickly ouertaken him in the court, so that many men letted not openly to say, That it had not bene the fashion of the Othoman kings to preferre pyrats (the worst kind of theecs) to the honour of their great Admirall; and that there wanted not, neither euer would want men both vertuous and valiant in the Turkes court, which could with great honour maintaine and augment the glorie of the Turkish empire both by sea and land, whereas he had against all right and conscience, by shamefull treacherie intruded himselfe into another mans kingdome in AFRICK, and there persecuted the Mahometane princes and people, being of no religion himselfe, as one that was borne of a renegat Greeke, and had from his youth liued as a mercilesse pyrat, and common enemy of mankind. By which speeches, Barbarussa well perceiued in how euill time Abraham Bassa his best friend, and by whose meanes he was sent for, was absent from the court: who at that time was gone into COMAGENA, and wintered at ALBPO, with purpose (as Solyman fore-runner) with the first of the Spring to passe ouer Euphrates against the Persian. After long suite and much expectation, Solyman answered Barbarussa by Alex and Casimes, two of the great Bassaes, That all the matter concerning him should be referred to the discretion of Abraham the cheefe Bassa, for that hee was by his counsell especially sent for into AFRICK: wherefore if he did expect any thing, he should repaire vnto him into SIRIA, that according to his graue judgement all things might be ordered. Barbarussa thus rejected into SIRIA, although he well perceiued that it tended to his no small disgrace: yet in hope by sufferance to obtaine another kingdome, seemed contented with the answer, and resolved forthwith to take vpon him that long and painefull journey, which the old king lustily performed: and so posting by land thorow ASIA the lesse, and traueilling ouer the mountaine AMANVS, then couered with deepe snowe, came in the dead time of Winter to ALBPO in SIRIA, where hee was honourably receiued of the great Bassa, and heard at large, to his so good contentation and liking, that he deemed him of all others the fittest to command the Turkes power at sea, and to that purpose writ commendatorie letters in his behalfe to Solyman; wishing him for his sufficiency to place him as the fourth with the other three Bassaes of his counsell. After Barbarussa was againe arrived at CONSTANTINOPLE with these letters, and that it was once knowne how effectually the cheefe Bassa had commended him to Solyman, it was a world to see, how vpon the sudden the face of the court was changed vpon him, euery man either for friendship or flatterie begun now to speake of his praises, and to extoll his worthinesse: who was now in all mens mouths but Barbarussa? so great was the power & authoritie of the cheefe Bassa, that being absent, yet was his approbation of all men accounted sufficient to preferre whom he pleased; & his letters lawes to the rest of the court, Barbarussa had brought with him from ALGERS one Rosettes, the elder brother of Mulcastes, king of TYNES, who wrongfully driuen into exile by his younger brother, had liued certaine yeares at ALGERS; but now by the persuation of Barbarussa was come with him to CONSTANTINOPLE to craue aid of Solyman against the oppression of his brother. Him Barbarussa oftentimes shewed vnto the great Bassaes, and in his discourses with them concerning the conquest of AFRICK, set him out as a most fit instrument for subduing of the kingdome of TYNES.

as a man whom the people more affected than they did Muleasses the usurper. After long deliberation and consultation had with the Bassas, concerning the inuasion of AFRICK, Barbarussa now admitted vnto the presence of Solyman, in these or like words perswaded him to that warre, for the entrance whereinto we haue thus farre digressed.

What thing the priests with lowd voice vse to pray for, at such time as the Ottoman emperours enter into the temple to pray, the same thing doe I also wish vnto thee most mightie Solyman, which is, That thou shouldest remember, thy progenitors by iustice and religion to haue got for thee this empire, than which, more magnificent or richer the gods haue not giuen to any: for fortune hath neuer deceiued them that tread that way, and thou hether to hast so traced their steps, that thou hast easily surmounted their fame and glorie, administering iustice to thy subiects; and inflamed with the hope of eternall praise, making continuall warre against the enemies of our religion, the true office of a zealous prince. By this meanes is BELGRADE taken, RHODES woon, the king of HUNGARIE slaine in battell, GERMANIE twice harried and burnt: so that Charles, whom the Christians would make equall to thy selfe in power and valour, with the great aid almost of all the Christian nations, perished with the noise of thy armie, shunned battell. But for as much as empires be they neuer so large, or victories be they neuer so glorious, can either satisfie the greatnesse of an heroicall mind, or glut the same with glorie: thou hast therefore sent before thee thy victorious ensignes against the Persians and Parthians, that those nations who haue wickedly fallen from our rites, purified as it were by thy sacred armes, may be againe reclaimed to the auncient rites of our religion. But be this vnto thy greatest most honourable to attempt, and glorious to performe: let it only be lawfull for me now growne an old man in the midst of armes and dangers, to declare what is expedient, and briefly to open such things as I haue by long experience learned to concerne the augmenting of thy fame and empire elsewhere. Neither would I haue you to take this as presumptuously spoken of me: for fortune hath enough, yea and more than enough fauoured my designes, whom from a poore cottage and bare hope, she hath promoted to glorious victories, great riches, yea vnto the title and maiestie of a king. But vnto these things the gods could giue me nothing better than to be called for of thee, and sent for, in counsell to discourse of matters of greatest importance: wherefore my aduise shall bee vnto thee faithfull, and with experience confirmed; which although it be all that it seemeth old men can doe, yet in my sound bodie remaineth such strength, that I dare both promise and performe vnto thee my good service at all affaires both by sea and land. For vnto this onely course haue I bent my selfe day and night from my youth (following the purpose & counsell of my valiant brother Horrucius, who to extend the bounds of our religion, persecuted the Christians both by sea and land) desiring nothing more, than that thy fleet and power might once be ioined with my forces and direction, and so vnder thy good hap to be either a commander, or els commaunded: for as much as it grieueth me not to be commaunded by my betters: of which my desires if the gods shall make me partaker, the Spaniards shall shortly be driven quite out of AFRICK, thou shalt heare that the Moors are gone ouer into SPAIN to repossesse the kingdom of GRANADO, that TYNES and NUMIDIA are at thy commaund, and not to speak of SARDINIA and CORSICA, that SICILIA is ours: which once taken, we shall starue up ITALIE, and on every side distresse it with our fleet, being now weake and brought low by the discord of the princes, and that part thereof both towards SICILIA and MACEDONIA readie to submit it selfe vpon any condition, so it might cast off the Spanish yoke. Thinke not that either that strength or unitie is now in ITALIE, which was when thy great grandfather Mahomet hauing taken HYDRUNTUM, brought a great feare not vpon ITALIE onely, but vpon other the Christian nations also: For by the good successe of that warre, which all the Christian princes could hardly withstand, he had undoubtedly taken the citie of ROME, and so according to right and reason againe vntied the empire of the East and of the West, as they were before in their auncient glorie: But hee suddainly left the world, rapt to heauen, that he might leaue to thee (according to the appointment of the fatal destinies and reuolutions of the heauens) this worke of absolute perfection. And yet my purpose is not by putting thee in hope of so great and rare a triumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power into the East against thy old and irreligious enemies, deseruing all extremities: for thy nauie shall be sufficient for me, whereof thou shalt haue no need in thy warres so farre within land, that whilst thou art conquering ASIA, AFRICA the third part of the world may in the meane time be brought vnder thy subiection also. Where before all other things, Muleasses is to be driven out of TYNES, a man of insatiable couctousnesse, vnstayed lust, horrible crueltie, hated both of God and man: who hauing

A by treacherie slaine eightene of his brethren, or that which worse is, cruelly burnt out their eyes, doth forsake alone, that he hath left him neither kinsman nor friend: For being as unthankfull as perfidious, he hath murdered all his fathers friends, who with great trauell had preferred him to the kingdom, so to make short payment for so great desert. With this beast we must haue to doe, whom whilst no man loveth, all men easily wish to perishe. The Numidians trouble him with daily inuasions, whose iniuries the infamous coward endureth with such shame and reproach, that it should seeme he had rather to suffer them than reuenge them. And yet this effeminate disdardeth in chains many valiant Turkes, and acknowledgeth not your imperiall name, whereunto all men on euery side sue for grace: and which is not to be suffered, exceedingly fauoureth the Spaniards at TRIPOLIS, to the intent that Agis and Moses, two valiant Turkish captaines, may be driven out of the citie. B This wild beast disarmed of his claws and teeth, we shall easily destroy, if it be but for that we haue with us Rofcetes his brother, whom the Numidians wish and long for: him must we vse, if it be but for a shew, so shall the thing we desire be without bloud effected, as soone as we shall but present our selues before the gates of TYNES. Then shall it be at your pleasure to appoint whom you will haue to gouerne the Numidian kingdom: it shall be vnto me glorie enough, when the greatest part of AFRICK conquered, shall be peaceably deliuered into your hands at your returne with the triumphs of PERSIA. But by the way as I returne, I assure you vpon mine owne priuaty so to vse the matter, that the Christians shall also haue good cause to bewaile their calamities: and if I hap to meet with Auria, he shall haue smal cause to reioyce of the mischiefe he hath done: for him alone I challenge to persecute as my proper and peculiar enemy, both for the remembrance of the harmes we haue receiued at his hands, and for the desight I haue at his same; who once taken out of the way, the seas shall be open onely to you and your fleets. And beleene me, he that shall be able to commaund the seas, shall easily also subdue the kingdoms by land.

But Solyman, who after the manner of wise princes vsed well to consider, and afterward with ripe iudgement to resolute of such matters as he had with attentive care hearkened vnto; commending Barbarussa for his forwardnesse in his seruice, for that time brake vp the counsell. Not long after a decree was made, according to Abraham the great Bassa his aduise, That Barbarussa should be joynd as fourth with the other three chiefe Bassas of Solymans counsell, and be made great Admirall: so that all the islands, ports, and people all alongst the sea coast thorow out Solymans empire, should be at his commaund, and that it should be lawfull for him to take vp such matriners and souldiours for seruice at sea, as pleased him in what place soeuer. This being solemnly proclaimed, Solyman with his owne hand deliuered him a scepter and a sword, willing him by worthie deeds to performe what he had promised. After which Aiax and Cassimes the two great Bassas, with the captain of the Ianizaries, brought him with exceeding pompe from the court to the Nauie: at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And toward the maintenance of that warre at sea, he had deliuered vnto him out of Solymans treasures eight hundred thousand duckets, and eight hundred Ianizaries.

But for as much, as much it was that he did in the seruice of Solyman, and more is of him hereafter to be spoken; it shall not be amisse here to present vnto the view of the world the sterne, E but liuely countenance of this so famous a man (who liuing kept all the Mediterranean in feare) as it is by Boisardus exprested, together with the Elogium following.

Barbarussa sped of that he desired, staid not long after at CONSTANTINOPLE, but departing out of HEBSPONTVS with eightie gallies and certaine galliots, shap'd his course towards ITALIE; leaving Amurathes (a sea captaine) with twelue gallies to transport Solymán and his armie, readie to set forward against the Persian, ouer that narrow sea into ASIA. Who after hee had so done, ouertooke Barbarussa at MATHONE, who holding on his course to AFRICK, and sodainly passing the strait betwixt ITALIE and SICILIE, brought a great feare vpon both the countries; but passing by the bay of HIPPONA alongst the coast of the lower CALABRIA, he set vpon the towne of S. Lucidius called in auncient time TAMPESA: which although it stood vpon a rocke, and was reasonable well walled; yet such was the violence of the Turkes assault, that it could not be defended but was taken, with so much more hurt to the inhabitants, for that the

A Maio of the towne to keepe the people from flying away, had lockt vp the gates on the other side of the citie from the enemy. From thence he with rich spoile and many prisoners went to CITRARIUM, where he had learned of his prisoners, a fleet of gallies was in building. This towne forsaken of the inhabitants for feare, he tooke without resistance, ransacked and burnt it, where he also fired seauen gallies not yet altogether finished. But after he was come with his fleet as farr as the island CAPRI within the sight of NAPLES, such a terrout was stricke into the minds of all that dwelt alongst that coast, that it was thought if he had landed and gone directly to NAPLES, the Neapolitanes would for feare haue abandoned the citie. But holding on his course, he came to PROCHITA, which he tooke and rifled; so passing by the port of CAIETA, which he might easily haue taken; he came to SPRLVNCA, a towne in the hitherto part of the kingdome of NAPLES. They of the towne dismayed with the suddain arrivall of so great a fleet, yelded the same without resistance. The enemy entering the towne, tooke twelue hundred prisoners. Pelagrus a chiefe man amongst them of SPRLVNCA was fled into the castle; him Barbarussa commaunded to yeeld, which if he would presently doe, he promised to let him go free; but if he should stand vpon his defence, he threatned in short time to make him repent his foolish hardnesse with the viter destruction both of himselfe and the towne. The fearefull gentleman without delay, came out of the castle, and fell downe at his feet; who according to his promise gaue him his libertie, and with rare courtesie restored to him his wife, his sonne, and niece, whom hee had taken prisoners, who receiued them with many teares falling from their eyes for ioy.

C The same night also two thousand Turkes came from the fleet thorow the rough and bushie mountaines to the citie FVNDI, ten miles distant from SPRLVNCA, in the vttermost borders of the kingdome of NAPLES, conducted as was thought by certaine Italians of that countrey; who a few yeares before taken at sea, and ouerweatied with the heauie burthen of the Turkish slaue, had reuolted to the Mahometane religion. But such was the suddennesse of their coming, and their celeritie in entering the citie, that Julia Gonzaga the paragon of ITALIE, and the chiefe prise which they sought after, had scarce time to get to horse halfe naked, and so with much difficultie to escape into the mountaines. It is reported, that Barbarussa (which thing he himselfe afterwards seemed not to denie) moued with the fame of her incomparable beautie and wonderfull perfection, desired exceedingly to haue taken her as a present for Solymán. The citizens D were for most part either slaine or taken prisoners by the Turkes; who loded with the spoile of the citie, returned againe to the fleet. Another part of Barbarussa's fleet came to TARRACINA, which the Turkes tooke forsaken of the inhabitants, who for feare were all fled into the mountaines, except some which for age or sicknesse could not shift for themselves, whom the Turkes slew and spoiled the churches. Barbarussa thus scouring alongst the coast of ITALIE, and newes thereof daily brought to the citie of ROME, stricke such an exceeding terrout into the minds of the citizens, that it was verily thought if he had come but a little farther to OSTIA, they would generally haue forsaken the citie. But he hauing well performed his promise made to Solymán for vexing the Christians, and before resolued of a greater matter he had to doe; when he had watered at PONTIA, passed ouer into AFRICK with such celeritie, that he was arriued there before it was thought that he was departed from the coast of ITALY. For Barbarussa to deceiue E Muleasses king of TVNES, and to take him vnprovidid, had giuen it out that he would burne and spoile the coasts of the Christian countries, especially of ITALY, LIOVRIA, and SPAIN, in reuenge of the harme done by Auria at CORONE and PATRAS. Which thing Muleasses the rather beleeued, vnderstanding his proceedings vpon the coast of ITALY. The Venetians hauing also at the same time at great charges prepared a great fleet, did in some part lessen Muleasses feare, that Barbarussa would employ his forces for AFRICK; for then what should the Venetians haue needed to haue made so great and chargeable a preparation. But that which about all other things brought him into securitie, was for that he had by secree espials certainly learned, that his brother Rosetes was kept at CONSTANTINOPLE, as a prisoner at large, vnder safe keeping: which made him to thinke that Barbarussa's forces were not prepared against him, for he knew that he could not be impugned, or his state more endangered by any other means than by producing the competitor of his kingdome, to whom his guiltie conscience doubted, that both the citizens of TVNES and the Numidians were for most part well affected.

This Muleasses of whom we now speake, and whom hereafter we shall by occasion often remember, was lineally descended of the auncient kings of Tunes; who without interruption of G discent or mixture of forraine blood, had by the space of nine hundred fiftie and foure yeares mightily ruled the great kingdom of TUNES, from TRIPO LIS to BYOTA, almost eight hundred miles alongst the Mediterranean, and into the maine as farre as the mount ATLAS; and for the long continuance of their state, and largeness of their kingdom, were worthily accomted the most reuerend and mightie amongst the Mahometane kings of AFRICK. His father Mahometes, when he had with much glorie and more pleasure reigned two and thirtie yeares, perceiuing the end of his life to approach, had purposed to haue appointed Maimo his eldest sonne (whom for his hastie aspiring he then held in durance) to succeed him in his kingdom.

Solyman the Magnificent,

But ouercome with the importunitie of Lentigesia his wife, a woman of haucie spirit, who had by reward made a strong faction in the court for her sonne Muleaffes, he altered his former pur- H pose, and appointed him his successour: by whom (as it was thought) the small remainder of his owne old yeares was shortened; Maimo the right heire of the kingdom in prison, presently murdered; seuentene of his other brethren vnmmercifully executed; and three other, Barcha, Beoneth, and Saeth, with more than barbarous crueltie, with a hoat yron of their sight deprived; only Roscetes the second brother, and Abdemelech, escaping the hands of their vnnaturall brother, fled to Morhabitus a great prince amongst the Numidians; whither also their brothers malice persecuted them, seeking sometime by practise, sometime by poison to haue taken them away, and at last for a great summe of money to haue had them deliuered into his hands: Which money they Numidian receiued, but suffered the distressed princes as if they had escaped against his will, to flie further to another Numidian prince a friend of his, called Bentieses: where Mule- I affes by like practises as before fought to haue destroyed them, or to haue got them into his owne power. Thus chased by their brothers endlesse malice from prince to prince, and place to place, they for their more safetie fled at last to the citie of BISCARIS farre into the maine land: where Abdemelech as one wearie of the world, gaue ouer all and betooke himselfe to a solitarie life, and became a melancholy Mahometane monke. But Roscetes courteously entertained by Abdalla prince of that citie, found such fauour in his sight, that he gaue him his daughter in marriage, and long time honourably maintained him as his sonne in law, with such carefulnesse, that for feare of Muleaffes practises, he was seldome permitted to eat any other meat but such as the prince or his wife had before tasted of. Muleaffes thus reigning and raging, and yet not contented with the death of so many of his brethren, proceeded further, and murdered diuers of their children K also. He caused also the Manifest and Mesuar, men of greatest authoritie in all the kingdom, his fathers graue counsellors and his cheefe friends, by whose meanes especially he had aspired vnto the kingdom, to be cruelly tortured to death, fearing their greatnesse, or rather as some thought greeuing to see them liue to whom he was so much beholden, and therefore rewarded them with such sharpe payment. And by the instigation of Lentigesia his mother, caused diuers of his fathers other wiues and concubines to be shamefully murdered, inuicighing oftentimes against his father, that as an effeminate prince with infinit charges had for his pleasure maintained two hundred wiues and concubines in his houses of delight, by whom he had begot so many sonnes competitours of the kingdom, that he had left him (as he said) a laborious and enuious peece of worke, to destroy so great a brood. Roscetes aided by his father in law and the other Numi- L dian princes, to whom the name of Muleaffes both for his crueltie against his owne blood, and injurious dealing against his neighbours, was become odious, passing ouer the riuer Bragada, with a great armie, neere vnto TUNES met with Muleaffes his armie, conducted by Dorax, a valiant capitaine, brother to Lentigesia: where in a sharpe conflikt he ouerthrew his brothers armie, and enforced Dorax with them that were escaped out of the battell for safegard of their liues to flie into TUNES. Roscetes pursuing the victorie, came and presented his armie before the gates of the citie, in hope that the citiens (whom he knew for the most part to hate the vsurping tyrant) would vpon the sight of him, in right their king, with so great an armie, raise some tumult in the citie, and let him in. There he lay by the space of twentie daies, still expecting some inno-uation; in which time the more to alienate the minds of the people from Muleaffes, and to shew M how vnable he was to protect them, he burnt and destroyed all the oliue and fruit trees, which grew most plentifully and pleasantly all alongst the country, from the ruines of old CARTHAGE to the wals of TUNES: which was vnto the citiens, whose greatest possessions lay there, a most heauie and lamentable spectacle. But Muleaffes had so tempered their minds with faire speeches and large promises of recompensing euery man to the full, for all such harme as they should sustaine by his brothers furie in the countrey: and beside that had the citie in such strong possession by reason of his souldiors, that the citiens either would not or could not reuolt to Roscetes.

The Numidian princes wearie of that long and vaine expectation, according to the leuitie of that nation, accounting it no shame after victorie once gotten to depart, began one after another to thinke away to their owne dwellings, perswading Roscetes also to prouide for himselfe whilest he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherefore he fearing to be betrayed by the Nu-midians, or circumvented by his cruell brother, fled to Barbarussa, then reigning at ALGIERS in great glorie, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained vntill such time as by his perswasion he went with him as is aforesaid to CONSTANTINOPLE, to craie helpe of Soly-man, by whom he was detained in safe custodie: although it was in policie giuen out by Barba-russa, that he was in the fleet, and that he should by Solymans power be restored to his fathers kingdome at TUNES.

This was the state of the kingdom of TUNES, at such time as Barbarussa with Solymans great fleet, contrarie to all mens expectation, suddenly departing from the coast of ITALIE, landed in AFRICK at BISERTA, a famous port of the kingdom of TUNES. They of BISER- Biseria greideu TA wearie of the gouernment of Muleaffes, and of themselves desirous of change, as soone as they heard the name of Roscetes, forthwith draue out their Gouernour, and receiued the Turkes into the towne. For Barbarussa had before sent certaine of Roscetes his familiar friends ashore, which bare the people in hand, that he was in the fleet, but not able yet to come on shore, for C that he was (as they said) seasicke and troubled with an ague. BISERTA thus possessed by Barba-russa, he presently departed thence: and sayling by Vrica, thirtie miles distant from BISERTA, and so keeping alongst the coast, and passing the promontorie of CARTHAGE, came before GULIETTA, a strong castle within the bay of TUNES, so placed vpon a strait, that it commaunded all the passage by sea vnto the citie of TUNES. Before this castle, Barbarussa in token of friendship, discharged all his great ordinance, which they of the castle answered with like: but being required to deliuer it vp to Roscetes, they said it should be alwayes at his commaund that ruled in the citie of TUNES. The newes of Roscetes his supposed comming, flying swiftly by land from BISERTA to TUNES, and the great fleet once discovered, set all the citie on an vtper: for the citiens were in great expectation of their new king, both for the loue of Roscetes, who had D alwayes shewed himselfe to be of a mild and bountifull nature; and also for the hatred of Mu-leaffes, whose tyrannous and couetous gouernment they thought they had too long endured.
Neither was he ignorant what report ran of himselfe, and how he had lost the hearts of his subjects, which was evidently to be scene in the eyes and countenances of the cheefe men of the ci-tie. And that which more encreased their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promie to them in time of his distresse, made them any recompence for their goodly houses and olue gardens, destroyed in the countrey by Roscetes in the former warres: wherefore at such olue gardens, destroyed in the countrey by Roscetes in the former warres: wherefore at such time as he came now out of the castle, and in the greatest assemblie of his people, began to persuade them to play the men, and to continue constant in their obedience, promising vnto them such reward as they knew he was neuer able to performe, they all departed, and left him alone:
E yeasome of them vnder the colour of friendship, and amongst them Abdahar, then Mesuar, (which was cheefe officer next vnto the king) perswaded him to giue place to his hard fortune, & forthwith to flie, for by chance at the same instant it was in euery mans mouth, that the Turkes were euen at hand: which thing caused Muleaffes, forsaken of his subjects, of himselfe fearefull, and worthily doubting to be betrayed, to flie in such hast out of the citie, that he left behind him both his treasure and jewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his enemies. The first that gave Spaniards. Fetuches presently after the flight of Muleaffes, brought out Roscetes wife and children, whom Muleaffes had long time kept in prison, & to welcome their father, placed them in the kings royall seat. Abeszes also forthwith aduertised Barbarussa of the departure of Mu-leaffes, and with what longing the people expected their desired king, wishing him without delay F to repaire vnto the citie: and for a present sent him a goodly Barbarian horse, richly furnished, and diuers others for his other cheefe capitaines. Hereupon Barbarussa without longer stay set forward with fife thousand Turkes, which he had already landed, and comming to the citie, was of the citiens joyfully receiued. But after long looking, when they could no where descerie Rosettes their supposed king, and heard nothing but the name of Solyman and Barbarussa, doubled and redoubled by the Turkes in their militarie acclamations, as they marched thorow the citie towards the castle; they began to distrust, as the truth was, that in stead of their new king whom they so much desired, they had receiued the Turkish gouernement, which they vicerly detested. Which suspicion once confirmed by certaine of Roscetes friends (whom Barbarussa had brought with him of purpose to delude the people) who grieued to see the ruine of their native country, spared not for feare of the present danger to tell their friends and acquaintance as they went, That they did in vaine looke for Roscetes, whom they had left in bonds at CONSTANTINOPLE: it was a wonder to see, how suddainely the minds of the people were changed, how speedily they ran to their weapons, and how furiously they assailed the Turkes, now learing no such matter, and were not as yett got into the castle. The cheefe leader of the citifens in this tumult, was Abdabar the Mesuar, who but a little before vpon the coming of the Turkes, by augmenting the danger, and the vnfaithfulness of his subjects, had persuaded Muleasses to flie; but now perceiuing himselfe deceived of his expectation for the coming of Roscetes, and repenting of that he had done, fought by all meanes to driue out the Turkes, and to recall Muleasses. And the more to animate the people, as he stood on high, from whence he might best be heard, he cried vnto them with a loud voice:

We are most villanously betrayed (worthie citifens) for Roscetes, whom we expected for our lawfull king, lamenteth his miserie in chaines, in prison at CONSTANTINOPLE: and we, except we presently play the men, and valiantly fight for our libertie, shall for ever serue as slaues to these forraigne and mercilesse pyrats. The present danger of our estate telleth vs, that we must presently and without delay take the occasion offered. Wherefore let all men that meane not to serue as slaues, and to be bought and sold as beasts, take up armes against the faithlesse Turkes. I my selfe will be your leader: let vs therefore all with one consent with heart and hand renenge this shamefull trecherie, defend our country and libertie with the ancient honour of the Numidians.

There was now no time to stay, euery man had betaken himselfe to his weapons; Muleasses was againe sent for, who yett itaied in the suburbs, expecting what should happen; many of the Turkes were slaine before they were aware, or feared any thing; all the citie was filled with outcries and clattering of weapons: the number of the citifens was such, as might easily haue expelled the Turkes, had they beene but reasonably armed or well conducted, which in a matter so sudden, and with men altogether ignorant of seruice, was not possible. Yett they armed with furie, and encouraged with the multitude of themselves, swarmed vp as thicke as was possible one of the bulwarkes of the castle, which they knew was easiest to be gained, where the Turkes had set vp one of their ensignes; and with the multitude of their darts and arrowes so ouerwhelmed the Turkes, that they were glad to forsake the place, and to retire farther into the castle to a place of more strength: from whence and all alongst the curtaine of the wall, they without intermission discharged their great artillerie and small shot amongst the thickest of the naked Moores, making of them a wonderfull slaughter. Barbarussa although he was a man of an invincible courage & great experience, all his life time well acquainted with desperat dangers (the dreadfull steps of aspiring minds) yett surprisid with the suddenesse of the assault, shut vp in a place whereof he yett knew not the strength, and not provided of victuall for three dayes, was with the due consideration of these difficulties, not a little troubled: which his care was by the disordered furie of his enemies, and knowne valour of his owne souldiours greatly diminished; especially when hee saw his owne men still fighting, as men full of hope and courage, and the Moores as men halfe dismayed with the wounds and slaughter of their friends, readie to retire. Howbeit, by the coming in of Muleasses and Dorax, the assault twice before giuen ouer, was againe at both times renewed, with no lesse desperat furie than at the first, and the Turkes hardly charged. In this dangerous assault Halus of MALIGA, a renegade Spaniard, but a most expert souldior, turning himselfe to Barbarussa, said:

If thou wilt saue thine honour, and hold this fort, we must sallie out vpon this enemy, which ha-ving neuer scene a set battell, but onely acquainted with light skirmishes, will not be able to endure our charge at hand; but shall in a moment know the price of their foolish hardinesse: who as brainesicke men could neither endure the gouernment of their cruell king, ne yett thankfully receive the authors of their deliuerance and libertie.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the generall approbation of the cheefest captaines, taines, Barbarussa commaunded Halus the author of that counsell, with certaine other captaines and their companions, at one instant to sallie out at two ports of the castle: which they so relolutely performed, that in short time a wonderfull number of the naked Moores lay dead vpon the ground.

Abdabar the Mesuar himselfe, was there shot thorow with a bullet and slaine: whereupon the assault was quite giuen ouer, the Moores retreating by companies backe into the citie, and the Turkes still pursuing them: where, in the streets for certaine houres, was fought a most cruell and bloudie battell. At last the citifens ouercome, forsooke the open streets, and betooke them to the refuge of their houses; not so carefull of their king, as of themselves, their wiues and children. And Halus with the rest, wearied with the slaughter of his enemies, and overcome with labour, heat, and thirst, returned with victorie vnto the castle. It is reported that there was aboue three thousand of the citifens slaine that day, and thrise as many hurt. Muleasses thus discouraged, and vtterly despairing to recover the citie; hardly escaped his enemies hands, and overcome with this vncke Dorax, with whom he fled ouer the riuer Bagrada, and came in safetie to CONSTANTINA (called of old time CYRTA): the ancient seat of the Numidian kings, but then a part of Dorax his dominion; where he was honorably maintained and protected vntill the coming of Charles the emperour into AFRICA. The night ensuing this battell, and the flight of the king, was restless both to the citifens and the Turkes, each of them for feare of other standing vpon their strongest guard.

The next day the citifens discouraged with the losse of so many of their kinsmen and friends, and hauing no king now for whom they should fight, craued pardon of Barbarussa for their rash attempt, excusing it by the name of loyaltie to their ancient kings; offering to submit themselves vnto him with all faithfulness. Which their offer he willingly accepted, knowing that he was not able to keepe that place with his souldiors three daies, for lacke of victuall: so that all his hope and victorie gotten, might easily be ouerthrowne and brought to nought, if the citifens moued and either with desperation or desire of reuenge, should joyne with the other Numidian princes, and besiege him in the castle. Whereupon a generall peace was granted, and by soleme oath on both sides confirmed, whereby the citifens expresse bound themselves to the obedience of Solyman, and to Barbarussa as his lieutenant. All things thus set in order in the citie of TUNES, & new magistrates and officers by him made, he laboured by all meanes to win vnto him the Numidian princes, of themselves prone enough vpon light occasions to make or breake the bonds of friendship, he sent Afan-aga an eunuch, and Halus the Spaniard with the Ianizaries, & certaine pieces of great ordinance, to take in the other cities of the kingdome of TUNES: which they in short time performed, being in all places peaceably receiued, onely the citie of CARVENNA held out a while, yett afterwards for feare of further harme receiued the Turkes garrison. But to leaue Barbarussa king of ALGIERS and Solymans great Admirall, thus possessed of the kingdome of TUNES; and Muleasses in exile at CONSTANTINA, vntill he be againe restored vnto his kingdome by Charles the emperour, as shall be hereafter declared: let vs againe returne to the wars at the selfesame time vnderaken by Solyman in person himselfe in PERSIA, persuaded therunto as we haue before said by Abraham the great Bassa. Of whom a few words, that they which shall hereafter liue, may in him as in others, see in what slipperie place they stand, and what small assurance they haue, which forsaking God, run headlong after these worldly vanities, and swelling with the fauours of great princes, are in a moment when they least feare any such fall, suddenly ouerthrowne, and become the miserable spectacles of mans fragilitie in the height of their supposed blisse.

This great Bassa called of the Turkes Ibrahim, of vs Abraham, was borne in a poore country village neere vnto PERGA, a towne in that part of EPHROS which was called BYTHRO: who in his childhood was taken from his Christian parents, by such as by authoritie did take vp the tribute children of the Christians for the Turkish emperour. A tribute of all tribes most grieuous. He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, actiue of bodie, well spoken, pleasantly conceited, and sharpe of wit: so that he in shorter time than was thought possible, to the admiration of many, learned both to speake and write the Arabian tongue, and other languages vsed in the Turkes court, and could skilfully play vpon sundrie kinds of instruments. And being yett a boy, serued Scanderbassa, a man of great authoritie and power, in the time of Selymus the emperour, in whose seruice he was instructed in the Mahometane religion; but giuing himselfe to all manner of curiositie and neatnesse, he was wonderfully fauoured by the great ladie his mistresse, and by her commended to her husband Scanderbassa, as a fit page to attemper his melancholy and wayward disposition, with his pleasant conceits and deuises. Wherein the Tetricall Bassa finding him to excell, gaue him as a rare gift to Solyman the sonne of Selymus, his grandfather Baiazer yet liuing: who tooke in him such pleasure, that the old emperour caused him to be brought vp in the court, in all princely qualites with Solyman (who was of like yeares vnto him) as his companion and playfellow. Where he so framed himselfe vnto the young prince his disposition in all points, that he was of him alwaies exceedingly beloued, and afterwards promoted to all the honours of the court, and made one of the Bassas; giuing vnto him in marriage the onely daughter and heire of Scanderbassa, his master then dead, with an exceeding great dowrie. And after that, made him Gouernour of CARIA: where hee had not long remained, but he was againe sent for to the court, as the man which gaue thereunto life, without whose companie Solyman was as one halfe dead. At length he made him Vezier, which is the chiefe of all the Bassas, and president of his counsell, the greatest honour in the Turkish empire next vnto the emperour himselfe. And to honour him yet more, he deliuered him his priuat signet, wherewith the Turkish emperours neuer vsed to trust any but themselves: he might at his pleasure, grace, and disgrace whom he would, in court or elsewhere. What he commaunded, was done: and whatsoeuer he did, was taken for well done. He might without the emperours knowledge giue any office, yea the gouernment of whole countries and prouinces, vnto his fauourites: his credit with the emperour was so great, that hee did what he list, and no man durst presume to aske any reason why. And by all at once, he wanted nothing of the maiestie of an emperour, but the name onely; in steed whereof he was commonly called the Great Commander of all the emperours forces. His house in CONSTANTINOPLE was of all other most stately, wherein was daily to be scene such a multitude of his gallant followers, and such a world of wealth and royall furniture, as that it might be worthely compared with the pallace of a great prince. Neither was he partaker of Solymans counsailes in his waighie matters of state onely, but of his secreet delights and pleasures also; if he were present all was well, if he were away nothing pleased: to be short, he so possessed this great emperour, that men commonly said, The soule of Solyman liued in Abraham. Whereat many of the great men of the court secretly repined; but especially Solymans mother, and Roxalana his faire concubine, whom of all women hee held dearest. His liuely and maiestieall countenance thou maiest here behold.

ABRA-

*Magnus es & Getici tibi gratia prona tyranni Seruit, at ex alto magna ruina venit:
Te proceres odere, Parenſq; & regia coniux Horum ne pereas proditiōe caue.*

Right great thou art, and doest commaund the fauour of thy king:
But such great fauours oftentimes, a greater fall doe bring.
The great kings mother, wife, and all the nobles hate thee sore:
Beware that by their wily drifts thou perish not therefore.

This great Commaunder, which might at all times be bolde to speake what he thought vnto Solyman, sought many times in his priuat discourses betwixt them two, to persuaide him to forbeate to vse his forces any farther against the Christians, ouer whom he had sufficiently already triumphed, and to turne them vpon the Persians by whom he was daily injured. Alleadging vnto him, that the Germans were a strong and warlike people; who as they both in language and manners differed from the Hungarians, so were they alwaies at variance with them, and therefore much cared not though they were by him subdued: but if he should begin to inuade any part of their countrey, he should then soone see that inuincible nation with their vnited forces, vp in armes readie to make strong resistance. And to prouoke Charles the emperour (of all the Christian princes the mightiest) were not good, who of himselfe was able to bring into the field

field most puissant armies of valiant fouldiours out of his owne dominions: beside the wonderfull concourse of most resolute men out of all parts of Christendome, which would not spare to lay downe their liues at his feet in that warre, which was of them accounted most religious. Yea what strength both of horse and foot might be raised and brought to the battell by the two brethren Charles and Ferdinand, onely might (as he said) even then be plainly perceived, when as they valiantly defended VIENNA, besieged by us with great power. Neither did Charles afterward, as it seemed, and as the Christians commonly vaunt, feare to haue aduentured the fortune of a maine battell with you: who although I doubt not, but he should haue beene overcome by you, so great a monarch with so puissant an armie, a thing peculiar to your good fortune; yet I cannot denie, but that that victorie against such expert and resolute soldiers, so strongly armed as their manner is must haue been bought with a great deale of our blood. These things in my opinion may reasonably perswade you to let the Christians alone, by while warres to weaken one another, that so afterward as they may become a prey vnto us without any danger of ours. So that in my iudgement the Persian warre is to be taken in hand, rather than the warres in GERMANY, and especially for that you haue sufficiently enlarged the bounds of your empire Westward: which you haue extended euen vnto nations very far distant. So that it is now a great matter to defend so much as you haue already gotten, and therefore partly for the difficultie of the defending thereof, and partly vpon an honourable contempt, according to the infinit bountie of your heroicall inclination, haue thought good to bestow whole kingdomes vpon strangers, yea halfe your enemies. Wherefore how much more glorious shall it be now vpon iust occasion to seeke for that which doyneth vnto your owne confines; and may therefore easily be vntied vnto your owne empire: if you according to the example of your grandfather and father shall force your selfe to driue that accursed and abhorrible race of Imaell out of ASIA. For it shall be a great glorie vnto the name of the Ottoman kings for euer, if you shall after your wonted manner zealously respect the cause of religion, a worke of an incomparable fame, if the authors of a most detestable superstition shall by you be chastised quite out of ASIA. For what more iust or honourable cause can there be to make warre, than to professe your selfe the defender of the diuine precepts of our great prophet Mahomet, against the wicked and irreligious impugnors thereof? And by the way to reuenge and utterly to destroy the capital enemies of your ancestours: which was the last prayer of your father Selymus. Can you endure them which rule so insolently, that they account euery one that is nere them their enemies and prey, and dare also with their pilfering inuasions prouoke your selfe, lining contented within the bounds of your owne empire in peace both in EVROPE and ASIA: and they (for sooth) such as haue by most horrible wrong crept into the royall seat of the most lawfull and noble kings descended of the blood of Vsun-Cassanes? who after their wonted manner still liue by rapine and robbery? Beleeue me noble emperour, if you shall vpon a zeale to your religion with your victorious hand take away this staine and plague of ASIA, there shall undoubtedly be erected vnto you so glorious and magnificent a trophie in the midst of PERSIA, as may be compared, yea preferred before the triumphs of your victorious father Selymus. For it is not so much to haue destroyed the Mamalukes (by condition slaves) and the proud Sultans of EGYPT and SIRIA, as to haue subdued the Persians, famous in ancient time for their martiall prowesse, who so oftentimes vanquished by Alexander of MACEDON gaue vnto him the name of Great. Solyman prickt forward with many such discourtes, dayly founded in his cares by the Bassa, began to yeeld to his perswasion. Whereof Abraham in himselfe greatly rejoiced: for it was thought of many, that he did neuer in heart renounce the Christian religion, but was onely in outward shew a Turke, and in heart a Christian. Which was the rather conjectured, for that he maruellously fauoured and protected the Christian marchants, furthered by all meanes the leagues of the Christian princes with Solyman, and laboured alwaies to turne his forces from them vpon the Persians. And the more to whet him forward, the Bassa had cunningly insinuated into his acquaintance one Mulearabe of DAMASCUS, a man at that time famous in CONSTANTINOPLE, for the opinion the people had generally conceied of his holinesse and profound knowledge in the secret causes of things; and the art of Magicke; vsing him as a prophet to fill the ambitious mind of Solyman, with assured hope of prosperous successe: which thing the hypocriticall wifard, after the manner of such deceiuers, most slyly performed, prophesying vnto him all happinesse in so religious a warre, and so much (as he said) pleasing God. This the Bassaes purpose was much furthered also by Vlemas, a noble and valiant Persian, who hauing married the great Persian king Tamas his sister, was revolted from him to Solyman, fearing to be called to account for the extortion wherewith he had grievously oppressed

A oppressed the countries whereof he had the gouernement: and being wonderfully countenanced in Solyman court by the great Bassa, did after the manner of disloyall fugitiues perswade Solyman by all means he could to take that war in hand, discouering vnto him the power, strength, and state of the Persian kingdome (which he could well doe) and plotting vnto him the easiest way for the conquering thereof, offering also vnto him the vttermost of his deuice. So Solyman filled with the vaine hope of the conquest of PERSIA, yeelded fully vnto the perswasions of the great Bassa, and gaue out his commissions into all parts of his empire for the raising of a mighty armie for the performance of so great an enterprize, commaunding all his capitaines and men of warre to be readie at the citie of NICIA in BITHONIA: and a certaine day appointed: Which his purpose, although it was mightily impugned by his mother, and faire Roxalana his best beloved, as that which altogether proceeded from the Bassa, the one alleading with what euill successe his grandfather and father had before him attempted that same way: the other assailing him with her passionat affections; but both of them indeed reppining at the credit of the Bassa, and in their hearts disdaining that so great a monarch should at the pleasure of his seruant be led vp and downe the world (so farre from their companies; for which cause they did what in them lay to haue ouerthrowne the purpose of Abraham, and to haue altered Solymans former determination. But so strong was the Bassaes credit with his great lord and master, that all these great ladies deuises and prayers were as womens affectionat passions rejected, and the Bassaes counsell to their no small griefe) in all things regarded.

The time appointed being come, and all things in readinesse, Solyman sent Abraham the Bassa, and Vlemas the Persian before him into SIRIA with a strong armie, to be readie with the first of the Spring to inuade the Persian king. Which thing the Bassa gladly tooke vpon him; and coming into SIRIA, wintered with his armie at ALAEO: whither Barbarossa came vnto him for his letters of credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now approaching, Abraham sent Vlemas the fugitiue Persian prince before him with the light horsemen, the fore-runners of his armie, into MESOPOTAMIA as his guide, because the countrey was vnto him best knowne; following not farre after himselfe with all his armie. And marching still forward in that manner, came at length without resistance vnto the famous citie of TAVERIS in ARMENIA the greater, called in ancient time EBATHANA, as is probably by some conjectured: a great and rich citie, but vntoall and of no strength, where the Persian Kings (for the pleasantnesse of the place, and freshnesse of the ayre) vsed commonly to be resident in the heat of the yeare.

From whence Tamas the Persian king was as then absent, busied in warres with Kesen-bassa, a prince of the Corasine Hircanians; so that the citizens of TAVERIS destitute of all helpe, yeelded themselves and the citie vnto the Bassa at his first comming. Tamas the Persian king vnderstanding what was happened at TAVERIS, drew neere with his power, warily expecting to haue taken the Turkes at some aduantage, and so by pollicie to haue defeated his enemies, whom hee was too weake to meet with in plaine battell. Which thing the warie Bassa well perceiuing, for more assurance, by speedie couriers aduertised Solyman of the taking of TAVERIS, and of the enemies purpose, requesting him with all speed to repaire with his armie to TAVERIS. Solyman was then come farre on his way with a strong armie, not by the way of ANCYRA, SEBASTIA, EAMASIA, the borders of TRAPEZONDE, and so ouer Euphrates at ARSENOA into ARMENIA, as his father Selymus had done before him, because that way was thought longer and more troublesome; but quite another way, on the right hand from NICIA BYTHINIA to ICOMIA, and by CASARABO MALATHIA, where is the notable passage ouer the river Euphrates, bursting out by the vallies of the mountaine ANTIVAVS, from whence the plaines of MESOPOTAMIA, then part of the Persian kingdome, begin to open themselves; thence, which Solyman marched peaceably with his armie, paying the poore countrey people for whatsoeuer he tooke: and so in foure and fiftie dayes march came from NICIA BYTHINIA to the citie of COIM in ARMENIA the greater, which is supposed to be built in the ruines of the famous and ancient citie ARAXATA. But hearing such news as is aforesaid from the Bassa, he doubled his march, and so in short time after came and joynd his forces with the Bassa at TAVERIS. Tamas who yet dayly expected the comming of the Georgian light horsemen, vnderstanding that Solyman was coming against him with a world of men, thought it not good to abide the comming of so puissant an enemy, but with delay to wearie him out that drew such a multitude of people after him; and by taking of him at all aduantages, to cut off his people spent with long trauell, wanting victuall, and falling into diuerse diseases; as it commonly chanceth to populous armies in strange countries, where the change of the ayre, with the innumerable necessities alwaies attending vpon a great armie, most times causeth grievous and contagious diseases. Wherefore Tamas to shun the comming of Solyman, retired further off into SVLTANIA, about six daies journey from TAVRIS. Whereof Solyman hauing knowledge, departed from that rich cite without doing any harme therein, following after Tamas into SVLTANIA, to joine battell with him if he could possible: leauing behind him for haile, a great part of his carriages and baggage, with five hundred Ianizaries, and three of his Sanzacks with their companies.

The cite of SVLTANIA was in auncient time one of the royall seats of the Persian kings, but ruinated by the Scythian Tamerlane, retained no shew of the auncient maiestie, but onely in the churches by him spared. Neere vnto this cite Solyman lay encamped many daies, expecting that the Persian king (in reuenge of the iniurie to him done, and for the safegard of his honor) should at length come out of the mountaines, and shew himselfe in plaine field, and giue him battell:
Which was a thing so farte from Tamas his resolution, vpon the due comparing of his owne strength with his enemies, that he retired in such sort, that Solyman could by no meanes learne what was become of him; or which way to follow him.

The countrey neere vnto the cite of SVLTANIA wherein Solyman lay encamped at large, is on euerie side enuironed with hugie mountaines, whose tops are to be seene a farte off, alwaies couered with deepe snow: these mountaines were in auncient time called NYPHATAS, CAS-PIVS, COATHRAS and ZAGRVS, taking their beginning no doubt of CAVCASVS the father of mountaines; and joyning one to another, some one way, some another, doe diuide most large and wide countreys. Whilest Solyman in those plaine fields most fit to fight a battell in, expected the comming of Tamas, such a horrible and cruell tempest (as the like whereof the Persians had neuer before seene at that time of the yeare) fell downe from those mountaines; which was so much the more strange, for that it fell in the beginning of September: with such abundance of raine; which frose so eagerly as it fell, that it seemed the depth of WV inter had euen then of a sudden beene come in: for such was the rage of the blustering winds, striuing with themselves as if it had beene for victorie, that they swept the snow from off the tops of those high moun-taines, and cast it downe into the plaines in such abundance, that the Turkes lay as men buried aliue in the deepe snow, most part of their tents being ouerthrowne and beaten downe to the ground with the violence of the tempest and waight of the snow, wherein a wonderfull number of sicke souldiours and others of the baser sort which followed the campe perished; and many others were so benumbed, some their hands, some their feet, that they lost the vse of them for euer: most part of their beasts which they vsed for carriages, but especially their camels, were frozen to death. Yea Solyman himselfe was in great danger to haue beene ouerwhelmed in his tent, all the tents round about him being ouerthrowne with the violence of the tempest. Neither was there any remedie to be found for so great mischiefs, by reason of the hellish darknesse of that tempestuous night, most of their fires being put out by the extremities of the storme, which did not a little terrifie the superstitious Turkes as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no lesse than the miseries of the tempest, was the fear of the enemy, whose sudden comming they deadly feared: vntill that after so tedious a night, the Sunne breaking out the next morning, with his cheerfull beames reuiued many before readie to giue vp the ghost for cold, and gaue comfort to them all in generall, by discouering the open fields cleare of their feared enemies. It was a dreadfull thing to haue seene what miserie that one night had brought into the Turkes campe: the ground lay almost couered with bodies of the dead; and many liued, but so, as that they accounted the dead more happie than themselves. Many of the Turkes vainly thought, that horrible tempest was brought vpon them by the charmes and enchantments of the Persian Magicians; whereas it was vndoubtedly, by the hand of him which bringeth the proud deuises of princes to naught.

Solyman troubled as well with the strangenesse of the accident, as the losse he had receiued, after he had a little refreshed his discouraged souldiours, rise with his armie and tooke his way on the left hand into ASSIRIA: Vlemas the Persian perswading him therunto for many causes, but especially by putting him in hope of the taking of BABYLON; for that Mahometes a friend of his, was gouernour thereof. But he when the matter came to prooffe, was not to be wooon either by promise or reward to betray the cite. Wherefore Solyman resolved to take it by force, neither did his fortune faile him therein: for as soone as Mahometes vnderstood that Vlemas was at hand with the forerunners of the Turkes armie, and that Solyman with all his power was comming after, who as he thought would neuer haue come so farte; he not prouided to withstand so might-ie an enemy, and not beloued of the citizens, fled out of the cite. Solyman comming, in short time after was of the Babylonians receiued without resistance. This cite of BABYLON commonly called BAGDAD, rise out of the ruines of the old cite of BABYLON, so much spoken of in holy writ: from whence it is not farte distant, standing vpon the riuer Tygris, which not farte beneath falleth into the riuer Euphrates. In this famous city is the seat of the great Caliph, the chiefe Mahometane priest, whom all the Mahometane princes haue in great reuerence, & hath an old prerogative in the choise and confirmation of the kings of ASSIRIA, and the Sultans of AEGYPT: of which Caliph, Solyman according to the old superstitious manner, receiued at his hands the ensignes and ornaments of the Assyrian kings, and with great bountie wooon the hearts of the people: and thereupon resolved to spend that Winter there, billiting his armie in diuers places of that fertill countrey: The other cities of ASSIRIA and MESOPOTAMIA also, namely CARABMIDA, MEBDINVM, ORSA, and ASANCESA, hearing that Solyman had without resistance taken BABYLON, yielded themselves and receiued his garisons. Yea the same thereof was so great, that embassadours came vnto him as farte as ORMY, a cite in the mouth of Euphrates, where it falleth into the Persian gulf, famous for the great traffique out of INDIA thither, suing vnto him for peace. Thus the auncient cite of BABYLON with the great countreys of ASSIRIA and MESOPOTAMIA, sometimes famous kingdomes of themselves, and lately part of the Persian kingdome, fell into the hands of the Turkes, and became prouinces of the Turkish empire in the yeare 1534. Where Solyman after he had spent that Winter in great joy and triumph, according to the manner of the Turkish government, placed a great Commander, which they by a proud name call the Beglerbeg (which is as much as to say, the lord of lords); and vnder him diuers others for the government of these countreys, by parts, which they call San-zacks, who are euer at the command of the Beglerbeg. Whilest he thus wintered at BA-BYLON, he caused Alexander Zelibi (which is to say, Alexander the noble) his great treasurer for the warres, to be hanged, for that he had vnfaithfully dealt in his office; and confiscated all his goods.

Tamas hearing that Solyman was gone to BABYLON, returned to TAVRIS: of whose speedy comming, the Ianizaries and other captaines there left by Solyman vnderstanding, fled in haist out of the cite, leauing all such things as were committed to their custodie, for a prey vnto the Persian souldiours.

Solymans armie being mightily increased by the comming vnto him of the great Bassa of CAIRE, with the Sanzacks of ALEXANDRIA, IVDEA, SYRIA, and COMAGENE; by the persuasion of Abraham, and Vlemas, the Spring now well come on, departed from BABYLON again towards TAVRIS, with purpose either to draw Tamas to battell, or else to his eternall infanie before his face to sacke that his regall cite. But Tamas aduertised of his comming, and knowing himselfe too weake to giue him battell, forsooke the cite, and fled into the mountaines of HIRCANIA: destroying all the countrey before him as he went, and carrying away the inhabitants, leauing nothing to relieue the Turkes, if they should pursue him. Solyman vnderstanding that Tamas was againe fled, sent Vlemas with all the choise horsemen of his armie to overtake him if it were possible, and to fight with him. But when he had followed him two or three daies journey, and still found the countrey desolat as he went, yielding neither forrage for his horses, nor reliefe for his men, and saw no hope to ouertake the king, he began as a prouident Generall to forecast the extremities like to befall in his returne thorow those desolat countreys, with the enemy at his heeles: and thereupon in time retired backe againe to Solyman, declaring vnto him what had happened. Who fleting in his mind, that the Persian king was not to be drawne to battell, marched forthwith to TAVRIS, entered it without resistance, the citizens submitting themselves vnto him: whose liues spared, he gaue that rich cite for a prey vnto his soldiers, who left neither house nor corner thereof vnancked, abusing the poore citizens with all manner of insolencie; euerie common souldiour without controulment, sacking himselfe with whatsoeuer best pleased his greedie desire, or filthy lust. Tamas had in this cite a most stately and royall pallace; so had also most part of the nobilitie, their sumptuous and rich houses, which by the commandement of Solyman were all rased, downe to the ground, and the greatest part of

him out of fauour, and to worke his destruction. But that which most empaired his credit with Solyman, was the common report raised of him by his enemies, That he being in heart a Christian, did in all things fauour the Christians (athing most odious amongst the Turkes) and had for that cause craftely perswaded Solyman to take in hand the vnfortunat Persian warre. And that which more encreased the suspition, was, That he about that time had caused one Marke Nicholas, a Venetian marchant (who had not without the suspition of some oftentimes come vnto him with letters and secret messages whilest he lay at BABYLON) to be taken in the night, and murdered at CONSTANTINOPLE, and cast into the sea, because hee should not discouer any thing that might be hurtfull vnto him. Abraham thus brought in disgrace with Solyman, was (after the manner of the Turkish tyrannie) bid to a solemne supper in the court about the foure-teenth of March, after which time he was neuer more seene. It is reported, that after supper Solyman fell into a great rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had misgouerned the state, inuerted his treasures to his owne priuat, and as a traitor, had secret intelligence with the Christian princes his enemies: for prooffe whereof, Solyman with sterne countenance shewed him his owne letters, which had by chance been intercepted, oftentimes asking him in furious manner, If he knew not that hand, if he knew not that seale. All which the Bassa lying prostrate at his feet, humbly confessed, and with many teares craued of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any prayers to be moued: for the same night as he was slumbring vpon a pallet in the court, ouercome with heauinesse, an eunuch cut his throat with a crooked knife, which Solyman for that purpose had deliuered vnto him with his owne hand. He was murdered sleeping, because Solyman had in former time of his fauour solemnely sworn vnto him, That he would neuer kill him whilest he liued. By which oath the great Mahometane priest said, he was not so bound, but that he might kill him sleeping, for as much as men by sleepe deprived of sense, are for that time not to be accounted as liuing but as dead, mans life consisting altogether (as he said) in liuely actions. It is reported, that after Solyman had looked vpon the dead bodie, and bitterly cursed the same, he caused a great weight to be tied vnto it, and so cast into the sea. His treasure and goods, which were almost infinit, were the next day all ceised vpon for the emperor, and a small portion thereof appointed for his poore wife to liue vpon. His death was no sooner known, but that the vulgar people deuised of him infamous songs and slanderous reports, as of a traitour most iustly condemned: and in further despight, with stones and mire defaced the trophies of the Hungarian victorie, which hee had in most stately manner erected before his sumptuous house in CONSTANTINOPLE. This was the wofull end of Abraham the great Bassa, who whilest he stood in fauour with his prince, was of all others accounted most fortunat, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan: but after falling into disgrace, became the scoorne of fortune, and the lamentable spectacle of mans fragilitie. He was murdered the 15 day of March in the yeare 1536.

How the kingdome of TUNES was by Barbarussa (the Turkes great admirall) taken from Muleasses, we haue already told: but how the same was againe taken from him by Charles the emperor a little before the returne of Solyman out of PERSIA, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without iust cause feared, that Barbarussa, possessed of the kingdome of TUNES, and supported by the power of Solyman, would the next Summer, not content himselfe with the spoile of the coasts of SPAIN, SARDINIA, and ITALIE, as he had in former time, but with all his forces inuade SICILIA, the garnerie and storehouse of ITALIE: and from thence attempt the conquest of the kingdome of NAPLES, which it was thought he in his immoderat desires had longed much after. To repress this his barbarous insolencie, and to worke the safetie of the frontiers of the Christian kingdomes (much subiect to the rapines of the Turkish pyrats) Charles the emperor resolved in person himselfe with a puissant armie to passe ouer into AFRICK, whilest Solyman was yet busied in the Persian wars, and by force of armes to dispossesse the pyrat of his new gotten kingdome in TUNES. For the accomplishment whereof, he caused souldiours to be leued in all parts of SPAIN, and came downe to BARCELONA with eight thousand footmen and seuen hundred horsemen, farre sooner than was by any man expected: amongst whom were many of the nobilitie of SPAIN, with their followers most gallantly appointed: but especially Ferdinand of TOLDO, duke of ALBA, whose forwardnesse in that honorable action, with the desire he had to reuenge the death of his father Garcia, slaine before by the Moores at GIRAPOLIS, gaue great hope euen the vnto his countrymen, That he would

A would in time prooue a wortheie chieftaine, as indeed he afterward did. In the meane time Andrew Auria the great Admirall, vnto whom onely for his approoued fidelitie and long experience the emperor had fully communicated what he had with himselfe before purposed, had with wonderfull diligence and celeritie rigged vp a great fleet of ships and galleys, so furnished with all manner of warlike prouision, as might well haue sufficed a great armie: whereunto he joyned also his owne fleet of seuenteen galleys and three galleasses, wherein he had embarked the flower of GENVA and LIGVRIA, who with exceeding cheerefulnesse had voluntarily offered themselues to follow him their old Generall in that sacred expedition. With this great preparation Auria came to the emperor at BARCELONA: Thether came also Lewes the king of Portingals brother (whose sister Isabell, Charles the emperor had married) with five and twentie Caruels, ships which the Portingals vsed in their Indian voyages, amongst whom was also one huge Galeon; all ships well appointed and fit for seruice, wherein were embarked two thousand Portingals, beside matriners: There also arrived sixtie saile of tall ships sent out of FLANDERS and the low countries, wherein were a great number of condemned persons, whose liues was spared that they might serue in the galleys: Vnto this warre Paulus the third of that name, then bishop of ROMB, sent ten galleys vnder the conduct of Virginus Vissinus: the Great Master of MALTA sent thither his fleet also. At the same time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that wortheie chieftaine Alphonfus Daulus Vastius, whom the emperor had appointed Generall of all his forces at land, had by the emperours commaundement taken vp five thousand new souldiours in ITALIE, which were led by Hieronymus Tutauilla, countie of SARNE, Federicke Caralle, and Augustina Spinula, all famous capitaines. The old Spanish garrisons which lay in LOMBARDIE, the emperor commaunded to be straightly looked vnto, that none of them should leaue their places to goe in this new expedition, but to remaine there still vnder their Generall Antonius Lena: which wortheie capitaine although he would faine haue had him with him, as of all his greatest commanders the best; yet he thought it good to spare him, both for that he was much troubled with the gout, and also for that it was necessarie, as he thought, to leaue such a valiant capitaine with his garrisons in that country, so neere vnto the French and Swissers, whom he durst not so well trust as to furnish that country either of so great a commander, or of the wonted garrisons. At the same time Maximilian Eberstein, an old commander, came to Vastius with eight thousand Germans, D ouer the Tridentine Alpes to MILLANE, and so to GENVA; amongst whom were diuers noble gentlemen, who then as voluntarie men serued of their owne charges. With these Germans and the five thousand Italians, Vastius embarked himselfe at the port called PORTVS VENETIS, in LIGVRIA: hauing before perswaded them with patience to endure the tediousnesse of the sea, and to comfort themselues with the hope of the victorie in AFRICK; where they should fight in the quattrell of God, and for the emperor, who did neuer forget his religious and valiant souldiours. So sailing alongst the coast of ITALIE, he came to NAPLES, where the vice-roy and diuers other of the nobilitie had of their owne charges, euery man according to his deuotion or abilitie, built or furnished some one galley, some more, for that seruice. It was a wonder to see with what cheerefulnesse the gallants and lustie youths of NAPLES, and all that part of ITALIE, came and offered themselues vnto Vastius, so that it seemed there was none left behind in NAPLES: for he had with singular courtesie so wooon the hearts of the old soldiots and lustie youths of that kingdome, that both the one and the other thought it a most honourable thing to adorne, the one their before deserued pensions; and the other their first entrance into martiall affaires, with the participation of so notable a victorie. But whilest euery man was thus busied in setting forward, certaine mutinous souldiours (wearie of the sea, and fearing the dangers of so long a voyage) began to cast many perils, to find fault with their small wages, and to discourage the multitude, perswading them with seditious speeches to forsake their colours, & to run away: for redresse whereof, Vastius caused the authors of that mutinie to be taken and thrust into stocks, and in the sight of the whole fleet to be cast into the sea. So Vastius departing with his fleet from NAPLES, came in few dayes to PALERMO in SICILIE. The emperor also loosing from BARCELONA, came to the port of MAGO in the Island of MINORICA, and from thence to CARLIS in SARDINIA; whether Alphonfus Vastius was a little before come with all his fleet out of SICILIE. Nor long after the emperor, now that all his forces were come together, passed ouer from SARDINIA into AFRICK, and with a faire Westerly wind put into the port of of V T I C A, which is of the seafaring men called F A R I N A. In the entering whereof the admirall G gallic, wherein the emperor himselfe was, by great mischance strake vpon a sand, and there stuck fast: which so much more troubled the emperor, for that his father Philip had by like mishap beene like to haue beene cast away vpon the coast of E N G L A N D, as he was sayling out of the low countries into S P A I N E: howbeit by the good direction of A u r i a she was quickly got off the sand againe, and entred with the rest, to the great rejoycing of the whole fleet. So presently departing againe from V T I C A, and sayling alongst the coast, he doubled the promontorie of C A R T H A G E, yet famous for the ruines of that proud citie, and came to anker before a castle, which of a well beneath it, is called by the name of A Q U A R I A, or the W W a t e r castle. The Moore, who from the hils of V T I C A and their watch towers had taken view of the Christian fleet and of the course it held, aduertised Barbarussa. That the Christians were coming against him with an innumerable fleet: for there was of one sort and other almost seuen hundred saile, whereof 82 were great galleys, which gallantly garnished with flags and streamers, made a shew of more than indeed they were, and wonderfully terrified the enemy. But that troubled Barba-russa most, that he was by messenger vpon messenger certainly informed, That the most mightie Christian emperor Charles was in person himselfe in the fleet, with such a world of people that it should seeme he had left none in S P A I N E and I T A L I A that were able to beare armes.

Which newes was brought by certaine Mahometane slaues, who getting loofe in the galleys, had in the night swum ashore, and reported the certainetie of the emperours comming: for the proud Turke, a great contemner of the Christian forces, neuer thought that the emperor would haue aduentured his person vnto the dangers of the sea, and chaunces of warre, especially in an vinknowne barren and scorching countrey, but would rather haue attempted to doe something by his lieutenants; or els by A u r i a his admirall seeke to surprisfe some base places alongst the sea coast, but not to come directly for the regall citie of T V N E S: in which opinion he was chiefly confirmed by A l o y s i u s P r e x e n d a, a gentleman of G E N V A, who taken at sea, was kept as prisoner at large in T V N E S: of whom Barbarussa had learned many things concerning the state of I T A L I E, the manner of the Christians, and strength of the emperor; craftily feeding him with the hope of libertie, if he would truly declare vnto him such things as he desired to know.
Wwherefore now in his rage he caused him to be brought before him, charging him bitterly, that he had craftily and perfidiously told him lies for truth, concerning the emperor; and therefore commaunded him to be forthwith executed. Wwhen he had thus with the vnworthie death of a K guiltlesse Christian, somewhat mitigated the griefe of his light beleefe, hee forthwith began to cast with himselfe how he might best withstand his puissant enemy. And first of all calling to counsell his sea captaines, in whom for their approued valour he reposed most confidence, hee showed vnto them, that they as valiant men, acquainted with the dangers attending vpon honorable actions, were not to doubt of the victorie, for so much as he saw it as good as alreadye gained; for the same reasons for which he had before perswaded himselfe, that the emperor (if he had not beene halfe mad) would not haue vnderaken so desperat and doubtfull a warre.

For who is there (said he) that knoweth this countrey (not to speake of our owne forces) which would not reasonably thinke our enemies should in short time know the price of their ambitious desire L and rash attempt? which in a most vnseasonable time of the yeare, the dayes being now at the longest, and the Sunne in his greatest strength, are come to fight in a countrey scorched with heat, and drow-ther without water; where the very sand which riseth with every blast of wind, flying into their eyes and faces, shall no lesse trouble them than their enemies? Shall we thinke that they, which as I haue for most part are fresh water souldiours, and surcharged with beaustie armour, can easily march forward, or retire, or yet keepe their ground, as the diuers occasions of battell shall require: when as the deepe and hollow burning sand up to the middle leg, will not suffer them to keepe any order of array?
How shall they be able by any meanes to abide the force of our Turkish footmen, or the often charging of the nimble Numidian horsemen? And if they be so many of them as they say there is, where can they get victuall to feed such a multitude, if we doe but protract the warre? Assuredly (most valiant and courageous chieftaines) we shall erect a most rare and incomparable trophie in this countrey of A F R I C K E: when as Charles the rich and great emperor of the Christians shall either here be slaine in battell, or els fall into our hands as a most rich prey. For mine owne part, I will notably pro-uide, that you shall want neither weapons, victuall, nor aid, during the time of this warre: I will open

A the old armouries, broach my store, and bring forth my treasures. The Numidian princes now out-friends, I will without delay entertaine with great pay, and such presents as shall be to them most welcome. As for the citizens of T V N E S, you know how easily they are to be kept in obedience, and brought on against the enemy for a small pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I most earnestly require of your approued valor, That you most valiantly defend the strong castle of G V I T T A, as the most assured defence, not of this citie onely, but of the whole kingdome; and especially of our naue which there lieth in safe harbour: for that piece will our enemies with all their forces first assaile. wherefore, as worthy men neuer to be vanquished, keepe that for Solyman and me: so that it being vainly attempted by our enemies, and resolutely defended by you, the Christian emperor there failing of his purpose, and shamefully foiled, shall now begin to despaire, not of the taking of the citie of B T V N E S, but of his owne returne and safetie.

When he had thus said, the sea captaines answered with one consent, That they would most willingly and cheerefully performe whatsoever it should please him to commaund: and in confirmation thereof, promised him not to doe any thing which beleemed not most valiant and resolute men. Amongst these sea captaines, Sinan of S M I R N A, a Jew, who had lost his right eye, was both for his age and long experience in militarie affaires, of greatest account: next vnto him was Haidinus of C I L I C I A, for his firoufnesse in fight surnamed of the Italians Cacciadiabolo, and Salec of I O N I A; which two had before in a great battell at sea, slaine Rodericus Portendus great Admirall of S P A I N E, and taken his sonne John prisoner, and seuen great galleys: after C these was Tabacches of L A O D I C I A, and Giasser a valiant captaine of the Ianizaries: all which were notable pirates and then men of great fame. The strong castle of G V I T T A standeth in the bottom of the bay of C A R T H A G E, vpon a point of the land, where the sea by a narrow strait runneth on the East side of the castle into the lake of T V N E S, which being in a manner round, is about twelue Italian miles ouer. But now that castle is parted from the maine on the W est side also, by the sea that way let in; which chargeable worke was by Barbarussa begun, but giuen ouer againe by him; perswaded by some, That the sea comming in that way, would in short time fill vp the lake with sand: but was afterwards for all that, perfected by others. So that now it standeth in manner of an island, in the mouth of the lake, deuided from the firme land by two narrow straight passages, the one on the East, and the other on the W est, yet so, that it commaundeth both. This castle Barbarussa had before strongly fortified both with men and muni-D tion, as the key of that kingdome: but now vpon the comming of the emperor, he put into it his most expert and resolute captaines before named: well foreseeing that in the defence therof, rested the safetie of his naue which then lay within the lake, as in a most sure harbour; and also the greatest hope he had for the holding of the citie of T V N E S, whereon depended the whole state of that kingdome. The emperor lying at anchor with all his fleet neere vnto the shoare, gaue generell commaundement, that his souldiours should with as much speed as was possible be landed with the long boats: which was so orderly done, that the Moores terrified with the haleous crie of the souldiours, making toward land, and not able to abide the showres of small shot, were easily beaten from the shoare, whither they were come downe in great multitudes, E and so suffered the Christian souldiours to land quietly. The first that landed were the Spanish companies, after them the Italians, and last of all the Germans, whom N a s t i u s Generall of the armie caused presently to encampe themselves straightly commaunding, that no man should straggle from the campe farther into the land, vntill the horsemen and great artillerie were all landed. The emperor himselfe bearing victorie in the cheerefulnesse of his countenance, landed also. In the meane time certaine companies were sent out by the Generall, to view the places also: and to seeke out the cisterns and fountaines of fresh water thereabout, which (sometime) fenced the famous citie of C A R T H A G E, with whom the Moores, but especially the Numidian horsemen, a swift, subtil, and painfull kind of souldiours, oftentimes and in many places suddenly skirmished: and though they were but naked men, yet taking all the advantages they F could of the places, to them well knowne, with their arrows, and darts furiously assailed them vnawares, and ouerloaded with armour; sparing no mans life that fell into their hands. Amongst whom was Hieronimus Spinula a Ligurian captaine, who ouerthrowne by a Numidian horseman, had his head cut off, and carried away by the same nimble horseman, before he could be relieued. The like mishap befell Federicus Garectus a noble gentleman, who going with N a s t i u s, to view the places thereabouts, was fast by his side suddenly slaine with a small shot. All which nimbleness and fierceness of the enemy, could not for all that stay the emperor: but that hee would needs with a small troupe of horsemen, in person himselfe take view of the places thereabouts, euen in the sight of the Numidian horsemen, which were in euery place to be seene pricking vp and downe the countie in troupes; although he was many times requested by his graue counsellors, to leaue that seruice for his inferiour captaines, and not to expose himselfe to so great danger both of his person and of the common safetie. Vassius thus brought on the armie neere vnto the castle of Gvletta, still casting vp a rolling trench as he came neerer thereunto, thereby to keepe his men out of the danger of the enemies shot: which worke was not done only by the pioners and gally slaues, but by souldiours of all sorts; yea many of the captaines themselves laid their hands to the spade and mattocke: for why, the emperor was there a continuall beholder, and cheetfull commender of euery mans labour and forwardnesse, and the busie enemy was euer ready to take the aduantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, oftentimes fallying out euen vnto the verie trenches of the Christians, there giuing vnto them proud words of defiance. When the armie was to be martialled, and euery commander to be appointed to the place of his charge in this siege of Gvletta: the countie of Sarna, a man famous both for the honour of his house, and for the good seruice he had lately done against the Turkes at Cokona, requested of Vassius the Generall, to haue the charge of the mount neere vnto the castle; which as it was a place of most danger, so was it also of greatest honour. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the manner of their proud nature) much repined. Vpon the top of this mount, the countie set vp his rich tent in the eye of the enemy, and there lay with the Italian companies, ouer whom he commaunded. He had not lien there long, but Salee one of the Turkes famous pirats, with certaine companies of the garrison souldiours, sallied out of the castle directly vpon the mount whereon the countie lay; and by making shew as if hee would desperately haue assailed the same, raised a great alarm amongst the Italians: yet so, as after certaine volleys of shot discharged on both sides, he began to retire as if he had been thereto constrained. Which thing the countie perceiuing, being a man of greater courage than direction, in great rage with bitter words reproued certaine of the captaines, whom he perceiued not so forward in pursuit of the enemy as he would haue had: them in his furie ran downe from the mount, the rest for shame following him, and ouertaking the enemies slew diuers of them. The craftie pirat now seeing the countie drawne out of his strength into the plaine ground; and perceiuing himselfe strong enough to encounter him, suddenly turning himselfe about, said vnto his souldiours: The aduantage you wished to haue of your enemies is now offered, they are now in your danger; wherefore now shew your selues valiant men, and suffer not one of these proud fresh water souldiours to escape alive or unwounded. Which he had no sooner said, but they presently made a stand, and so hardly charged them whom they but euen now seemed to flie, that the Italians not able longer to endure the fight, betooke themselves to flight. The countie himselfe with Belingerius his kinsman, fighting valiantly in the formost of his companies, was slaine: many others endured the same fortune: others flying backe againe to the mount, were there slaine by the Turkes, who resolutely entred into the trenches with them so farre, that they carried away with them the plate and riches of the counties tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay neere vnto them, and might easily haue rescued them, that would once stir out of their places to helpe them: for it is reported, that they were nothing sorie for the ouerthrow of the Italians, for as much as the countie had so arrogantly craved of the Generall the most honourable place, which he so euill held. His head and right hand was cut off, and sent by Salee to Barbarossa. This ouerthrow much grieved the Italians whom Vassius comforted with cheetfull speeches, imputing all that losse, neither to the valour of the enemy, or cowardise of the Italians; but only to the rashnesse of the countie, whom he said worthily to haue paid the price of his inconsiderate forwardnesse. But the Spaniards he sharply reproued as mercilesse men, which vpon so light an occasion had giuen cause for the Italians to haue them in distrust. The Turkes in the meane time by the often shooting off of their great ordinance, shewed the joy they conceived of this victorie.

It oftentimes so falleth out, that whilest men laugh at their neighbours harmes, their owne is not fare off; and so it chanced with the Spaniards: for Tabachob another of the piraticall captaines, shortly after fallying suddenly out of the castle in the dawning of the day, was got vp to the

A the top of the trenches wherein the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his comming, and there slew some as they were a sleepe, some idlie sitting fearing no harme, others as they were arming themselves; and with their suddenerie, caused the rest which lay neere vnto that place shamefully for feare to flie out of their trenches: where the Turkes taking such tush as they there found, and hauing slaine and wounded many, amongst whom was one Mendosa a captain, and carrying away with them the ensigne of Sarmentum which stood vpon the top of the trench, returned with victorie. The alarm raised in the armie was such, as that the emperor himselfe came running to the place in his armour, severely reprouing them of cowardise which had forsaken the place, and grievously offended with them which had kept such negligent watch, against such an enemy, as was not for wilnesse agilitie and courage, to be slightly regarded of the best and most expert souldiours. This disgrace of the Spaniards well comforted the Italians, to see the old souldiours no lesse ouertaken in their negligence, than they had been in their vnadvised forwardnesse.

This tumult appeard, Vassius called into his tent the Colonels and chiefe captaines of the Spaniards, and spake vnto them in this manner:

Friends (said he) elsewhere alwaies valiant, who together with me, haue by your inuincible prowesse gained vnto our emperor many most glorious victories. You seeme vnto me at this time to haue need speech to this Spaniard. You be called vpon, and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approved valour: for as farre as I can see, the remembrance of your ancient fame, is in you growne altogether cold; your hands are become faint for feare; and that which I am sorie and ashamed to say, you are growne I know not how, altogether out of order and heartlesse, shewing no courage for the subduing of these naked pirats. Yesterday (as many say) you smiled at the unskilfull and unfortunate forwardnesse of your friends, which they bought deere; but to day they worthely laugh at your degenerate carelesse negligence: so that it concerneth you in honour, to blot out this so foule and publike a disgrace, by some notable and worthe exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and I straightly charge and commaund you, that with all speed you prepare both your minds and weapons for the atchieuement of some new honour: so that if the proud enemy shall againe presume to come forth and assaile your trenches, you shall forthwith breake out vpon him, and beat him backe againe euen to the gates of Gvletta. Perhaps good fortune will so attend your valiant and resolute pursuit, that you may together with their disordered men, enter some of their rampiers, wherein we see their whole hope consisteth: which if it shall otherwise fall out than is to be hoped for, yet shall you by this your notable deuoir wonderfully content the emperor your soueraine, and me your Generall, and withall couer your late dishonour.

Whereunto they all answered, That they would so beare themselves against the enemy, as that he should not desire greater courage or contempt of danger in men desirous of honour and commendation.

It was not long, but that the Turkes encouraged with their former successe, after their wonted manner sallied out againe, conducted by Giaffer captain of the Ianizaries, a man of exceeding courage and strength of bodie: who with the Ianizaries and certaine companies of Moorish archers, about the noone time of the day issuing out of the castle, assailed the uttermost trenches. E Wherein he was nothing deceived, for the Spaniards in their stations negligent and vnprepared, hoping in that broiling heat to find the Christians in their stations negligent and vnprepared. Wherein he was nothing deceived, for the Spaniards that burning hot time of the day, kept such negligent watch, that Giaffer with his Ianizaries and archers, was got vp to the top of the such negligent watch, that Giaffer with his Ianizaries and archers, was got vp to the top of the rampiers, and there discharged their shot and arrowes vpon the Christians in their trenches, before they were well aware of his comming. But vpon the striking vp of the drum, certaine companies of harquebusers brake out vpon them in two places at one instant, as Vassius had before commaunded, whom he seconded with a companie of halbardiers, keeping in readinesse his squadrons to rescue his harquebusers, if they should be enforced by the enemy to retire: and in that order expected the euent of the skirmish, which was most valiantly maintained on both sides. For the Ianizaries, although they were enforced to giue ground, yet (as men not vsed to flie, and standing vpon the honour of their order) withstood the Christians with no lesse resolution than they were by them charged: vntill that Giaffer their leader desperatly fighting amongst the formost of the Ianizaries, was at once shot in with two bullets, and slaine: whose dead bodie the Ianizaries labouring to carie away, endured a most cruell fight, many being on both both sides slaine vpon his dead carcasse: yet at length they were enforced to flie, and so were followed by the Spaniards, that they of GVLETTA, when they had received in the forme first out almost a fourth part of their owne men, for scarce the Christians should together with them haue entered the castle: Didacus Abila, one of the Spaniards ensigne bearers, admitted his ensigne vnto the top of one of the enemies rampiers, and was there slaine, but his ensigne fast by, one of the souldiours of the same band. The Christians received more losse in their retreat than they had in all the fight, for the Turkes from their rampiers then discharged their shot as fast as they could vpon them, which they could not before doe, without the like danger to their owne men mingled amongst them. This dayes worke well abated the pride of the Turkes, and gave good hope to the Christians, that the castle would without any great losse be gained: for being nere vnto it, they perceiued it not to be so strong as they had supposed.

The emperour hauing spent a few dayes in consultation about his farther proceeding, and preparing of things for the siege, resolved without further delay with all his forces to assault the castle, perswaded therunto by many reasons: first by the cheerfulness of his owne souldiours, and the courage of his enemies sore daunted in the last skirmish, which he was loth they should againe recouer by the comming of new supplies; besides that, he was informed, that diuers companies of the Numidians were comming to TUNIS, entertained by Barbarussa, whose strength was like dayly to encrease: but that which moued him most to hasten the matter, was, for that his men began to grow sickly in his campe, being all the day time scorched as it were with the feruent heat of the Sunne, and well nere starued in the night with cold, and exceeding dewes wherewith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good water or fresh victuall by any meanes to be had in that sandie and barren soile, for the releefe of the sick, other than that was brought out of the fleet: for all the water thereabout was most vnpleasant and exceeding brackish, so that both sick and whole were glad when they could get a crab to quenche the extremity of their thirst: although the emperour did what he might to remedie these extremities, and much releefe was in good time sent both from SICILIA and NAPLES: the biskop also in the ships, especially in the Spanish galleies, was growne hoarie and vnwholesome. Wherefore he began to place his batterie about the fifteenth of Iuly, which was defended all along with Gabions, and caske filled with sand, for that the countrey soile in that place yeelded neither earth nor turlie to doe it. Muleasses appointed to batter the castle by sea, deuised his galleies into three squadrons, which orderly succeeding one another, should by turns beat the same: his great ships rid at anker, and out of their forecastles thundered with their great ordinance. And Vassim at land had deuised the armie into three battels, Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, every nation by themselves, in such sort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of the assault, and of the glorie of the victorie. There was neuer stronger place in the memorie of man, since guns, that fatal engine were first inuented for the destruction of mankind, assailed with greater force, greater preparation, or greater industrie. The great ordinance in manner of a great earthquake so terribly roared and thundered, that the earth seemed not onely to tremble and quake vnder mens feet, but euen by and by to rent in sunder and swallow them vp: and the sea which was euen now quiet and calme, began to rise aloft, and to rage and some as if it had been in a great storme: at which time the aire became thicke, and the skie darkened with the smoke of the great artilerie: from the breake of the day vntill noone the roaring cannon and culuering neuer ceased: so that the Vamures were beaten downe, the castle made faultable, and the wals so shaken, that in many places the Turkes cannoniers, together with their cannons, lay buried in the ruines thereof. Which thing perceiued, they which were before appointed to giue the first assault, vpon signal given by the emperour, presently vpon the ceasing of the great artilerie assailed the breach, and others with their scaling ladders scaled the wals: which was done with such courage and resolution, that the Turkes when they had done what they possibly could for the defence of the place, by casting downe darts, wild fire, and such like things vpon the Christians as they were climbing vp: at length as men despairing longer to hold the place, and overcome with a greater fortune, turned their backs and fled. Sinan and the rest of the captaines by a wooden bridge, fled out at the farther side of the castle into the maine, and so along the left side of the lake by land to TUNIS, not looking behind them for halt: which way most part of his men followed him also. The rest were either slaine or driuen into the lake, where seeking to saue their liues by swimming, they were either slaine in comming to land by the Spanish horse,

A men, or else in their swimming shot at pleasure by the harquebussers, so that all the lake was as it were covered with the dead bodies of the Turkes and Moores. The emperour with small losse thus gained the castle of GVLETTA, with all the warlike prouision therein, and with it all Barbarussa his great fleet & strength at sea, which he for the more safetie had before put into the lake: which as it was vnto the emperour a thing most pleasing, so was it vnto Barbarussa and his pyrras the greatest greefe and losse possible, hauing at once lost all their power at sea, which but a little before was no small terror to all the frontiers of the Christian countries and Islands in the Mediterranean.

Barbarussa troubled and terrified with so great a losse, with a sterne and scornfull countenance received the Iew, and the rest of the captaines fled from GVLETTA, reuiling them bitterly in his rage, and calling them faint hearted cowards, which had in so short a time giuen ouer so strong a place. Whereunto Sinan answered for them all in this sort:

Hairadin (said he) so long as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou well knowest, and our enemies cannot denie what well beseeemed us and thy magnificent fortune. But when we were to withstand the deuill and his infernall furies, which came against vs with flames of fire, and earthquakes, things of extreame terror and danger: it ought not to seeme strange vnto thee, if we sought to escape the vnconouth furie of the immortall enemies of mankind, to doe thee service in thy better fortune, in defence of this thy citie and kingdom. Neither doe we account it any disgrace to haue escaped that danger, as men that mind againe to fight: out of which thou, a most antient and expert Commander (if I may frankly speake vnto thee the truth) if thou haddest bene there present, wouldst haue accounted it no dishonour, but very good discretion to haue escaped in safetie.

Barbarussa representing his furie, began in a more temperat manner to request them euery one particularly, as valiant and courageous men to stand fast vnto him in that warre against their enemies the Christians: telling them, that he well hoped, that after the great supplie of the Moorish footmen and Numidian horsemen were once come, which were now at hand, the enemies should not long reioice of the taking of GVLETTA. After that, he forthwith conuerted all his studie and endeuour, to prepare such things as were needfull for the warre, bringing forth his treasures, and bountifully bestowing the same amongst the Moores and Numidians, thereby to confirme the friendship of such as well affected him, and with this new bountie to win the hearts of such as yet stood doubtful.

In the meane time Muleasses the exiled king, with a small retinue of his friends and followers came from the farthest part of NUMIDIA into the emperours campe: the emperour sitting in a royall seat in the midst of his pavillion, whereinto Muleasses was admitted, with a myter vpon his head, in a garment of greene and blew changeable silke: he was of a tall & manly stature, of colour tawny, but so squint-eyed that he seemed spitefully to looke vpon them whom he beheld: who after he had kissed the emperours right hand, and had set himselfe downe, with his legs gathered close vnder him, vpon a carpet spread vpon the bare ground, after the manner of his countrey, he by an interpreter spake vnto the emperour as followeth:

Thou art come in armes into this countrey, and art now almost conquerour of the same (thrice mightie Emperour) prouoked therunto not by any desert of mine, for that our different religion so required: yet as I verely thinke, not without the appointment of the most high God, whom both thou and I doe with like deuotion worship, to take reuenge of the most perfidious and cruell tyrant and pyrat, the mortal enemy of mankind, whom I foresee as good as already vanquished, now that GVLETTA is taken, and his name surprised. So that I hope he shall in short time by thy reuenging hand, receiue the iust guerdon of all his former villanies: which shall be so much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the fruit of thy rare felicitie and glorious victorie will redound in great part to me, being restored by thee into my fathers kingdom: which I as a poore exiled prince most humbly request of thy iustice and bountie. For it shall be vnto thee a thing most honourable and profitable, if thou shalt receiue into thy protection me, a king royally descended, of a most antient progenie, strenghtened with the great alliance of the Numidians and Moores. Neither do I refuse either to pay thee tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my selfe vassall vnto thee the Christian emperour: Of which my fidelitie, there can be no greater assurance, than the thankfull remembrance of so great a benefite received, which shall for ever remaine vnforgotten of me and my posteritie, euen for that especially, that I detest and abhorre the name of an vnthankfull man, and doe well by experience find, how much my state may be confirmed, and the minds of my people to me assured, by thy Garrison: so neare as hand to SICILIA and SARDINIA.

answere to Muleasses.

Whereunto the emperour answered, That hee was come ouer into AFRICK to be reuenged of the injuries which Barbarussa had many times done vpon the frontiers of his dominions, and to root out the pyrats, of all others most mischieuous: which his good purpose had by the goodnesse of Christ his Sauour taken so good effect, that he doubted not in short time by the taking of TUNES to obtaine a perfect victorie; which once gained, hee would then kindly graunt him all things which should stand with the conuenience of his affaires, and the vse of his victorie: so that he would not falsifie his faith, which he might justly suspect, if he reposed not a speciall trust, that the remembrance of such a benefite would for euer remaine in his heroicall mind; and was further assured, that the same power which should restore to him his kingdome of court, could also take it from him againe, if his vnthankfulness should so deserue.

The behavior of Muleasses.

Muleasses in presence of the emperour vsed such a grauitie and grace in his speech and gesture, as well declared, that he had nothing forgotten of his former estate: but towards the Generall and the other great capitaines hee vsed all manner of courtesie; so that hee rid vp and downe with them gallantly mounted, managing his horse; and charging and discharging his lance with such agilitie and skill, as shewed him to be a very good horseman, and of great actiuitie. At other vacant times he would subtilly reason with the learned men, after the manner of Auerroes; of the nature of things, of the motion of heauen, and power of the stars. By the emperours commaundement he had a tent appointed for him, and honourable allowance for his diet. Vassius and the rest of the cheefe commaunders of the armie vsed him with all honor and at such time as he was desirous to see the campe, courteously brought him into all places of it, that he might himselfe see what mounts they had in short time cast; what abundance there was of great artillerie, what strong watch and ward was kept; what a number there was of braue and warlike souldiours of diuers nations, differing much one from another in language, countenance, and manner of furniture: and further demanded, Whether that puissant armie which the emperour had brought ouer to his great good, were in his judgement sufficient to subdue the enemy? Where about all things Muleasses wondered at the number and order of the great ordinance: and next vnto that, at the wonderfull plentie of things to be bought and sold in the market place, and at the modest quietnesse of the souldiours in buying the same. Not long after, the expert capitaines by diligent inquirie learned of him many things well seruing for their better proceeding in that warre, especially of the disposition and strength of them of TUNES; of the situation of the citie, of the nature of the wals, and fortification of the castle, of the wels and cisternes in the suburbs, and what strength the Moores and Numidians were of, which Barbarussa had entertained. In conclusion he assured them (as afterwards it fell out) that Barbarussa would neuer trust to the strength of the wals, which would easily be ouerthrowne with the great artillerie; but would in a great brauerie with ensignes displayed bring all his forces into the field; of purpose to terrifie the Christians with the sight of the multitude of his rasall souldiours, and to breake their array with his Numidian horsemen; who with hideous and terrible cries, after the manner of that nation, would not faile to assaile them: and yet for all that would neuer bring into the battell his Turkish footmen, in whom he reposed his greatest confidence, and whom hee desired most to spare, but would as a craftie and subtil Turk, by opposing of the Moores, whom he held in small regard, trie by their blood what might be done without the danger of his owne men. But as he told them, nothing could be more strange vnto the Moores his countrey men, or that they were more afraid of, than in a set battell to fight with that enemy whose squadrons comming orderly on in glittering armour with long pikes, might scorne & easily ouerthrow the naked archers of the Moores, and the vnarmed Numidian horsemen: and that our men should find nothing more grievous or troublesome than the scorching heat of the Sunne, and the thirst rising thereof; which might easily be remedied by plentie of water, which by slaues and small boats might easily be brought in caskes and bortels from the fleet along the lake, and so distributed amongst the armie: although not farre from the wals of the citie, were certaine old conduit heads, which would yeld them great plentie of water, if the malicious enemy did not to his owne hurt and others poyson the same. These things orderly reported to the emperour, confirmed the hope hee had before conceiued of the desired victorie: So that wholly bent thereupon, and carefully forecasting all things, hee resolu'd forthwith to depart from GVLETTA, and with all his power to besiege TUNES.

But whilst he was preparing things necessarie, ordering his souldiours, and discovering the enemies purposes, his souldiours had daily diuers skirmishes with the Numidians; so that once the skirmish was like to haue come to a just battell, which began in this sort. The Moores had plant'd certaine field pieces amongst the oliue gardens, wherewith they shot continually into the campe: for remouing whereof, the emperour leauing the Italians, with certaine companies of the old Germane and Spanish souldiours, for the keeping of his campe and trenches, went forth with his horsemen and the rest of his armie: sending before him Montegius, Generall of the Spanish horsemen, who for most part were but raw souldiours, such as were of the nobler or dinarie seruants and followers, not before acquainted with the wars. These light horsemen with diuers fortune skirmished a while with the enemy, but when they saw themselves to be hardly charged, and Montegius their Generall grievously wounded, they turned their backs, and in the sight of the emperour shamefully fled to the men at armes which were comming after them. The manner of the enemies fight was, to giue at the first a fierce and desperat charge, and vpon the encounter giuen, of purpose to retire, auoiding thereby the sudden force of their enemies, and by and by to turne againe vpon them with a fresh charge. The emperour seeing the flight of his light horsemen, came on courageously with his men at armes, by whose comming in and valiant encounter the Turkes and Moores were put to flight, and their fieldpieces wherewith they had before annoy'd the campe, taken. In this skirmish the emperour in person as hee stood for most in his armed troups, gaue the signall of battell himselfe by crying with a loud voice, Saint James, Saint James, whom the Spaniards take for their patrone; and so charging the enemy, performed the part not onely of a courageous cheefestaine, but of a resolute and valiant souldior also: reueing with his owne hand Andreas Pontius, a noble gentleman of GRANADO, whom he whorled and sore wounded, the enemy was readie presently to haue slaine, had not the emperour by his comming in saued him; deseruing thereby the Oken garland, which the Romans by the name of Civica Corona gaue as an honour to such as had in battell saued a citien.

About the same time it fortun'd, that thirtie thousand Moores came vpon the suddaine to haue surpris'd a little tower, standing vpon a hill neere vnto the ruines of old CARTHAGE: wherein the emperour had placed certaine souldiours for the keeping thereof, because it was neere vnto his campe. Before these Moores weir a Numidian priest, who bellowing out certaine superstitious charmes, cast diuers scrolls of paper on each side the way, wherein he cursed and baned the Christians: and now they had with fire and smoake brought the Christians in that tower to great extremitie, when the emperour himselfe comming to their rescue with certaine companies of horsemen and footmen, slew the conjuring priest, with others, and put the rest to flight. The discomfiture of the Spanish horsemen caused many men to thinke, that if the emperour should come to a set battell with the enemy, he should find his horsemen too weak both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For which cause he and diuers others, certaine of the emperours graue counsellors, but none of the best souldiours, wished him not to proceed further in that dangerous warre, but with speed to returne out of AFRICK; forasmuch as he had woon honour enough by the taking of GVLETTA, and the surprising of the enemies fleet: whereby he had to his immortal praise, and the common good of Christendome, deliuered all the frontiers of the Christian countries in the Meditertanean from the danger and feare of those most cruell pyrats: besides that, the flux began to rage in his campe, whereof many of his souldiours fell sicke, and died dayly: whereas on the contrarie part, the mightie Numidian princes, such as were Muleasses old enemies, were reported to come in ready to the aid of Barbarussa. These vnseasonable speeches the emperour thought good to repress betimes, reasoning against the vnfaiths thereof with great grauitie, as against men, who with more feare doubted of the successe of things, and the euent of the victorie, than becomed them; whom for their constant resolution and good opinion conceiued of their discretion, hee had chosen to be of his most secret counsell.

Saying, that he desired not of them, that their needlesse and dishonourable labours, wherein they should should shew themselves more carefull of his person than of his honour: for as much as those things which he now alleadged, should haue been said before the warre was taken in hand, now by good hap halfe ended; before hee euer passed ouer into AFRICK. For he might (as he said) haue rested quietly in SPAIN, and haue easily neglected and reiecte the iniuries done vpon the sea coasts, and the complaints of his subiects; but he was (as they well knew) for most urgent causes come thither: whereas hee was resolu'd to satisfie the expectation of the world with a notable victorie, or if God should otherwise appoint, there to end his daies with honour. Wherefore he willed them to cease farther to flatter him that was no way dismay'd, or to possesse the minds of his valiant souldiours with a vaine forboding feare; and with resolute minds, together with him their chieftaine, against the next day, to expect what the fortune of the field should appoint for the full accomplishment of that war. For he was (as he said) set downe to giue the enemy battell, or if he refused the same, to batter the walls of TVNES, not doubting but that God would stand on his side in so good and so goodly a quarrell.

The emperor marcheth toward TVNES.

The emperor leauing a sufficient garrison in the castle of GVLBERT, commanded the breaches to be repaired, and the great ordinance there taken to be laid vpon carriages; which before, after the old rude sea fashion, lay bound in great vnneldie pieces of timber, with yron rings fastned thereto, and could not handsomely be handled or remoued too, or fro. After that, when he had caused the country to be well viewed all about, which betwixt the Oliue groues and the right side of the lake, gueth a direct passage vnto the cite of TVNES; he set forward with his armie in so good order, that he still marched as readie to fight, for feare of the pollicies and sudden assaults of the enemy. On the left hand marched the Italians next vnto the lake, on the right hand the Spaniards neere vnto the Oliue groues, which in the manner of a great wood ran all alongst the country, from the ruines of CARTHAGE almost to the walls of TVNES; in the midst betwixt both marched the Germans; next vnto them followed the great ordinance; and after it, the carriages of all the armie. In the vaungard was Vastius, whom the emperor had made Generall of the armie, and especially for that day: in the rearward was the duke of ALBA, with certaine troupes of chosen horsemen: in the middle of the maine battell was the emperor, and by his side Lewes his brother in law the king of PORTINGALES brother. The Italians were conducted by the prince of SALERN, the Spaniards by Alarco an auncient capitaine, and the Germans by Maximilian Eherstein. But the emperor in his armour ceased not to ride from squadron to squadron, with cheerfull countenance and full of hope, recounting vnto them the former victories which they had gotten for him: and telling them, that he did that day expect of them a most honourable daies seruice, for as much as they were to fight against the naked enemies of the Christian religion: wherefore they should with resolute minds, set downe themselves to endure the waight of their armour, the painfullnesse of the march, the heat of the Sunne and sand, and the tediousnesse of the thirst arising therof; vntill they might joine battell with their enemies, where they should vndoubtedly by the goodnesse of God (in whose quarrell they fought) obtaine the victorie: in the meane time they should with patience overcome all difficulties, comforting themselves with the vndoubted hope of a most rich prey, which they were to expect of the spoile of a rich cite. Whereunto euerie squadron answered with a great shout, that he should not trouble himselfe with those matters which he had before rehearsed, but to assure himselfe that they his souldiours would most patiently endure all extremities, and not deceiue the expectation he had conceiued of their wonted valour, but by valiant fight to make him emperor, not of AFRICK, but of ASIA also.

Now Vastius had withdrawne two companies of harquebusiers out of the Spanish squadron to skirmish with the Moores, who continually followed in the taile of the army; whom by those harquebusiers and certaine troupes of horsemen deputed to that purpose, the duke of ALBA notably repulsed in the rearward.

The armie was now come vnto the cesterne of fresh water, which Muleasses and others which well knew the country had before told them of; which as soone as the souldiours almost fainting vnder the waight of their armour, with the scorching heat of the sunne and extremity of thirst, desired a far off: they for desire they had to quench their thirst, forthwith forsooke their colours, and disorderly ran as fast as they could to those cesterne: Vastius the Generall, to the vttermost of his power labouring in vaine both by faire meanes and foule to haue staid them; who saw by that disorderednesse of the souldiours, a great aduantage offered vnto the enemy, which then

A then was not farre off. But when the Generall could neither with words or blowes preuaile any thing with them, the emperor himselfe was glad to hast thither, with his presence and authoritie to haue kept them in order: yet such was the force of their intollerable thirst, that neither the sight of the emperor, nor all that he could doe, could remedie the disorder; some fainting in the sand for lacke of drinke, and some other for greedinesse readie to burst their bellies at the fountaines; so that the emperor was faine with his truncheon to beat them away. Amongst the rest one Tullius Cicero of ARPINAS a famous capitaine, died at the cesterne side with drinking too much. This extremitie for want of water seemed iustly to haue happened vnto them, for as much as Vastius the day before, had by generall proclamation thorow the campe, commanded that euerie souldiour should carrie with him a bottle of wine or water at his girdle: although he caused so much water as he conueniently could, to be carried in great caskes, for the common reliefe of the armie; whereof the Germans had the greatest part. Some almost readie to giue ouer for thirst, were glad to get a draught of cold water of their fellows which had it, for two duckats.

This disorder being with as much speed as was possible reformed, and the armie againe brought into order, the emperor held on his march toward the enemy: for Barbaruissa with a wonderfull multitude of horsemen and footmen, and a number of ensignes (the instruments of vaine feare and foolish brauerie) gallantly displayed after the manner of the Moores, was come about three miles from the cite, and with certaine field pieces (as Muleasses had foretold) went about to haue broken the battell of the Christians: which pieces although they were oftentimes discharged, yet did they little or no harme, by reason of the vnskilfullnesse of the canoniers. Vastius in like manner and for like purpose, had commanded the great ordinance to be brought into the front of the battell: but perceiuing what toile and time it required to haue it done, for that it was drawne but by strength of men, and the wheeles of the carriages sunke deepe in the deuouring sand, and the shot and powder which the marriners and gallylaues carried altogether vpon their shoulders, came but softly on; he suddenly changed his purpose, and told the emperor, That he thought it not best to stay for the great artillerie in that cheerfulness of his armie, when euerie man desired battell, but to commit all to the valour of his resolute men and his own good fortune, which euer fauoured his honourable attempts: least whilest we stay (said he) too long vpon our great ordinance, which doth not alwaies serue to great purpose in sudden battells, our enemies gather courage in the time of this our vnnecessarie delay; and this exceeding cheerfulness of our souldiours, the most sure token of an vndoubted victorie, by deferring of time grow cold. Whereunto the emperor desirous of battell, and filled with good hope, cheerfully answered: Vastius if thou so thinke it good, which I also like well of, in Gods name giue the signall. That shall I by and by doe (said he) but first it is reason, that you which sway and command a great part of the world, learne at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and shame, you laying aside the imperiall majestic of your selfe, haue for this day made Generall and Commander of so mightie an armie: Wherefore said Vastius, I will now vse mine authoritie, Vastius commandeth the emperor, and command you (such I may not so request you) to depart from this place, and to get you into the middle of the battell neere vnto the ensignes; least by some vnluckie shot, the whole estate of the armie be brought into extreame perill by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the emperor smiling, willed him to feare no such thing, saying moreover, That neuer emperor was yettaine with a gun. For all that he departed out of the place as he was commanded, and went into the middle of the battell. Whereupon the signall of battell was by the sounding of the trumpet and striking vp of the drum, presently giuen, and the enemy (with more hast than the trumpet and striking of the drum required) furiously charged by the emperours horsemen, who to auoid extreame heat of the day required) made all the hast they could to come to handie blowes. In the danger of the great artillerie, made all the hast they could to come to handie blowes. In the foremost of these horsemen was Ferdinand Gonzaga, a most valiant noble man, who then serued the emperor without charge: he being somewhat before the rest at the first onset, flew with his lance a notable capitaine of the Moores, and presently with his sword so troubled them that were next, that he opened a way for them that followed him, to breake into the enemies battell. The harquebusiers also discharged so fast vpon the enemy, that three hundred of them lay dead vpon the ground before the joyning of the battell: which the rest of the footmen seeing, forsook their great ordinance, and fled backe to Barbaruissa: Who long endured not the force or sight of the Christians; but grinding his teeth for sorrow and griefe of mind, turned his horse, and with his Turkes retired into T V N E S . For now that his designes had in the beginning taken so euill successe, he thought it not best to aduenture all in one battell; knowing right well that the emperours armie could not long endure the inconueniences of the intollerable heat, and want of manie things, especially of fresh water: which fed him with hope, that hee should out of these his enemies distresse picke some fit occasion of aduantage, if he could but a while defend the citie of

The empetour glad of the flight of his enemies which were thought to haue been in number an hundred thousand, encamped with his armie that night in the same place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the wals of T V N E S . In the meane time, Barbarussa surprised with an exceeding feare, and distracted with many cares, and now become more cruell than himselfe, had in his mind purposed a fact full of exceeding and inhumane crueltie; which was at once to haue killed all the Christian captiues in the castle of T V N E S : fully resolved to haue put the same in execution, had not Sinan the Jew dissuaded him from that most execrable fact, protesting such a practise to be vnseemely for a man of his valour, famous for his many vi-stories, and carrying with him the majesticie of a king: whereas he would shortly after wonderfully repent him for doing so shamefull a fact: The doing whereof, what was it else (as the Jew said) but a manifest demonstration of his extreame feare, and desperation: which two things were most dangerous to him, that was to maintaine so doubtfull a warre, and would much deface the glorie of his former life; wherefore he should doe well to beware, that by the same of such a most horrible fact, he did not prouoke Solymans heauie displeasure against him: who deuoid of all humane crueltie, had vsed both to detest and reuenge such outrages. W herefore he should suffer the Christian captiues to liue bound in their fatal chaines, so long as it were their fortunes; who being well kept and vnarmed, might shortly after serue him to good purpose, and could no way without most certaine danger moue themselves, if they should vnadvisedly lust after their vnluckie libertie: for by them, the expected victorie could neither be giuen to the ene-mie, nor taken from him, or yet so much as hindred. At which speech the tyrant was ashamed, and so sparing the liues of the poore wretches, went out of the castle into the greatest church of T V N E S , whither he had caused to be assembled all the chiefe men of the citie, to tell them what he would haue done for the defence of the citie, and now by persuation to encourage them to fight: from whom as men by him holden in distrust, he had but a little before the coming of the Christians, taken all manner of armour and weapon.

W hilest Barbarussa was thus busied, the most joyfull and happie day appeared to those miserable captiues; by fortunes change no lesse black and dismall vnto the Turkes and Moores. For that hainous purpose of the cruell tyrant, could not long be couered or kept secret: so that a constant report of a danger so imminent, was run thorow the whole castle, euen into the deepe dungeons; by the compasion of certaine manumised slaues, who detesting the sauage crueltie of Barbarussa their master, and touched with deuotion, had in heart returned to their old and true Christian religion; encouraging by secret speeches the chiefe of the captiues with whom they were acquainted, to lay hand now vpon their libertie. Amongst these well minded men was one Francis a Spaniard, whom Barbarussa had from his youth brought vp as his minion, hauing him alwaies in great esteeme by the name of Memis; and another called Vincenius Catarus of D A L M A T I A an eunuch: These two aduenturing a most memorable and godly attempt, let open the prison doores, and gaue instruments vnto the poore prisoners, ready to take the occasion offered; who boldly starting vp, breake off their chaines and giues, and so by the great goodnesse and mercie of God, about six thousand poore naked Christians, armed with that came first to hand, but especially with stones, brake forth suddenly vpon the Turkes that were in the castle. Ramadas a renegate Spaniard captaine of the castle, stirred vp with the vnexpected and terrible noise of so many prisoners breaking their irons, with a few souldiours whom he had suddenly called vnto him, ran to the castle gate, where one of the prisoners (a lustie young man of S I C I L I A) had with one of the bars of the gate stricke downe one or two of the warders, and hauing bolted the gate, was become master thereof: him Ramadas slew, and opening the gate, made way for himselfe and his few followers, with whom he went to Barbarussa to carrie him newes of that his hard mischance. But the Christians now losed from their bands, and hauing

A suddenly slaine diuers of the Turkes, possessed themselves of all the castle, brake open the armo-rie, and so seizing vpon the kings treasure, armour, and prouision, from a high turret gaue signes of victorie to the Christian armie by smoake and false fires made with gunpowder; and lastly, by displaying of Sarmentus his ensigne, which (as we haue before declared) was by Tabacches taken from the top of the trenches at the siege of G V L A T T A . These signes, although the Christians in the armie could not well perceiue, as being too farre off: yet by the fugitiues which came oftentimes out of T V N E S to the emperour and Muleasses, they were both perswaded, that some great tumult was risen amongst the enemies. W herefore the emperour sent two of his caprains with their companies, who going as neere as they could to the citie and the castle, should discouer what the matter was. In the meane time, Barbarussa almost mad for anger, in his furie blas-pheming his vaine gods, and bitterly cursing and banning the Jew, for dissuading him from killing the captiues, came to the castle gate, and with teares standing in his eyes pitifully requested the late Christian captiues (which then stood vpon the top of the wals and the gate with weapons in their hands) That they would forthwith let him in, faithfully promising them their liber-tie, with a generall and free pardon for all that they had done. But they mindfull both of their former and present fortune, and mooued with just hatred, cast stones at him, and with many opprobrious words rejected his request: so that hee enraged with sorrow and madnesse, shot at them with his owne hand, and seeing all past remedie, and the citie not possible now to bee kept, shamefully betooke himselfe to flight. After him followed the Turkes, in number seuen thousand, with purpose to flie to the citie H I P P O N A , now called B O N A , famous with the bishopricke of C that reuerend Father and great Diuine Augustine. For there (as in a most sure harbour) had Barbarussa left foureteene gallies in the lake neere vnto the citie, to serue his turne whatsoever mischance should happen: but the tacklings, sailes, oares, and ordinance, he had laid vp in the castle fast by, which was kept with a garrison of his owne.

The emperour vnderstanding that Barbarussa with his Turkes was fled, came with all his armie vnto the gates of T V N E S , where the magistrates of the citie were readie to submit themselues vnto him, and to deliuer him the keyes of the citie, only requesting of him that he would keepe his souldiours encamped without the citie, and not to seeke the vtter spoile and ruine thereof, promising that the souldiours should want nothing that was there to be had. Muleasses also carefull of the safetie thereof, earnestly intreated the emperour in the citizens behalfe. But he, although he was of his owne honourable disposition readie ynough to haue graunted what they requested; Yet for that he did not without cause doubt of the Moores fidelitie, and that the pai-ment of the money which they of T V N E S had by Muleasses promised for the payment of the souldiours wages, was by them craftily delayed, expecting still the vttermost deuoure of Barbarussa, he could not by any meanes be perswaded to promise them any certaintie of their safetie: mooued also so to doe by the discontented speeches of his souldiours, who spared not to say, That they should bee hardly and vnkindly dealt withall, if after so long trauell and so much paines taken both by sea and land, they should be defrauded of the reward of the victorie, sith nothing but only the hope of the present spoile did relieue and feed them, being poore and miserable, hauing scarce clothes to couer their nakednesse, and their bodies spent with long labour and thirst; so that the Moores of T V N E S , enemies of the Christian religion, and the perpetuall receivers of most horrible pyrats, might worthily reioice of the Christian victorie, and the conquerours themselves for euer bewaile their owne calamities and miseries. W hilest the emperour stood himselfe for euer what to resolue vpon, Vastius with a small companie came to the castle gate, and thus in doubt what to resolue vpon, Vastius with a small companie came to the castle gate, and was with wonderfull joy receiued in by the Christian captiues. But as he was viewing the wealth and prouision laid vp in the castle, a Ligurian captiue discovered vnto him where certaine treasure lay hidden: for Barbarussa had there cast into a well thirtie thousand duckats sowed vp in bags, which Vastius getting easily out, obtained them of the emperour of gift, as he whole good seruice had well deserued them. The castle thus woon by a most rare chance, and the captiues safety by heapes, running after the spoile into every part thereof, the citizens fearing no such matter, and calling in vaine vpon the faith of Muleasses. The souldiours at their first entrance slew many The Spaniards and Italians sought most after the spoile. But the Germanes desiring more to glut themselves with the Mahometane bloud, filled all places with dead bodies, without regard of sex or age; so that the prophane temples of their vaine prophet, swam with the bloud of them that were fled into them. Which furious execution continued vntill such time as the emperour G moued with the pitifull request of Muleasses, caused proclamation to bee made, That no man should vpon paine of death hurt any citisen, or take any prisoners: yet for all that, it could not otherwise be, but that many young men and women were by the mariners (which were come to the spoile of the citie) carried away to the fleet.

Muleasses for a little money redeemed diuers which he knew out of the hands of such as had them prisoners: amongst others, one of his wiues, whom he sometime held dearest, was ransomed for two duckats. The emperour entering into the castle, commended the captiues, who were the occasion of that speedie victorie: and giuing to euery one of them money, set them at libertie, promising vnto them shipping and prouision to bring them home euery man into his owne country. Vnto the two manumitted seruants of Barbarussa, which were the authours of H breaking the prison, he gaue money and apparrell, and afterward learned of them many things concerning Barbarussa his purposes and secret disposition. In the spoile of the castle, Muleasses lamented the losse of three things especially: first the ancient Arabian bookes, containing the interpretation of the Mahometane law, and the acts of the kings his predecessors; the losse whereof Muleasses (in the hearing of P. Ionius, out of whom this hystorie is taken) said (as he reporteth) that he would most gladly, if it had been possible, haue redeemed with the price of a citie: Then the precious oynments and perfumes, with the wonderfull store of ambergrize, muske, and ciuet, worth much gold: all which Barbarussa as a rude and rough man had made no reckoning of: And last of all, the rare and rich colours for painting, which lying by heapes, were by the ignorant fouldiors, seeking for that might yeeld them present money, foolishly neglected and troden vnderfoot, seruing no man to good. In this castle were found diuers headpieces & other armor of the Christians, namely of the French, who with Lewes their king had about three hundred yeares before besieged that castle: which armour had bene vntill that time there kept by the Moores, in remembrance of that victorie against the Christians.

Barbarussa in the meane time was come to the riuier of Bagrada, which the Moores call Maiordech, which he easily passed ouer, though he was pursued by certain Numidian horsemen, whom Muleasses had raised of his old friends, and of the followers of his vncl Dorax, and sent them to pursue the Turks: but Barbarussa so marched with his harquebusers and archers placed in the reuerward, that the Numidian horsemen durst not come neere him, and so in safetie came to HIPPONA, as he had before purposed. Yet in passing the riuier Bagrada, he lost Haydin of K SMIRNA, that famous pyrat: who being a fat man, and wearied with the heat of the Sunne and painfullnesse of the journey, dranke too much, that he presently died vpon the banke of the riuier. When Barbarussa was come to HIPPONA, he rested his men two dayes: then calling them together againe, he comforted them with good words, persuaading them, that whatsoever mischance had happened, they should impute it not to the valour of the enemy, but to the trecherie of the slaues; exhorting them as valiant men patiently to endure that frowne of fortune, and by some notable exploit to win againe her fauour: for he was determined to put to sea with the fleet he had, and to goe presently from thence to ALGIERS, where after he had with new supplies increased his power, and augmented his fleet, and better aduised himselfe, he would take an attempt in hand answerable to their desires, and not vnbecoming his owne credit and estimation. It is reported, that neuer vanquished and beaten captain was with a more cheerefull acclamation answered by his fouldiors, than hee was at that present; they all with one consent most willingly requesting him to commaund whatsoever pleased him, which they would neuer refuse to vndertake, were it neuer so heauie or dangerous, so that they might be brought to some notable exploit. Barbarussa vsing this exceeding cheerefullnesse and forwardnesse of his fouldiors, did with wonderfull celeritie weigh vp the foureteene galleys which he had sunke in the lake, and forthwith rigged them vp, and furnished them for all assayes: and vpon the very brinke of the lake cast vp a mount of earth, whereon he placed certaine pieces of artillerie for defence of the harbour; not vainly conjecturing, that the Christian fleet would in short time come thither to impeach his going out: pointing therein as it were at the purpose of the emperour and Auria M his Admirall, who were of opinion, That by sending part of the fleet thither, those galleys might be drowned in the harbour with the great ordinance, before they could be rigged and made ready. Vnto this peece of seruice Auria appointed one Adam, a captain of GENOVA, a man of no great skill in matters at sea, but yet of great wealth & credit, and the Admirals nigh kinsman: he

A he with certaine galiots and foureteene galleys, set forward towards HIPPONA, promising vnto himselfe a most certaine and easie victorie, hoping to purchase vnto himselfe great honour of the vnprouided enemy: for that he thought to haue taken Barbarussa busie in setting forth of his fleet. But after he was past BISERTA and come neere to HIPPONA, he was certainly aduertised, that Barbarussa had with incredible celeritie rigged vp his galleys, and fortified the harbour, by planting great ordinance vpon the mount he had there raised: With which newes he wonderfully troubled, changed his purpose, persuaaded by the other captaines of the galleys; in no case to aduventure to fight with him, because the Spanish, Sicilian, and Neapolitan galleys were but weakly manned, many of the fouldiors being for greedinesse of the spoile gone ashore without leaue at TUNES: so that he should at great disadvantage fight with the Turks, being B mo in number and desperately bent. Wherefore he vpon good aduise presently changed his former course, and returned to the fleet for more aid. Barbarussa (as it was afterwards known) stood a good while in doubt, whether he should in hope of victorie pursue those galleys; for as much as they were in number no more than his owne; or else to persist in his former purpose of going to ALGIERS. Vnto which opinion all the vnder captaines inclined; being altogether ignorant of the weaknesse of the Christians: and so letting slip a faire occasion; leauing a small garrison of C the weaknesse of the Christians: and so letting slip a faire occasion; leauing a small garrison of Barbarussa of the Turks in the castle, he departed from HIPPONA and sailed alongst the coast to ALGIERS. When Adam was returned againe to the fleet, and had done nothing, many of the Christian princes were wonderfully offended, that by the negligence of some who were hardly to be commaunded, and by the vnlinesse of others who without leaue were gone ashore, so faire an occasion of the desired victorie, was neglected. For this thing onely wanted vnto the emperours rare felicitie in that warre: for if those few galleys had been taken from the cruell enemy, or sunke in the sea, there had been no meanes for him to haue escaped; being verily thought, that the Numidians in number infinit and deadly enemies vnto the Turks, would with often skirmishes out of their knowne places of aduantage, haue so cut him off in his long and painfull trauell by land, that they would altogether haue made an end both of him and his followers before hee could haue come to ALGIERS. Auria angrie both with himselfe and those whom he had put in trust, and yet not out of hope to ouertake his enemy; with his own galleys and some other of the best ships went to HIPPONA: but finding Barbarussa gone, he tooke the citie and ouerthrew the walls thereof: but in the castle which he by force tooke from the Turks, he placed Aluarius Gometius D with a sufficient garrison, and so returned vnto the emperour. This Gometius, although he was a most valiant captain, yet became so infamous for his auaricious dealing both with the enemy and his friends, that for feare how to answer such things as he knew would be laid to his charge, he became the infamous executioner of himselfe. The castle was afterwards by the commaundement of the emperour, rased downe to the ground, for that it was not without a traituclous charge to be kept. After that, a counsell was holden concerning Muleasses, whom the E decay the charges of a thousand Spaniards. and more, to be left in garrison in the castle of GULLETTA; by holding whereof, the emperour kept as it were the keyes of that kingdome at his girdle. The emperour hauing thus honourably driuen Barbarussa and the Turks, pirats, out of the sea. TUNES, taken from them their galleys, deliuered the Christian countries all alongst the sea coast in the Mediterranean of a great feare, and restored Muleasses againe to his kingdome. Aluarius was led into SICILIA, where he was in great triumph receiued at PANORMVS and MESINA, from whence he passed ouer to RHODVM into ITALIE, & from thence by land to NAPLES. Thus was the kingdome of TUNES taken by Barbarussa and the Turks; and by Charles the emperor recovered againe out of their hands the selfsame time that Solyman was in person himselfe in was against the Persian: whom Barbarussa accompanied with Sinan the Jew; after this F ouerthrow neere ICONTIUM in his returne out of PERSIA, well accepting of their excuse, as is before declared: Solyman as well of his owne ambitious disposition, as following the manner of the Othoman kings, desirous by all meanes to increase the glorie of his name, and to enlarge his empire's dominion with himselfe to take away from the Portugales all their traffique into the East Indies. It

Three things especially lamented by Muleasses in the spoile of the castle of TUNES.

Barbarussa fleeth to HIPPONA, and there consistereth his fouldiors.

Auria sendeth certaine galleys to intercept Barbarussa.

The kingdome of TUNES is by the emperor restored to Muleasses.

The emperor returneth with victory into ITALIE.

It grieved him to heare, that the Christian religion should begin to take root amongst those Pagan kings, which had not long before received the Mahometane religion: Besides that, he was credibly informed, that the Portingales in these late wars he had against the Persians, had aided them with certaine harquebusers, and also had sent them workmen to shew them both the making and vse of great artillerie: But that which moued him most of all, was for that the Portin-gales by their traffique into the Indies, had cut off all the trade of merchandise into the gulf of ARABIA, whereby the riches of the East were wont to be transported vnto CAIRE, and so to ALEXANDRIA, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian merchants and others dispersed into all parts of EUROPE: but now were carried by the great Ocean into PORTIN-GALL, and from thence conuayed into all parts of Christendome, to the great hinderance of his tributes and customes of EGYPT. For these causes, and at the instance of Solyman Bassa an eu-nuch borne in EPIRVS, and then Gouverneur of EGYPT, Solyman caused wonderfull preparation to be made, for the building of a great fleet in the Red sea to go against the Portingals: All the timber whereof, was cut downe in the mountaines of CILICIA, and shipped in the Bay of ATTALIA in the bottome of the Mediterranean, from whence it was by sea transported to PA-LYSIVM, and so vp the riuer of Nilus to CAIRE: where after it was framed and readie to be set together, it was with infinit labour, and no lesse charge, carried by land with Camels thorow that hoat and sandie country, from CAIRE to SVETIA, a port of the Red sea, called in ancient time ARSINOE. From which place eightie miles distant from CAIRE, the ancient kings of EGYPT seeking by vaine and wonderfull workes to eternise the memorie of themselves, had with incredible charge cut thorow all that maine land, so that vessels of good burthen might come vp the same from ARSINOE to CAIRE: which great cut or ditch, Sesostris the rich king of EGYPT, and long after him Ptolomeus Philadelphus, purposed to haue made a great deale wider and deeper, and thereby to haue let in the Red sea into the Mediterranean, for the readier transportation of the Indian merchandise to CAIRE and ALEXANDRIA. Which mad worke Sesostris prevented by death, could not performe: and Ptolomeus otherwise perswaded by skillfull men, in time gaue ouer; for feare least by letting in the great South sea into the Mediterranean, he should thereby as it were with another generall deluge haue drowned the greatest part of GRACIA, and many other goodly countries in ASIA, and with exceeding charge, in steed of honour haue purchased himselfe eternall infamie. Yet by the singular industrie of Solyman the eunuch, who with seuerer commaundement enforced all the people of the countries therabouts: to the furtherance of the building of that fleet; he had with wonderfull celeritie in short time, new built eightie tall ships and gallies at ARSINOE, and furnished them with men, and all things else needfull for so long a voyage. At which time, he vpon a quartell pickt without cause, but not without the good liking of Solyman, most injuriously confiscated the goods of the Venetian merchants at ALEX-ANDRIA and CAIRE, and thrust the mariners into his gallies as slaues. With which fleet in most warlike manner appointed, Solyman the Bassa accompanied with Affan-beg, commonly called the Moore of ALEXANDRIA, a most famous pirat and an excellent seaman, set forward against the Portingals: and sayling thorow the Red sea, and so Eastward by the gulf of PER-SIA, came at length as far as the great riuer Indus, where with all his power he assaulted DIUa castle of the Portingals, situate vpon the mouth of that great riuer: but in conclusion, after he had many daies besieged the castle both by sea & land, and tried the vitermost of his strength, he was so repulled by the Portingals, that he was glad to forsake the siege, and leauing his great ordnance behind him for hast, returned backe againe to ADESSA citie of great trade in ARABIA FELIX: Where discouraged with the euill successe he had against the Portingals, because he would be thought to haue done something, he allured the king of that rich citie to come vnto him, vpon his false faith before giuen for his safe returne: but as soone as he had him aboard, he like a perjured wretch hanged him vp at the yards arme of his Admirall galley, and so surprising the citie, enriched himselfe with the spoile thereof. The like barbarous crueltie he vied at ZE-BYTH, another famous port of ARABIA, where the pilgrims of the East doe commonly land when they after the manner of their superstition come to visite the temple of their false prophet at MECHA: The king of which place, together with all his nobilitie he cruelly murdered, contrarie to his faith giuen: and so traouelling himselfe by land to MECHA, as if he had been some de-uout pilgrim, sent backe his fleet by the Moore to SVETIA, hauing performed against the Por-tingals nothing at all.

At the same time Solyman by the persuation of Lurxi and Max (the Bassas of greatest au-thoritie about him) now that Abraham was dead, turned all his forces from the Persians, as men agreeing with him in the cheefe points of his Mahometane superstition, with purpose to conuert the same vpon IRAK: whereunto he was earnestly solicited by Iohn Forrest the French kings embassadour, then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, of purpose to incite Solyman against Charles the emperour, assuring him, that he was not of such power, as at one time to defend AFRICA against him, and the kingdome of MILLAINE against the French king: who (as he said) was determined that Summer to invade that part of ITALIE. And to further the matter, about the same time one Troilus Pignatellus, a noble gentleman, sometime commander in Charles the emperours armie, put downe exiled out of NAPLES, fled vnto Solyman; and for so much as hee was a man of name, and like to doe him great seruice in the inuasion of AFRICA, as one which knew the countrey well, and promised vnto him good successe in that warres, was by Solyman honourably entertained amongst his Mutfaracas: which is a certaine companie of horsemen for their approued valour, chosen out of all nations, hauing the free exercise of their religion whatsoeuer without controulement, and are onely bound to attend vpon the person of the great Turke. When he goeth to warres. The cause of his reuolt was, for that the vicetoy of NAPLES had executed Andreas his brother, one of the knights of the RHODS. But being now growen into great fauour with Solyman and the Bassas, and oftentimes called to counsell in the preparation of that warre, casting off all naturall loue of his countrey, ceased not by all meanes to persuade Solyman to invade the same, assuring him, that the people of AFRICA and SALERNE oppressed with grievous tribute and exactions by the emperours officers, would at the first reuolt, especially if they saw any of the French nation to cleaue vnto. And that which moued him more than all the rest, the auncient Turkes told him into what a feare all ITALIE was stricken, at such time as Achmetes the Bassa hauing taken HYDRUNTVM, had vndoubtedly conquered not onely the kingdome of NAPLES, but the citie of ROME also, and all the rest of ITALIE, had not the vntimely death of Mahomet his great grandfather interrupted the course of that vi-dorie. Which persuations wrought such effect in Solyman, that he once fully resolved for the inuasion of ITALIE, made such expedition both by sea and land, that he himselfe in person was come with two hundred thousand men vnto AVLONA, the most conuenient port of MACEDONIA for the transporting of his armie, before it was thought in ITALIE that he was set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE: where he had not long stayed, but Lurxi Bassa his Admi-rall, accompanied with Barbarussa, sayling alongst the coast of PAPHLAGONIA and EPIRVS, and so passing by CORCYRA, where Hieronimus Pisaurius, Admirall of the Venetian fleet lay with his gallies (after mutuall salutation done after the manner of sea, by shooting off their great pieces with cannon of small ship) put into the haven of AVLONA also. Solyman not purposing to lose any time, and hauing ITALIE now in his sight, commaunded Lurxi and Barbarussa to passe ouer with the fleet vnto OTRANTO, and to prooue the minds of the people; that if the first enterprise fell out well, he might presently follow after with all his armie. With them went also Troilus Pignatellus, as forwarder the destruction of his country, as any of the rest. He knowing that the great cities of HYDRUNTVM and BRINDVSVM were kept with strong garrisons of Charles the emperour, steering his way vnto the right hand, directed the Turks to a towne vpon the sea coast, by the names of CASTRUM, neere vnto which standeth a castle vpon a hill, and belonging to the Mercurians: who being a man vnacquainted with warres, and terrified with the doctouring of the Turkes, and perswaded by Troilus, yielded vp his castle vpon condition that the Turkes should offer no violence or iniurie vnto him or his, either in bodily or goods. Vpon which condition the towne of CASTRUM was also deliuered vnto them.
But the Turkes, especially the greedy mariners, being got into the castle and the towne, moued neither with the meane of Troilus, nor the commaundement of Lurxi and Barbarussa, rifled the towne and castle, and carried away with them Mercurius himselfe, with all the floure of the people, to their gallies as prisoners. But Lurxi was ashamed of such faithlesse dealing, presently set Mercurians at libertie againe: At the same time also Solyman had by night sent ouer certaine troupes of light horsemen, in great palanders: which running all alongst the sea coast from TA-RANTVM to BAVVSVM, carried away with them both the people and cattell, and whatsoeuer came in their way by the space of fortie miles. So that all that countrey of SALERNI-NUM, now called OTRANTO, was filled with feare and danger, and had not there stayed, but was

came as neere vnto the cite of CORFU as they possibly could, to see which way they might G most conveniently lay siege vnto it: but perceiuing the great strength thereof, being wonderfully fortified, and thorowly manned, they aduertised Solyman, that it was a place inpregnable. Aloysius Ripa, and Symon Leonius, two Senators of VENICE were then gouernors of CORFU, who not without cause standing in doubt of the great strength of the Turkes both by sea and land, caused the suburbs of the cite (which were verie great and sumptuously built) to be plucked downe, for feare that the Turkes throwding themselves in them, should with more ease besiege the towne. This was a wofull and lamentable thing to behold, when as at the same time a man might haue scene the magnificent houses of the Venetian merchants, built in time of long peace, both for profit and for pleasure in euery place of the island, all set on fire by the Turkes: But the regard of the publike state in so great a danger, made all those goodly things which went H so to wracke, to be lightly accounted of in comparison of their liues and libertie; for as much as those lost things might with new charge be againe in short time recovered.

The two Venetian gouernours aforesaid, fearing a long siege, and not prouided of victual to suffice such a multitude as were got into the cite, for any long time; vsed a heauie and sharpe remedie, by turning a great number of weake people and children vnable for seruice, out of the cite, of whom many, especially children, died in the towne ditches in their mothers armes vnder the wals of the cite, nor daring to go any further for feare of the enemy, who had fast by in places conuenient cast vp great mounts, and planted his ordinance against the cite: onely the castle called S. Angelo standing in the middle of the island, about fiftene miles from the cite of CORFU, being valiantly defended by the inhabitants against the assaults of the Turkes, happily I saued about three thousand poore people which fled thither from the furie of the Turkes, who in all other places of the island had made all desolate. The Turkes the more to terrifie them of CORFU, taking a hill not farre from the cite, couered the same with their tents, and from the rocke called MARIBRVS, shot with their great ordinance into the towne: some of them in the meane time standing close in the ruines of the suburbs, did with their harquebusiers kill or wound them which appeared vpon the wals. The gallies also did oftentimes out of their prow discharge their great pieces against the cite, to the greater terrour than hurt of the defendants. Solyman perceiuing that he did but lose his labour in besieging the cite, as he was told at the first by his great capitaines, Lutzius, Aian, and Barbarussa; determined now to raise his siege, and to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, greatly ashamed that he had no better sped neither in K ITALIE, nor at the siege of CORFU. But when he was about to haue departed, it was told him how vnfaithfully some of his soldiours had dealt with them of CASTRUM ITALIE; who yeelding themselves vpon the Turkes faith to them giuen for the safegard of their libertie and goods, were neuertheless most injuriously spoiled of all that they had, and caried away into bondage. VVhich fact as tending to the dishonour of his name, and the deterring of others from yeelding,

Good iustice done by Solyman.

The Turke departs from Corfu, and caries away with them about sixteen thousand Christians into captiuitie.

Solyman tooke in so euill part, that for amending thereof, he caused the authors of that fact to be put to death, and the captiues of CASTRUM to be diligently sought out, and sent home againe into their countrey: well deseruing therein the commendation of a most iust prince. The Turkes left the siege of CORFU and departed out of the island about the twelfth of September; in the yeare 1537: carrying away with them about sixtene thousand of the island people into perpetuall captiuitie. So Solyman rising with his armie, marching thorow A CARNANIA and ETO-LIA, returned thorow MACEDONIA to CONSTANTINOPLE: hauing in this his expedition done great harme both in ITALIE and CORCYRA, but yet nothing encreased his empire or honour.

Before his departure, calling vnto him Lutzius his Admirall, he commaunded him also to returne with his fleet to HELESPONTVS: who, passing by ZAZINTVS, and landing some of his men in the night, tooke diuers of the countrey people prisoners. But vnderstanding that the cite it selfe was both strong and well manned, he departed thence to CATHERA, where vnto-tunately attempting to haue taken the castle, and disappointed of his purpose, he made what spoile he could vpon that island, and with eight hundred prisoners returned into AEGYPTVS: AEGYPTVS a rich and famous island, and well peopled both with mariners and other inhabitants. Approching the island, he by his messengers sent before vnto the Gouerour of the cite, attempted first by faire means, and afterwards by threats to haue had the cite yeilded vnto him: and not so preuailing, but perceiuing them to stand vpon their defence; he landed his men and gaue the signall

A nall of battell. Which they of the island refused not, but manfully met him, and at the first encounter slew many of his men: wherewith the Admirall grievously offended, and still landing fresh men, euen with his multitude oppressed them of the island; being but in number few, and wearie of long fight; and so enforced them to retire into the cite.

To be reuenged of this iniurie, the Bassa caused certaine pieces of great ordinance to be landed, and a batterie planted against the cite: by force whereof, he had in short time in diuers places opened the wals, and then with all his power assaulting the breaches, forthwith tooke the ci-tie: which after he had rifled, he burnt it downe to the ground, rased the wals, and put the men euery mothers sonne to the sword. As for the women, he gaue them without respect vnto the lust of his souldiours and mariners, whom afterwards together with the boies and young children he shipped into the countrey neere vnto ATHENS, to be from thence conuayed to CON-STANTINOPLE into most miserable seruitude.

AEGINA thus vterly rased, he with much like force and crueltie raged vpon them of P AROS, and the other islands thereabouts, killing the old men and such as made resistance, and thrusting the rest into his gallies. Shortly after he came to the island of NAXOS, where all the island people were for feare of his comming, fled out of the countrey into the cite: there landing his men, he made hauocke of whatsoeuer came to his hand. And in the meane time sent a messenger vnto the duke, to will him to yeeld himselfe and his cite to the obedience of the Turkish emperour Soly-man. VVhich messenger admitted into the cite, and brought before the duke, in blunt and plaine termes, without farther circumstance, deliuered his message as followeth:

C If thou wilt without more adoe, yeeld thy selfe, thy cite and territorie to the Constantinopolitane emperour, thou shalt deserue his fauour, and so saue thy selfe with that thou hast. But if thou otherwise aduised, shalt now refuse this grace, thou shalt neuer hereafter haue the like offer: but for euer, vnto thy selfe, thy wife and children, thy citizens and subiects in generall. Here is present a most mightie fleet with most valiant and victorious souldiours, furnished with all the habiliments of war, requisite for battell or siege. Be warned by them of AEGINA, P AROS, and other thy neighbours, princes of the islands. Thy hap is good, if thou be not misadvised; and warned by other mens harmes wilfully refuse to remedie thine owne; and when thou mightest be safe, wilfully cast away thy selfe.

The blun speech of a Turke sent by Lutzus Bassa vnto the duke of Naxos.

D This said, he was commaunded by the duke to stand aside, and a while to expect his an-swere: who with the chiefe of his subiects there present, but much troubled, and all full of hea-uinesse and sorrow, consulted what answere to make. But after they had according to the waigh-tinesse of the cause and necessitie of the time fully debated the matter, it was with generall con-tinesse agreed, That for as much as they were not themselves of power to withstand so furious an enemie, neither to expect for helpe from others, they should therefore yeeld vnto the present vnecelsitie, which otherwise threatned vnto them viter destruction, and reserve themselves vnto better times. VVherevpon answere was giuen vnto the messenger by the duke, That he was ready to yeeld himselfe vnto Solyman as his vassalle, and of him as of his soueraine to hold his siegnorie for the yearly tribute of five thousand duckats. Of which offer the Bassa accepted, receiving in hand one yeares tribute. So was that notable island yeilded vnto the Turkish obedience the 11. of November this yeare 1537: from whence Lutzius the proud Bassa laded with the rich spoile of the countreys and islands he had passed by, returned to CONSTANTINOPLE with his fleet. Not long after, this great Bassa then in credit and authoritie next vnto Solyman himselfe, fell at odds with his wife, Solymans sister: for that he after the vnnatural manner of those barbarous people kept in his house a most delicat youth, in whom he took more pleasure than in his wife. VVhich she being a woman of great spirit not able to endure, and knowing her husband by marrying of her to haue been from base degree aduanced vnto the highest honours that the by marryng of her to haue been from base degree aduanced vnto the highest honours that the emperour her brother could heape vpon him, in great rage reproued him with most bitter words, saying, That she had married him to be of him beloued, and vsed as his wife, and not contemptuously abused by his minions. VVherewith the Bassa moued, gaue her a blow on the face, and caused her as a foolish and vnquiet woman to be shut vp in her chamber. But she not brooking such abuse, came weeping to Solyman her brother, and complaining of her husband, requested to be diuorced from him, who made no better reckoning of her: And with her complaint so incensed Solyman, that he tooke from him his scale, and thrust him out of all his honorable

able promotions, and had vndoubtedly put him to death, had not the remembrance of his old G loue and friendship staid his furie: Yet hauing vterly disgraced him; he banished him the court into MACEDONIA, where he spent the remainder of his loathed like as a poore priuat man: of whom Bosardus thus writeth.

*Que tibi cum molli res est pollute Cynado: Cum cubet in Thalamis regia nympha tuis?
Ex humilis fortuna loco te euexit in altum Ex alto maior saepe ruina venit.*

On daintie boies, thou filthie man, why doest thou fix thine eye:
Whilest princely dame of roiall bloud, doth in thy chamber lie:
From base estate to honours height, blind fortune did thee call,
And set thee vp with princes great, to worke thy greater fall.

*The Turks spoile the Venetians, and the Venetians like-

Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians, as is aforesaid, to entangle them at once with was in diuers places, commanded his lieutenants in euerie place bordering vpon any part of the Venetian seignorie, to vex and molest them with all hostilitie, which they did accordingly: In Pa-LOPONESVS, Castles besieged NAUPLIUM and EPIDAVRVS, two strong cities of the Venetians: Barbarossa landing his men in DALMATIA, surpris'd the ancient citie of BOTORVS, belonging to the Venetians, carried away the citizens & rased the citie: OBROATIVM another citie of the Venetians in DALMATIA, called in auncient time AROIVTVM, with the castle of NADIN, were taken by Vstref, Solymans lieutenant in ILLYRIA. The Venetians thus invaded on enemie side, requited them againe with the like: Pisaurius and Veturius (the Venetian Admirals) landing their men, besieged SCARDONA, a citie of the Turkes in the borders of DALMATIA, which they tooke by force, put the Turkes to the sword, and ouerthrew the wals of the citie, because it should be no more a refuge vnto the Turkes: They sent also one of their capitaines called Gabriel Ribens to besiege OBROATIVM; who vpon the comming of Amurathes, one of Vstref's his capitaines, cowardly fled, and in flight lost most of his men; for which his cowardise, Pisaurius caused his head to be stricke off aboard the Admirall gally: And Camillus Vrsinus appointed by the Venetian state Gouernour of IADRA, a strong towne vpon the frontiers of their terri-torie in DALMATIA, tooke from the Turkes the towne of OSTROVIZZA, which he burnt downe to the ground: Herecouered also OBROATIVM, which was a little before lost; which by the commaundement of the Senat he vterly rased, as a place not well to be kept against the enemye.

The same Autumne that Solyman hauing wasted CORCYRA was returned to CONSTAN-TINOPLE, and the Venetians held warres with the Turkes for the townes and castles in DAL-MATIA: king Ferdinand receiued such an ouerthrow at EZZEK by the Turkes, as a greater or more shamefull vnto the name of the Christians was hardly in that age scene; if the losse of the choise souldiours and capitaines of foure great nations, with the shamefull flight of the Generall be well considered. After the battell of MOHAHZ wherein king Lewes was lost, the Turkes hauing gotten the victorie, kept vnto themselves that part of HUNGARIE which is called POSSEGA, because thereby they had a fir passage from BELGRADE further into HUNGARIE: The two great riuers of Sauus and Dranus, running almost with equall distance from the West, taking with them diuers other smaller riuers, before they fall into the great riuers of Danubius Eastward, doe on both sides inclose this country of POSSEGA, being a rich and plentifull countrie, and wonderfull well peopled: It bordereth vpon the prouinces of CROATIA and CORBANIA, which in times past were at continuall warres with the Turkes garrisons thereby in ILLYRIA and BOSNA.

Mahometes Go-uernour of Belgrade.

At that time one Mahometes a most valiant captain of the Turkes was Gouernour of Bel-GRADE, to whom for his approved valour and wisdom Solyman had committed the keeping of those frontiers, and the protection of the kingdom of HUNGARIE in the behalfe of king John. He the yeare before had so used the matter, that what by force, what by policie, he had taken from the Christians about thirtie small castles in that country (which was sometime part of the patrimonie of the Despot of RASCIA) and had joynted them to the regiment of BOSNA.

An euill assured peace.

A One of these castles amongst the rest called EZZEK, for the commodious situation thereof hee strongly fortified, as that which might giue him passage ouer the riuers Dranus into HUNGARIE: from whence he set in infinit preyes out of king Ferdinand's countrey neere vnto him. Yet was there at that time a certaine league betwixt Solyman and Ferdinand, which notwithstanding after the old custome of those countries for the exercise of the garrison souldiours, did beare with the taking of bootie, and light skirmishes without any breach thereof; so that it were done without any great power or field pieces: which wrong named peace, Mathias and the auncient kings of HUNGARIE had of long time used with the Turkes, doing them with their nimble light horsemen no lesse harme than they receiued. But the Germans now vsing no such light horsemen, but seruing vpon great horses, and charged with heauie armour, receiued great hurt by those light skirmishes; the Turkes with their light horses easily shunning their charge, and againe at their pleasure charging them afresh, when they saw the heauie German horses almost wearie and spent: by which meanes the German horsemen were oftentimes by the Turkes light horsemen ouerthrowne, and so either slaine or taken: King Ferdinand not well brooking these continuall injuries, and grieved in mind with the league which Solyman had to his profit made with him at his going into PERSIA, finding the same both vnprofitable and hurtfull to himselfe; determined to take vp armes, with purpose, that if he could driue the Turkes out of the countrey of POS-SEGA, then forthwith to passe ouer Dranus, and to go directly to BUDA against king John. It still stucke in his mind how that kingdom was taken from him by Solyman, and that more was, as it were in disgrace of him and the house of AVSTRIA, bestowed vpon a stranger, which had neither right thereto, nor was any way roially descended. Yet were there some which wished him not rashly to enter into armes against so mightie an enemye, as was not to be vanquished but by the united forces of all the Christian princes of EVROPE: For they foresaw that Solyman so prouoked, would not put it vp, but for the hatred he bare against the Christians, and for his owne honour seeke more cruell reuenge: as he had of late done against the Venetians, with whom vpon a light occasion he had broken a most auncient league, for sincking one or two of his gal-lies; for which he would admit no excuse or satisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to be true, yet all the people of his dominions lay so earnestly vpon him to take that warre in hand, that they said plainly, they would neuer beare armes more against the Turkes, if he omitted that occasion.
For they of CARINTHIA, STIRIA, CROATIA, and NORICVM, subject to the inuasion of the D Turkes, and daily receiuing great harmes, thought the Turkes might easily be driuen out of POS-SEGA, for as much as Mahometes had no great power nor like to haue any greater, Autumne being now almost spent.

So, king Ferdinand with the wonderfull rejoycing of his subjects, caused souldiours to be taken vp in all parts of his kingdom, sending for most of his nobilitie and best capitaines, as to a religious warre: and in a verie short space had raised a good armie, yet supposed of greater strength than number, as consisting most of select men. The footmen were for most part Germans, to whom were ioyned as wings certaine companies of Italians, harquebusiers, whom Lewes Lodronius a valiant captain and generall of the footmen had raised in RHETIA, and those parts of ITA-LIE which lie neere vnto the Alpes. The horsemen were of BOHEMIA, SILEZIA, MORAVIA, E STIRIA, CARINTHIA, and some also out of HUNGARIE, all conducted by their severall captaines: all these horsemen were in number eight thousand, but the footmen were sixteene thousand strong: with great store of artillerie of all sorts. This armie for the expertnesse and valour of the souldiours, was thought sufficient to haue met the greatest armie of the Turkes in field, if it had been conducted by a politick Generall, and (as he had at other times been) fortunat; which was one John Cazianer a noble man of CROATIA, whom as one of great experience and famous for the late defence of VIENNA, king Ferdinand had made Generall of his armie: For F Ferdinand by the aduise of his best friends, neuer used to aduenture his person vnto the danger of him, sent for diuers companies of the garrison souldiours, which lay vpon the borders neere hand; any battell, especially against the Turkes, by whom many Christian kings had in former time been vanquished and slaine, but performed all his wars by his lieutenants: which he was thought to doe, not so much for want of courage, as moued with the fatall mishap of so many Christian kings. Mahometes Gouernour of BELGRADE, vnderstanding of this preparation made against him, sent for diuers companies of the garrison souldiours, which lay vpon the borders neere hand; he required aid of the gouernours of the Turkes prouince thereabouts; and was especially hol-pen by Vstref Gouernour of BOSNA, who of all Solymans lieutenants in EVROPE, was able to bring

bring into the field most good horsemen: he sent him Amurathes a famous captain with a great company of gallant horsemen, vnto whom were joynt certaine companies of Bulgarians of the wild and mountaine people of DALMATIA, entertained for pay; which rough and rude kind of people were gouerned and kept in order by certaine companies of Ianizaries, drawne out of the garrison townes as far as BELGRADE and SAMANDRIA: after them followed many out of SERBIA & RASCIA, some for pay, some for prey: The Turks receiued liberally paying to such as were willing to serue, two months pay beforehand. Neither wanted he aid of the Hungarians from BUDA: so that the Turkish gouernours on euery side putting to their helping hands, Mahometes had in short time gathered such an armie, as for number and strength was not much inferior to king Ferdinands, and resolved to expect the coming of his enemies at EXEK. Cazzianer was now come as farre on his way as CAPRVNZA, a towne vpon the riuer Dranus; he hauing before well and conueniently provided for the victualling of his armie, if they whom he put in trust and had taken the matter vpon them, had with like speed and diligence performed their charge: for they were the cheefe men of all the countrey, who all followed the direction of Simon, bishop of ZAGRETA: who enflamed with zeale about measure, or els for want of judgement deceived, had promised to serue the whole campe with plentie of victuall at a very low rate. VVhich thing the countrey people which were to bring in the victuall, some by wagon, some by boats alongst the riuers, many difficulties now arising, were not able to performe: which was not to be remedied, by reason of the neere nesse of the enemy, and also for that Mahometes with small galleies in both riuers, and his troups of horsemen pricking vp and downe the countrey, did either stay the countrey people from bringing of victuall, or els allured them for a greater price to bring it to his owne campe: where they receiued for it readie money. Cazzianer setting forward from CAPRVNZA, hardly came in ten daies to the castle of VBRVZA, which is about fortie miles distant from CAPRVNZA, being enforced to make short marches, by reason of the troublesome carriage of seuen great peeces of artillerie for batterie. The winter fort began euen then to misdoubt the want of victuall both for the reasons before alledged, and for that such victuall as was looked for, came not, although they had marched very softly; so that they were then enforced to spend such victuall as they had provided, not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted warre. VVherefore Cazzianer writ sharply to the bishop, and the other which had taken vpon them the charge of providing victuall for the armie, commaunding them to vse all possible diligence and speed, and not to let the hope of a notable victorie to be lost through their negligence, for want of victuall rather than the valor of the enemy. In the meane time Cazzianer thought good there to stay, and to expect the coming of the victuall, sending before him Paulus Bachitius with a thousand Hungarian light horsemen, and certaine companies of Italian harquebusers, as farre as the castle of ZOPHA, to the intent, that he might of such prisoners as he could take, learne something of the enemies purpose. The Turkes in the castle of ZOPHA descrying the coming of Bachitius, and thinking the whole armie of the Christians had bene there at hand, set fire on the castle, which they thought they could not keepe, and by boats fled downe the riuer Dranus. Yet for all their hast Bachitius took some of them in their flight: of whom Cazzianer learned that which hee before knew by his owne espials, how that Mahometes and the Turkes lay encamped at EXEK, with a full resolution to giue him battell. Cazzianer setting forward againe, still keeping alongst the riuer Dranus, came in eight daies to the castle of VALPO: where by the way he was glad to stay seuen daies at the riuer Craffus, which falleth into Dranus, vntill such time as a bridge was made for the transporting of his armie, for that the riuer was not to be waded ouer: in which time Cazzianer entered oftentimes into counsell with the other capitaines, what course to hold for the better proceeding in that warre. VVhere diuers men were of diuers opinions, some said it were best to leaue EXEK, and to besiege a castle of the enemies thereby, called VITVACH: the others more wearie than the rest, were of opinion, That it were better there to stay, vntill the rest of the aid and the victuall which they daily expected, were come. But the greater number, which also prevailed, vied the first determination of going directly to the enemy at EXEK, for that longer delay would but breed further danger: and there was in the campe (as they said) both strength and victuall sufficient for the obtaining of the victorie, if they would make an end of their needlesse consultations, and not protract the warre vntill winter were come on: whereby they did nothing els, but cause the souldiors to thinke that they were afraid to meet the enemy, and secretly cretly to steale away backe againe into their countries: VVhereas if they would like resolute men march on forward against the enemy, who at other times, trusting molt vnto his multitudes, and now hauing no great power, would neuer abide the sight of the Christian armie, bringing with it so much artillerie, but would forthwith forsake the place, and neuer shew his face: for as much as the Christian men at arms would (as they said) easily breake thorow and ouerthrow the naked Turkish horsemen, if they durst abide the field. The young souldiors, who as yet had neuer made proofe of the Turks manner of fight, did with such cheerefulness like of this resolution, that they thought two daies staying a long delay of so readie and easie a victorie. VVherefore it was resolved vpon presently to set forward, and therupon the armie was mustered: where, vpon view taken, there was found to be ten thousand horsemen (for diuers troups of Germans were come to the campe, after the time of the first setting forward of the armie): a more gallant company of horsemen, both for the strength of their horses, and goodly furniture of the men, had seldome been scene in an armie so suddenly raised. But the footmen, selected out of all the prouinces, was greatly diminished, being now in number scarce eight thousand strong: for many were sicke in the campe, others wearie of the long journey, lingering behind, were stolne away; and generally all they which were left, moyled with dirt and myre, by reason of the deepenesse of the rotten way, wet thorow with raine, and almost starued with cold, and thereto pincht with hunger, were thought scarce able to endure the hardnesse of the present warre. After that, commaundement was giuen, That euery souldior should carrie with him three daies victuall: and proclamation made, That no man should vpon paine of death take any Turke prisoner, although he yielded himselfe, or charge himselfe with any spoile before the battell were fully ended; for as much as the capitaines would afterwards deuide the spoile of the enemy amongst the souldiors. This proclamation thus made thorow the campe, they set forward towards EXEK: & the third day they came to a certaine valley, about three miles from EXEK, where they encamped. The next day a company of Turkes shewed themselves, which was by the great ordinance repulled. The day following the enemy sallied out of the towne and skirmished oftentimes with the Christians: in which skirmishes many were slaine on both sides, but more wounded of the Christians, for that the Turkes had polittickely mingled certaine Ianizaries harquebusers, and archers, with their horsemen: who vied to that manner of fight, sore gauled the Christian horsemen. For which cause the Generall forbade all such light skirmishes, as purposing to keepe his strength whole, against the generall day of battell: commaunding his cannoniers so to place the great ordinance, as might most annoy the enemy, if he should shew himselfe by troups within the danger of the shot: which was so well performed, that the Turkes sallying forth, receiued thereby great hurt, the deadly shott flying thorow the midst of their companies. The same day Simon bishop of ZAGRETA came into the campe with his horsemen, and a certaine prouision of victuall, whereby the feare of the want before conceived, was well eased. Mahometes perceiving, that the Christians were not longer to be drawne to those harmefull skirmishes, but that he must bring his men in danger of the great shot: to annoy them by another meanes, sent many small boats, manned with harquebusers and small peeces of ordinance, into the lake neere vnto the campe, so to keepe the Christians from watering there, and with those small peeces shot oftentimes into the campe. Neere vnto the valley where the Christians lay, was a hill, whereupon stood a village, wherein were placed certaine companies of Turks, to skirmish as occasion should serue with the Christians: for displacing of whom the whole armie was put in order of battell, and the great artillerie bent vpon them; that they should not with their light skirmishes, after the manner of the Turks, trouble the order of the armie. VVhich thing the Turks perceiving, and that they were not able to hold the place, set fire on the towne, and so retired to EXEK. The Christians keeping on their march, came to the top of the hill, from whence they might see EXEK stand about two miles off in a faire plaine, neere vnto the banke of Dranus: all which low ground betwixt the hill and EXEK was so subject to the castle, that it was thought a matter too full of danger to attempt that way to batter the castle, and to expose the armie to the inevitable furie of the enemies shot. VVherefore descrying a rising ground on the further side of the cite, equall with the top of the wals, they thought it best to remove their campe thither, and on that side to plant their battell against the cite. But to come to that place, was thought a matter of no small trouble; for they must set a compass three miles on the right hand thorow a Forrest by a foule and trouble some way, before they could come to the place they desired: for the armie was not so great, as to besiege the citie round; wherein were not (as is reported) about sixteen thousand men: neither was there such store of victuals in the campe, but that the armie was like soone to feele the want thereof, without a continuall supplie, which would hardly be had; the enimie still besetting every passage, and with their light horsemen scouring about all the countrey, of purpose to keepe them from victuall. For which cause, some were of opinion, That it were best for them there to stay where they were, vntill such time as both more aid and better store of victuals were come vnto them: but others of contrary mind, said the enimie was but barely stored with victuall himselfe, and therefore could not long hold out, which they said they vnderstood by certaine Christian fugitiues; and that Mahometes had put his cheefe substance into certaine boats, to be conueyed downe the riuer, as purposing to flie, and would not hold out the siege about three dayes: As for the forrest, they thought it would well ynough be passed thorow, if they would courageously set forward: Beside that, the time of the yeare suffered no delay, Winter comming so fast on, that except some notable thing were done quickly, they should be enforced by the very time of the yeate to returne with shame, without doing any thing. This opinion was best liked of, as more honourable and better becomming men of valour, than to lie still in one place: whereupon the next day the armie remoued, and in good order marched thorow the forrest: VVhich thing Mahometes quickly perceiuing, presently sent forth a thousand light horsemen, and certaine companies of the Ianizaries, harquebusiers, to trouble the Christians in their passage: who by a neerer and well knowne way ouertaking the armie, suddenly charged the reterward, wherein the Italians and Bohemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians with much adoe endured the charge: but being relieued by the Carinthian men at armes, they notably repulsed the Turks, and put them to flight. So the armie with small losse passed the forrest, and came to the place they desired: where after they had encamped themselves, and in good order placed all things needfull for the siege, they in seemely order offered vnto the enimie battell. But he keeping himselfe within the towne, shot at the Christians with his great ordinance: and they to requite him, with two great pieces which they had placed vpon the rising of a hill, shot thorow both the wals of the towne and the bulwarke also, to the great terrour of the defendants. The Christians in the meane time hauing stood almost all the day in order of battell in the sight of the enimie, vainely expecting when he should come forth to giue them battell, returned at night into their campe: For Mahometes vpon great consideration kept in his soldiors, although they were most desirous to fight, vnderstanding right well of the want of victuall in the Christian campe; and beside that (as the fugitiues reported) being straightly commanded by letters from Solyman, that he should not vpon paine of a most shamefull death forsake the place, but to defend it to the last. Now the Christians desirous of battell, being thus delayed and deceived of their expectation, had in a few dayes spent the small store of victuals they had, and began to feele a generall want: neither was there any apparent meanes how they should be releued, so that euery man began to feare some generall mischeefe to ensue. VVhen Balthasar Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, and a capitaine of great experience, sitting in counsell with the rest, entered into this speech.

The Turks skirmish with the Christians in passing the forrest.

Mahometes wisely refuseth to fight with the Christians, offering him battell.

Balthasar Pamphilus his counsell for releefe of the armie.

Captaines (said he) we doe all that we doe, vnadvisedly: for whilst we consult at large how we may overcome our enemies, the strength of our armie is in the meane time so weakened for want of victuall, that the souldiors are neither well able to stand on their legs, nor to hold their weapons in their feeble hands: and generally, euery they which are of greatest courage begin now to quail, and despairing of battell, see that they must miserably and shamefully perishe for want: wherefore in my opinion, we ought first and aboue all things most speedily to provide for this want, which so greuously pincheth vs: and presently to remooue hence vnto the castle of HERMANDIA, that with the prouision thereof, which is not like to be little, we may refresh our whole armie; and so releued, to proceed further as occasion shall require.

This castle was about ten miles distant from EXEK, whereinto many of the Turks had conueyed their wiues and children, and cheefe substance, being kept with a small garrison of towne Turks. Fast by the castle was a pretie little walled towne, without flankers; after the manner of the old fortifying: which towne and castle Balthazer said would easily be taken. This his counsell was well liked of all men, and he himselfe sent with certaine companies of souldiors to take the towne. VVherein fortune so fauoured him, that it was at his first comming surrendered vnto him: but when he had it, he found not therein any such store of corne or victuall as he had hoped for:

for: yet he tooke there certaine vessels of wine, to the great reliefe of the weake souldiors. Vpon the newes of the taking of this towne, the campe remoued from EXEK about ten a clocke in the night, but so disorderly, that the souldiors scarce knowing their owne ensignes, seemed rather to haue fled for feare than marched for spoile: yet the Turkes for all that moued not out of EXEK, misdoubting some deceit, and loath to attempt any thing rashly in the night: VVhen the armie was come to the towne, the captains tooke order, that the victuall there found, was equally deuided amongst the souldiors, and the next morning batterie laid against the castle; which those few Turkes valiantly defended halfe a day, and then by composition yielded it. But when the castle was taken, there was found in it but two barrells of meale, and other two of miller. Then might a man haue seene the captains themselves hanging their heads as men stricken with a sudden feare, who in steed of a great prey & victuall to haue serued many daies, found nothing but a few women and children, and scarce so much victuall both in the towne and castle, as would serue the army two daies. Yet they dissembled the matter, and fed the souldiors with hope of better store, after the bridge were once repaired, that they might passe the riuer of Bodrog, which ran by the towne: which bridge the Turks had before (for defence of themselves) broken, by plucking vp of certaine piles, and taking away of the planks: wherefore the Carpenters being set on worke and euery man putting to his helping hand, the bridge was with continuall labour in three daies repaired. The fourth day, the wagons and smaller pieces of ordinance passed ouer the bridge, and after them six of the great pieces for batterie: but the bridge ouercharged with the seuenth, which was of a wonderfull waight, and much greater than the rest, began to breake: so that the captaines were enforced to breake that faire piece of ordinance, and so by pieces to carrie it away, that the enimie should not get so great a spoile. All things being thus well passed ouer, the piles were againe cut downe; and the planks stricke off, to the intent the enimie should not that way pursue them: and other way was there none, but to fetch a compasse about the great lake which was many miles about. Here the captaines began to consult, whether it were best to breake the great pieces of ordinance, that so they might more speedily march away, or not. Of which opinion was Cazianer himselfe, promising of his owne charge to new cast them. As for the scaling ladders, and such other like things prouided for the siege, they burnt, because they should not come into the enemies hand, or trouble themselves in their march: But most of the captaines were opinion, that it was not best so dishonourably to breake those goodly pieces, the greatest ornament and defence of their countrey; but to hold on their march thorow POSSOGA, vntill they came to IUVANCHA, where they should find great store both of corne and wine: which towne, with the castle of GARA fast by it, stored with all kind of prouision, they said would easily be taken before the Turkes could possibly come so far about the lake from EXEK: and that it were a great shame, so to returne without doing any thing. Cazianer thus perswaded, set forward, and with great toile (by reason of the deepnesse of the way and heauinesse of the great ordinance) came by night to IUVANCHA, which was but three miles off: where the Turkes hauing with incredible celeritie passed a long journey, arrived at the same time also. Neere vnto this castle was a little towne, out of which all the Turkes were fled: the townsmen being Christians, opened the gates and receiued in the souldiors; who there filled themselves abundantly with wine, and could hardly be driuen out thence by their captaines to the campe. The same night the Turkes burnt the same towne, and whatsoever the Christians had therein left. And euery man betooke him to his armour in the campe, for the enimie was now at hand: and in the dawning of the day began boately to skitish in diuers places with the Christians; but especially in that quarter of the campe where the Bohemians lay. VVherewith Petrus Raschinus Generall of the Bohemians being grieved, set vpon them with a troupe of his best horsemen, and enforced them to flie: But the Turkes after the manner of their fight, quickly returning againe, and relieued by the comming in of their fellowes, beset the Bohemians on euery side, and slew many of them. Raschinus the Generall fighting most valiantly, was there slaine with his followers. The Christian captaines purposing to retire home, placed on each side of the armie foure ranks of wagons for defence on both sides: in the vauward were placed the weake and sicke men, yet so, that in the front of the armie were certaine companies of lustie tall souldiors: but in the rearward was placed the greatest strength both of horse and foot. The armie thus marching as it were on both sides intrenched; as it oftentimes met with wooddie hills which hindered their way, so did the same sily serue the Christians, that the Turkes could not conueniently assaile them in their march,

The castle of HERMANDIA yielded to the Christians.

match, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiuing, sent before certaine companies of Ianizaries and nimble footmen, which knew the countrey and the passages well, with certaine faulconets and other small pieces to take the straits whereby the armie was to passe, and so to gaul them in their passage; and when they could keepe the place no longer, to flie backe to another, and so from place to place: and in the open places he had his troupes of light horsemen, which were euer busie in one place or another of the armie. By which meanes the Christians in their march receiued much harme, which grieved them the more, for that no great power of the Turkes was any where to be seene together, but stragling companies; which as they were commanded, sometime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retire againe, and with their arrowes and faulcon shot, from places of aduantage assaile them. At one of these straits somewhat bigger than the rest, Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian capitaines, in whom the souldiours generally reposed their greatest trust, was slaine with a faulcon shot, with diuers other of the valiant Hungarians; who seeing there a greater number of the Turks than they had seene in other places, thought to haue done some good seruice vpon them: His death brought a generall feare vpon the whole armie, for as much as both then and at other times, without him they neuer had any good successe against the Turkes. Yet in that skirmish, the Hungarians to revenge the death of their capitaine, did with such force repulse the enemye, that they caused him after he had lost many of his men, to run away and leaue his small field pieces behind him. But such was the weaknesse or cowardise of the Christian footmen, and the agilitie of the Turks, especially the Ianizaries, that they with their shot out of the woods, staid the Hungarian horsemen from the pursuit of their fellowes, and recovered their small field pieces before they could be carried away by the Christian footmen: wherewith they did againe forerun the armie, and still trouble it as before. The Christians beset with these dangers, and almost spent for want of viactuall, seeing no meanes to relieue their weake bodies, nor any small hope to comfort their fainting spirits, did generally feare some extreame calamitie to ensue: and so much the more, for that it was reported, that Mahometes still expected fresh supplies from BELGRADE, SAMAN- DRIA and NICOPOLIS: and many of the Hungarian light horsemen stole away from them, as carefull of their owne safetie: neither did they see any comfort in the dismaied capitaines, who at other times were wont with cheerfull and couragious words to relieue the souldiours, if they saw them any thing discouraged. But when they were come into a faire open field nere vnto a towne called GARA, they were aduertised, That the enemye had in the woods before them whereby they were to passe, cut downe great trees crosse the waies, so that neither their great or dinance nor wagons, nor yet their horsemen could possibly passe that way but that they must needs breake their order.

A generall feare in the Christian campe.

This once bruted thorow the armie, filled them all with heauinesse and desperation: and so much the more, for that Ladislaus Morcus, and others which knew the countrey well, said there was but two waies to escape: the one thorow the woods about ten miles space to WALPO, which by reason of the trees cut downe crosse the waies by the Turkes was not to be passed; but they must needs leaue behind them their great ordinance and carriages: the other towards the castle of ZENTHERZEBETH, which was in Ladislaus Morcus his countrey, certaine miles distant from GARA: by taking of which way, the enemye by reason of the straightnesse of the passage, must of necessitie be enforced to giue ouer his pursuit. Yet for all that, it was in counsell resolved vpon, to take the way thorow the woods to WALPO, for that there was there viactuall enough, and in the castle of WALPO was kept money sent from king Ferdinand, sufficient to pay the souldiours for all that winter. And so leauing the great ordinance behind them, and burning the powder and whatsoever else could not well be carried on horseback, to set forward with all speed: As for the trees, they said, they would be well enough removed, and the way opened by the pioniers and wagoners: wherefore euery captain was commanded to haue his souldiours in re-dinesse to set forward vpon the signe giuen; which was by the sound of a shalme or hoboy, which when it should be giuen, was referred to the discretion of the Generall. There were many which wonderfully diliked of this resolution, and said openly, that the enemye was fewer in number than their horsemen, and pinched almost with like want of viactuall: besides that, that the Turks durst neuer in iust fight encounter with the Christian men at armes, but like theecues assaile them vpon a sudden at some aduantage, and by and by be gone againe: and that the towne of GARA where the enemye lay encamped, was not so strong but that it might be woon: wherefore all things

The fearefull resolution of the Christians to get from the Turkes

A things were to be proued, and some great matter to be attempted of valiant men, pinched with wants: for that to run away, would be not onely a dishonour vnto the capitaines themselves, who ought alwaies to preferre their honour before their liues; but also dangerous to them, which respected nothing but life. And if they should set forward in the night, many would be lost in the woods; and valour in the darke could not be knowne from cowardise: besides that, the Turkes (as they said) lay so nigh, that it was not possible to depart without their knowledge, especially if they should burne the powder, or breake the great ordinance. For which causes, they thought it better to fight a battell with them, and not to beleue the false reports of new supplies come vnto them; and that God would vndoubtedly giue them aid, which were readie to lay downe their liues for their religion and glorie of the Christian name. After all this, they began to consult what was now to be done with the sicke and wounded souldiours, which were before carried in wagons or amongst the other baggage of the armie: for it was like, that so great a multitude of sicke and wounded men, vnderstanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the armie, would as miserable forsaken men, fill the campe with lamentation and mourning; which it was thought would be also increased by the weeping and wailing of them, which should neuer afterwards see their brethren, kinsmen, fellowes or friends, so miserably and shamefully left behind and forsaken: the noise whereof, must needs come to the eares of the Turkes, which lay within a small gun shot. Wherefore it was determined, that these sicke and wounded souldiours should be carried vpon the wagon and cart-horses; and that such as were not able to stay themselves, should be holden vp by other of more strength riding behind them vpon the buttocks of the horse. In suite to colour the matter, they which were so desirous to go, said that this their manner of departure grounded vpon good reason, was not to be accounted a shamefull flight (as some would teame it) but a right honest and necessarie manner of retiring: for as much as they were stronger than their enemies in horsemen, and equall also (if not stronger) in footmen, although they were sore weakned with sicknesse. Whilest these things were in counsell directly discoursed, and the resolution set downe as is before said, the matter was brought to this passe, that euery capitaine with troubled iudgement conceiued in himselfe seuerall cogitations, far from the common good, and without regard of shame and dishonour, bethought himselfe how he might betake himselfe to flight, the vncertaine hope of desired life. On the contrarie part, Mahometes vsing most certaine spies; and aduertised euery houre of all the distresses of the Christians, and thereby prelagging his future victorie; did by most diligent watch and troupes of horsemen, besetting the passages farre and neere, most vigilantly attend euery motion in the Christian campe: of purpose, that when the armie should rise and set forward, he after his wonted manner might in the straits (fit for his purpose) set vpon them being deuided and dispersed one from another; as they must needs in those troublesome passages: for he had so placed his horsemen and footmen in the knowne tracts of those woods, that he had shut vp the Christians as it were in a toyle. It was now almost midnight, and the armie taking no rest, so carefully expected the signe of setting forward; that euery little delay seemed to most men both tedious and dangerous: so that many great capitaines vpon a cowardly conceit would stay no longer, but hasted to depart, and to go before the rest, without any leaue of the Generall. The beginning of this mischieuous departure is reported to haue been begun by the common Hungarian horsemen, which knowing the passages and waies thorow the woods, made most hast to WALPO. Ladislaus Morcus dishonourably following their example, went the other way to his castle ZENTHERZEBETH. After them followed in great hast the Stirian horsemen, without regard of shame, led by John Hanganot their Generall, who was appointed to haue guarded the rearward.
Symon bishop of Zagreb fled in like manner, knowne by his great lantern wandring in the wood, yet with lesse shame than the rest, because he being a clergie man, thought it not to be long to his vocacion to put on armes, or to go into battell. In the meane time it was fearefully told to Abraham that the Hungarian horsemen were fled, and that Ladislaus and Hanganot, with the Stirian troupes were gone also; and that all the rest of the armie not expecting the appointed signall, vnder like manner vpon flying: With which report the cowardly and dismaied Generall was so terrified, that he presently got to horse, quite forgetting the signall. He should haue giuen (for that he thought all the rest, as he afterwards said, to haue been gone before) and as he was, unarmed betooke himselfe to flight, leauing behind him for hast his tent stored with plate and other rich furniture. In this tumult of them which so disorderly fled, Ladislaus that famous capitaine was called vp, and told by his seruants, that the Generall was fled, and gone to whom he answered againe, without doubt it cannot be so, that I should be so shamefully and perfidiously betrayed of him: and so as a man megged with long watching, and painfull labour, laid himselfe downe againe to sleepe. Not long after, Mahometes hearing the noise that was in the campe, rise with his Turkes to assaile his enemies: yet to be better assured what the enemy did, he thought it good to stay for day light, causing his men to stand still in order of battell, and with wonderfull silence to expect the signe of setting forward, which was giuen by the lost sound of a horsemans drum passing thorow euerie companie. For the old capitaine acquainted with many battels against the Christians, doubting of their fained flight, would not vnauidently be drawne into battell, but in a place commodious for his souldiours, as one before fully set downe (after his wonted manner) to performe that seruice, nor by the hazard of one set battell, but by dallying off the time with often skirmishes, when he could take the enemy at aduantage. The day appearing, Lodronius againe awaking, heard a certaine confused noise of the Turkes, and withall, saw himselfe forsaken of the greatest part of the horsemen: whereupon he complained in vaine, that he was betrayed: yet for all that he was nothing discouraged, but cheered vp the footmen, exhorting them to remember their former valour, and to resolve with themselves only with courage to overcome the danger, which hard fortune had at that time brought them in to; for that valiant men were rather to thinke of an honourable death than shamefull flight, whereby whether they should escape with life or not, was vncertaine: As for himselfe, who had been their happie Generall in many battels, he said he was resolutely set downe by repelling the enemy to bring them into place of safetie; or else valiantly fighting together with them to end his daies. As Lodronius was yet thus encouraging the footmen, the horsemen of CARINTIA, SAXONIE, AUSTRIA and BOHEMIA, who mindfull of their duetie, had in vaine expected the appointed signall from the Generall, came to Lodronius as vnto the most valiant capitaine, beseeching him, in steed of their treacherous Generall, to take vpon him the place: promising to doe whatsoever he commaunded, and to fight as men against those infidels for their religion and king, so long as they were able to hold vp their weapons. Lodronius would in no case accept of that honour so frankly offered, modestly protesting himselfe vnworthie thereof: Yet as a man of courage, and moued with the hard estate of such an armie, he with a solemne protestation promised to execute the place in the best manner he could, and so did as long as his fortune gaue him leaue.

It is reported, that as Lodronius was encouraging the footmen, and earnestly inuaying against shamefull flight, an old German souldiour was so bold, as: bluntly, yet sharply to say vnto him: Worthy Lodronius, thou canst neuer be thought to flie shamefully, with a horse of such a price vnder thee. Lodronius perceiving the old souldiours meaning; alighted; and with this word flouted his horse: saying aloud, This day valiant souldiours, shall you haue me both your Generall and fellow souldiour, fighting on foot as one of your felues: see now that your deceit be not my expectation, but let vs either with glorious victorie or honourable death end this warre together; yet so, as that we die vntreuged. All his other horses he gaue away vnto such sickes and wounded souldiours as he best knew, amongst whom was one Piccard of Cremona a capitaine who was then in an extreame fit of an ague, and had hardly escaped the hands of the enemy. The first troups of horsemen and bands of footmen, were scarcely out of the campe with their colours, but the Turkes comming on with a hideous cry, assailed them on euery side; and many sharpe skirmishes were giuen vnto the horsemen as they marched, with such leuante, that the Christians sometime valiantly receiuing the enemies charge; and sometime charging them, as they repelled the proud enemy still busie with them. In these continuall skirmishes, Antoni Brach Count, Generall of the Cattinian horsemen, fighting valiantly was slaine, being for his braver amongst the Turkes to haue beene the Generall of the field. And by like misfortune were twentie horsemen of great name were slaine also; and their guidons taken. Amongst these were three noblemen, Andreas Refschius, Christophorus Hernani, and Georgius Himmelberg. In another place was made a most cruell skirmish with the Saxons horsemen and them of Misnig Thuringia and Franconia, who followed the Saxons enignes of the day, fighting most valiantly, was slaine about 36 worthy capitaines, lieutenants, or ancients; and Chuenrich a principall capitaine of the Saxons taken, who afterwards died in bonds amongst the Turkes. Amongst them which were slaine; Sebastianus Metheus and Iacobus Schlemmigh were of great nobility.

A lieue. In like manner the horsemen of AVSTRIA courageously resisting the enemy for a space, were in the end overthrowne: where amongst them was slaine two valiant noblemen, Fettiaus and Hofschirchius, with diuers other men of great place and reputation both in their own country and abroad. But the greatest slaughter was made amongst the Bohemian horsemen, vpon whom (being disordered by the Ianizaries harquebusiers) the Turkish troupes of the old garrison souldiours breaking in with their scimitars and heauie yron maces, made a most bloudie execution. The battell of footmen being fore gauled, and almost disordered in their march by certaine companies of Ianizaries and archers of the Asapi, who from a woodie banke of a marish discharged their shot and arrowes continually vpon them, yet neuer comming to handie blows, was on the other side so hardly charged by Amurathes with his troupes of horsemen of Bosna, that being nor able longer to keepe order, it was at last by him broken and cut in peeces: where the Turks with their swords and hatchets slew the poore Christians without mercie. Ledronius himselfe carried away with the breaking in and force of the horsemen, was driuen into a marish: where after that he being fore wounded, and almost fast in the deepe mud, had done the vttermost of that his last endeour; he by the faire enticacie of the Turks perswading him rather to yeeld, than there to be slaine, so yeelded himselfe, that he with three companies which were with him, after they had laid downe their weapons, were all saued as valiant souldiours: for now the mercilesse Turkes embred with the Christian blood, were wearie of slaughter, and began greedily to seeke after the spoile, hunting after them, who flying disperſedly, thought themselves to haue escaped the enemies hands; with such successe, that a great number of them was taken and led away for slaues; few of the footmen escaped, and almost all the rest which were not fled before the battell, were to be seene dead vpon the ground.

This shameful overthrow at EXAK was reported to haue exceeded the most grieuous overthrowes that the Christians had receiued in any former time: for the flower both of horse and foot there lost by the rashnesse and fault of an vnluckie Generall, rather than by the valor of the enemy, ruthfully perished; so that many provinces were filled with heauinesse, and mourning. For it neuer chanced before, as was to be seene by the vnfortunat battels of Sigismund the emperor, and king Ladislaus, that the Turks got such a victorie without some losse: so that they which fell almost vireuenged at EXAK, may seeme to haue augmented that losse by the great infamie thereof. Mahometes hauing thus almost without the bloud of his souldiors obtained so great a victorie, and taken the spoile of the Christian campe, pitched his tents in a little meddow, beinge cleaned of the dead bodies, and after he had merrily feasted with his captaines, commanded the cheefe prisoners, the goodly spoiles, and fairest ensignes to be brought vnto him: and openly commending the captaines who had that day done any good seruice, commanding diuers bags of money to be brought vnto him by the receiuers, he with his owne hand rewarded the souldiors, some with gold, some with siluer, according to their deserts: And causing all the prisoners which were not common souldiors to be brought forth, he diligently viewed them, and presently caused euery one of their names, and the office they bare, to be enrolled by his clerkes: and vnto such as brought in the heads, eares, or hands of the Christians with rings vpon them, he forthwith caused one reward or other to be giuen. Ladronius, when as by reason of his deadly wounds he was thought vnable to endure trauell, or to be brought aliue with the other prisoners to CONSTANTINOPLE, was slaine by his keepers, and his head afterwards sent thither. For as many noble gentlemen, and amongst others Laurentius Streiberg, and Dietmarus Losenstaine haue reported (who raunfomed afterwards, returned home againe to their wiues and children) amongst the prisoners which were together with the faire ensignes and other gallant warlike furniture (especially gilt armour and headpeeces) presented by Mahometes, his messengers to Solyman, three of the greatest captaines heads were in a siluer bason there seene, and knowne, which were the heads of Paulus Bachitius, the valiant Hungarian captaine, Antius Macer Generall, of the Carinthian horsemen, and Ladronius Generall of the footmen: which after the tyrant had looked aquint vpon, as abhorring that loathsome sight, hee with stern countenance commanded all the prisoners to be slaine. But vpon the intercession of the Iapizaries, who intreated for them, as valiant men, to whom they had at the time of their taking giuen their faith, and might afterwards doe him good seruice, he chaunged his countenance, and saued many of them. But Calixtiner flying to his owne castle, was of all men accused, as a wicked forsaker of his owne campe and ensignes, and commonly railed vpon, as the eternall infamie of his countrety, and author of the publike calamitie: so that it was reported, that he durst neither go abroad nor shew his face for shame. He was so generally hated, that infamous libels, made against him and the other captaines which had shamefully fled as he did, were commonly sung in the streets by boyes in all the cities of GERMANIE. Wherewith he was so much grieved, that he requested of king Ferdinand, that he might safely come to the court, to answer whatsoeuer could be laid against him: which his request the king easily graunted, and when he came to the court received him with doubtfull countenance. But when the hearing of his cause was by the king somewhat longer protracted than he would haue had it, and he in the meane time kept vnder safe custodie; impatient of such delay, and halfe doubtfull whether he should be quitted or condemned, thought it better to flie than to abide the trial. So feigning himselfe sicke, and scraping vp by litle and litle with his knife a bricke pauement vnder his bed, and so in the night getting H out first one bricke, and after that another, at length brake thorow the vault, and with his theets letting himselfe downe, escaped, hauing post horses readie for him without the castle. Not long after, as he was a man of a hasty and vnconstant nature, despairing of his estate, he fled to the Turkes, Mahometes gladly receiuing him, and beside his great entertainment, promising him the gouernment of all CROATIA, in manner of a tributarie king, if he would faithfully serue Solyman, and helpe him in the subduing of the cities of AVSTRIA. After he had agreed vpon all the conditions of his reuolt, that he might returne to Mahometes with some more credit, he began boldly to deale with Nicholaus Sirenius, a noble man of CROATIA, and his deere friend as he supposed, to reuolt with him; assuring him, that Solyman would deale as kindly with them both; as he had before with king Iohn in the kingdom of HUNGARIE. Sirenius promised him he would, or at least made as if he promised to do what he desired, and so agreed as it were vpon the matter, promising to goe ouer with him to the Turke with a troupe of his best and most trustie horsemen. But Sirenius considering with himselfe the heinousnesse and impietie of so great an offence, changing his purpose, chose rather to deale treacherously with his old friend, fearing no such thing in his house, than to offend both against God and his prince. Wherefore after he had well feasted Cazzianer at his house, he as a most cruell host, caused him to be slaine, and sent his head to king Ferdinand: in reward whereof he receiued of the kings gift Cazzianer his castle, with all his substance.

In the meane time the Venetians, prouoked by the Turkes with diuers injuries both by sea and land (when as Solyman but a litle before hardly besieging CORCYRA, and with most barbarous K ciuelitie wasting the island, had broken the league, and euen then by his lieutenant Cassimes Bassa besieged EPIDAVROS and NAVLIVM, two of their cities in PELOPONNESVS) resolved without delay to make warres likewise vpon him, who for a small trespass would admit no excuse or recompence. Whereunto they were also animated both by Charles the emperor, and Paulus the great Bishop: who warned by the late and dangerous attempts of Solyman and Barbarussa, thought it more for the safetie of their estates, by giuing aid to the Venetians to keepe the Turkes busied farther off, than to suffer them to acquaint themselves too much with the ports of ITALLIE or SICILIA. Wherefore all the Winter following they laboured by their embassadours to set downe what number and what manner of ships, what souldiours, what money, was to be provided, and how to be according to their estates apportioned for the setting forth of a strong L fleet, against the next Summer to be sent into GRACIA against the Turkes. At last it was agreed amongst these confederat princes by their embassadours at ROME, that the emperor should furnish and set forth fourescore and two galleies, the Venetians the like number, and the bishop six and thirtie, to make vp the number of two hundred galleies; that the Venetians should lend into the bishop so many galleies readie rigged as he should desire to be furnished by him with martiners and souldiours; and that the emperor and the state of GENOVA should find sufficient shipping for the transportation of the land forces and victuall. The Generals also of this great fleet to be set forth, were at the same time appointed. Andreas Auria for the emperor, Vincencius Capellus for the Venetians, and Marcus Grimmanus patriarche of ACQUILA, for the Bishop; to whom was joyned Paulus Iustinianus, one of the cheefe Senators, a man of great experience in sea matters. It was also agreed, that Ferdinand Gonzaga viceroie of SICILIE should haue the commanding of the land forces, and that whatsoeuer was got from the Turkes in that expedition in GRACIA, the Islands, or DALMATIA, should be all faithfully deliuered to the Venetians, who had receiued so many injuries from the Turkes. The emperor also of his libera-

The emperor, the Venetians, and the Bishop of Rome enter into a confederation against the Turkes.

A litle promised vnto the other confederats, that they should for reasonable price haue as much wheat as they would out of SICILIA, without paying any custome.

Solyman vnderstanding of this confederation and preparation made against him by these Christian princes, commaunded Barbarussa his Admirall to make readie his fleet to goe against these enemies, and to doe all the harme he could vpon the Islands subject to the Venetian state. Which thing Barbarussa with great care and diligence in short time performed: and so with a hundred and thirtie galleies in most warlike manner appointed, with the first of the Spring in the year 1538 departed from HELLESPONTVS directly to CRETE, where hauing passed the promontorie of GYAMVS, which at this day is called SPARTA, he vnadvisedly landed most part of his men, to haue surprised the citie CANEA, which was in auncient time called SYDONIA: For Gritius one of the Venetian Senators then kept the citie with a strong garrison, who from the wals and bulwarkes thereof so plagued the Turkes with great and small shot, and the falling out of two companies of Italians, that Barbarussa hauing lost many of his men, was faine to retire againe to his fleet in such hast, that he left behind him a thousand of his Turkes, which were gone further into the Island after bootie, who were afterwards all slayn by them of CRETE. After that, he attempted to haue taken diuers places in the Island, and was euery where notably repulld. With the citie of CANEA, whereof the Island now taketh name, and was in auncient time called CYTHEVM, he durst not meddle: but sayling almost round about the Island, tooke onely CACILIA, a litle towne before forsaken of the inhabitants, which he set on fire, and so departed from CRETE: for he was aduertised, that Vincencius Capellus the Venetian admirall, who was now come to CORCYRA, would in short time come to releue them of CRETE. Auria Admirall of the emperours fleet, passing the strait of MESSANA, came to CORCYRA also, and there joyined with the Venetians. The Christian fleet was then so great, that it was thought the Turkes durst not meet it at sea, but by all means shun to giue battell. For Barbarussa then lay with the Turkes fleet in the bay of AMBRACIA, expecting when the Christians should enter the straight entrance thereof, where he had on both sides placed diuers peeces of great ordinance, to haue sunke them in their coming in: for Grimmanus the Patriarch a litle before departing from CORCYRA, had with the great Bishops galleies begun to besiege PREVESSA, a towne vpon the promontorie of ITACIUM fast by that strait; and landing some of his souldiours, with three great peeces of artillerie, so battered the castle of PREVESSA, that he was like ynough D to haue taken it; had not the Turkes from ETROIA come to releue it with a strong power both of horse and foot. Wherefore the Patriarch shipping againe his men and ordinance, returned to the fleet at CORCYRA not repeating him of his journey, for that he had well viewed the straits of that bay, and all the enemies fleet riding at anchor within it. Vpon the returne of the Patriarch, and relation made what he had both done and seene, the great commanders of the Christian fleet entred into counsell, what course were best to take for their better proceeding in that great act on. Gonzaga the viceroy, General of the land forces, was of opinion, That it was best to land the souldiours and great ordinance, and with all their force to assault the castle of PREVESSA: which once taken, and their ordinance there placed, the enemies fleet might in the bay be utterly defeated, for that all passage to sea might easily be taken from them, by sinking of one of their great ships in the mouth of the strait, and by mooring there of three great galleons full of artillerie: so that if Barbarussa would desperately adventure to come out, he must needs bee sunke in the mouth of the bay. Whereunto Auria replied, That Gonzaga his counsell was in words and they glorious, but to be put in execution most dangerous: for that first to land the souldiours and great artillerie, hee said was a thing too full of hazard and perill: for it was to bee thought, that the Turkes in ETROIA would as they had before done, come with speed with their horsemen to releue the beleagued castle, whose force the Christian footmen could hardly abide: Besides that, if the fleet should by force of weather be constrained to forsake that coast, as it well might, Auria now commaunded fast on, after the souldiours were landed; from whence should they then get any victuall in the enemies countrey, or what releefe should they hope for; if they should hap to be distressed, being on euery side beset with their enemies; and their friends by E tempest driven from them. Wherefore he thought it best, if the enemies could not be drawn out of the bay to battell, to goe directly into the bay of NAVLIVM, to take that towne which was not greatly fortified, and so to ransacke and spoile all the townes euen to the bottoome of the bay of CORINTHVS which the Gracians in the fleet said might easily be done. By taking of which court counsell it might so fall out, that Barbarus moved with the danger of his friends, would for shame come out and joyne with them in battell. This counsell of Auria was best liked both of Capellius and the Patriarch, being farre more desirous to fight with their enemies at sea, than at land.

Auria hauing put in order his fleet, came to PREVESA, and so to the strait of the bay of AMBRACIA, where he so placed the whole fleet, which was in number two hundred and fiftie saile, that it might easely of the enemye be numbred. Which sight (as it was reported) wonderfully troubled Barbarus, who although he was of a courageous disposition, and such a man as greatly feared not either the valor or martiall discipline of the Christians, yet was he exceedingly moued with the sight of so great a fleet, so well appointed; for a greater had not of long time been scene in the Ionian sea. So that an eunuch of Solymans court, sent by him as Barbarus his companion, seeing him to delay the time, as a man halfe discouraged, did with most vnckeile and proud words take him vp, because he would not forthwith goe out of the bay and fight with the Christians which lay at the mouth thereof daring of them; wherein he was not (as he said) to regard his owne safetie, who as a coward could not endure the sight of the enemye, but the honour of Solyman his soueraigne, who would not take it well, to haue the glorie of his name stained with so shamefull a delay: for if he were a valiant and martiall man, as he professed himselfe to be, he ought neuer to despaire of victorie: And if it should so fall out, that fortune should frowne vpon them, and not answere to their desires, yet should not Solyman therefore want captaines and souldiours better than they, if they were ouercome, & the woods of PONTVS would afford him timber ynough to build twice so great and strong a fleet. And for a conclusion, the insolent Eunuch willed Barbarus to beware, that whilst he feared a most honourable death, (which was vncertaine, though the battell were lost) he drew not vpon himselfe the certaine danger of a most shamefull death by the displeasure of Solyman.

At which speech Barbarus turning himselfe about to Salce, one of the arch pyrats, a famous sea man, said vnto him: VVee must for ought that I can see, most valiant and faithfull captaine, aduenture this battell, although it be at too much disadvantage, least happily we perish by the complaints of this barking demie man. And so presently commaunded all his fleet to weigh anchor, at the same time that Auria had hoysed saile and was on his way toward the bay of NAV-PACTVS, thinking that the enemye durst not for feare haue come out of the bay of AMBRACIA. Auria keeping on his course, was come to LEVCADE, when the enemies fleet was descied out of the top of Bondelmerius great Galleon to be come out of the bay, and to make towards them, keeping close by the shore: which manner of course the craftie Turke misdoubting his owne strength, held of purpose, that if he should chance to be ouermatched by the Christians, hee might turne the prow of his galleys vpon them, and running the poupes aground, so to land his men and great ordinance, and from land as he might to defend his fleet: accounting it a lesse losse (if the worst should chance) to lose the galleys than the men.

Turke fleet.*

Auria somewhat troubled with this sudden comming out of the enemye, as with a thing which he then least expected, yet notably staied himselfe, and commaunded all the fleet to prepare themselves to battell, and to follow his Admirall galley. Now all the Turkes fleet was come into the open sea in such order, that Barbarus himselfe was in the middle battell, where his Admirall galley was to be scene with many purple flags and streamers flying gallantly in the wind: on his right hand was Tabaches, and Salce on the left, both men of great fame, euery one of them hauing almost like number of galleys, which were in all a hundred and fiftie: Vnto the middle battell were joyned the two wings, in such order, that which way soeuer the Admirall turned, they turning also, still represented the forme of a flying Eagle: so that (as Auria himselfe afterwards confessed) a more firme or orderly fleet could not haue been brought out by any expert captaine. Before the fleet, came about twentie nimble galleys, conducted by Drogut (or Dragut) an arch pyrat, famous afterwards for the great harme he did vnto the Christians. Capellius the Venetian Admirall came in his long boat to Auria, requesting him, That he with his galleys might giue the first charge vpon the enemye: to whom Auria gaue great thanks, and praising his forwardnesse, requested him to follow him, to whom he would in good time giue a sign what he would haue done. The foremost of the Turkes light galleys was now come to the great Galleon of Bondelmerius, which was the foremost of the Christian fleet, whereunto were sent also certaine galleys from Salce, to helpe to assaile that tall ship; which shooting a farre off, did no harme, neither

Bondelmerius them: who would not suffer one peece to be discharged, for he being an expert sea man, and loth to shoot in vaine, expected that they should come neerer vnto him, and then vpon the sudden to discharge all his great Ordinance vpon them. Neither was he deceiued in that his expectation, for the Turkes comming neere vnto him, were so ouerwhelmed with the great and small shot out of the Galleon, that they were glad to stay their course, and to retire. In the meane time Auria called backe againe the ships which were gone before, and caused his Galleon to be towed out; and by boats of purpose sent out, charged the captaines of the galleys to make themselves readie to fight, vpon signall giuen by the sound of the trumpet and the displaying of the Admirals ensigne: yet was not Auria of mind to fight with his galleys, without his ships: which thing the craftie enemye well perceiued; and fought by all means to joyne battell with the galleys before the comming in of the tall ships, which were as castles in respect of the galleys: for it was then such a calme, that the ships were not able to keepe way with the galleys, and the smooth water seemed to offer a fit oportunitie for battell; which so well pleased the Patriarch, that many heard him crying aloud to Auria, to giue the signall, and manuellled much why he deferred to giue battell. For he fetching a great compasse, and hovering about his ships, with his galleys kept such a course, that many thought he would vpon the sudden haue done some strange and vnexpected exploit vpon the enemye: but Auria held that strange course, of purpose to haue drawne the enemies galleys within the danger of his great ships, who thundring amongst them with their great ordinance, might haue easely sore beaten and disordered them; and opened a way vnto his galleys to haue gotten a most certaine victorie. But the craftie old Turke doubting by the strangenesse of Auria his course, to be circumvented with some finenesse, stayed his course, and lay still with his owne Squadron of galleys, warily expecting to what purpose that strange course of the enemye tended. In the meane time, both the wings of his fleet had a little before the going downe of the Sunne begun in diuers places to encounter with the Christians: Some were in vaine still assailing Bondelmerius his great Galleon; others with their great ordinance had sore beaten two tall ships, whereof Buccanigra and Mongia, two Spanish captaines, were imbarcked with their companies, that they were giuen for lost, many of the souldiours and mariners being slaine: Two other ships loded with victuals, the one of VENICE, the other of DALMATIA, were burnt by the Turkes, and some few of the men saued by their ship boats, and by swimming to the ships neere vnto them. In the shutting in of the euening, Salce tooke two galleys stragling behind the rest of the fleet, whereof Mozenius a Venetian, and Bebiena a Florentine, were captaines. After these galleys, was taken also the ship of Aloysius Figaroa a Spaniard, although his souldiours had for a time fought most valiantly. In this ship with Figaroa the father, was taken his sonne, a yong gentleman, and beautified with all the good gifts of nature, who afterwards presented to Solyman, turned Turke: and growing in credit in Solymans chamber, after three yeares miserable imprisonment, obtained his poore fathers libertie, and sent him well rewarded home againe into SPAIN. Whilist both the fleets were thus expecting how they might to their most aduantage joyne battell; suddenly arose a great tempest of thunder, lightening, and raine, with a fresh gale of Easterly wind: whereupon the Christians seeing the Turkes hoysing vp their small sailes, without delay hoysed vp both small and great to cleare themselves of the enemye, and with that faire wind returned againe to CORCYRA; so disorderedly and in such hast, sparing neither saile nor oare, that it seemed rather a shamefull flight than an orderly retreat. So that Auria, a man of so great fame at sea, as that he was called a second Nephtine, was that day accounted no captaine. It is reported, that Barbarus with the same wind pursued the Christians a while, and being not able longer to see what course they held, by reason of the darkenesse of the night, to haue stayed his course for the Admirals had caused their lights, which they vsed to carrie in the poupes of their galleys, to be then put out. VVhereat Barbarus heauily laughing, said oftentimes in the Spanish tongue: Auria hath therefore put out his light, the better in the darke to hide his flight: noting in him such a feare, as that hee without regard of honour sought onely how by flight to escape. When they were come to CORCYRA, they were all generally of opinion, That by the benefite of that sudden storme they had auoided a great danger. The emperials, especially the Genowayes, to excuse Auria, imputed the cause of so shamefull a flight vnto the Venetians, who would not from the beginning receiue any Spanish souldiours into their galleys, the better to haue withstood the enemye; and that Auria therefore doubting of the Venetians, refrained from joyning battell; and the rather, because that vpon the comming forth of the Turkes fleet, they had hoysed vp their sailes tied vp to the yardes with small lines, which they might at their pleasure casily cut, and set saile to flie which way they would. Shortly after came Barbarussa with all his fleet to the island of Paxvs, about foure leagues from CORCYRA Eastward, brauing the Christians as if he would haue fought with them, if they durst come out. Whereat Gonzaga the Viceroy fretting, went to euerie one of the three great commanders, requesting them for the honour of the Christians, to repress that proud Turks insolencie. At last the matter was brought to that passe, that the Venetians hauing taken in certaine companies of Spaniards, the fleet should be deuided into foure squadrons, and so to giue battell: But this consultation was so long protracted, that Barbarussa fearing the tempestuous Autumn weather, hoysed saile, and about the seuenth of October returned againe into the bay of AMBRACIA. After the departing of Barba-russa, the Generals of the Christian fleet directed their course into the bay called SINVS RIZO-NICVS, to besiege CASTRONOVUM or new Castle, a strong towne of the Turks standing in that bay, and bordering vpon the Venetian seigniorie: the inhabitants were part Dalmatians, part Epirots, which had renounced the Christian religion, and some Turks, liuing most part by merchandise: Vnto this towne the Christians laid siege, and in short time woon it, where they had a great prey, and a wonderfull number of captiues of all sorts. Three daies after the taking of the towne, the castle was also yeilded by the Turks garrison, couenanting in vaine to depart with life and libertie.

This towne taken by common force, ought of right by the couenants of the league to haue been deliuered to the Venetians; yet was it for all that by Auria and Gonzaga referred for the emperour, and Franciscus Sarmenus with foure thousand Spaniards all old souldiours, left there in garrison: Capellius the Venetian Admirall vrging in vaine the right of the Venetians. Which thing so much grieued the Senat, who euer had the ambitious Spaniard in suspect, and now affured of him as an euill neighbour to their towne of GATARY, that repenting themselves of the league with the emperour, they decreed to sue to Solyman for peace: which they afterwards easily obtained, for a short space, by Laurentius Gritus their dukes sonne, and by the helpe of An-tonius Rincus the French kings embassadour; who then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, in good time told the great Bassaes, that the league the Venetians had made with the emperour, was made without the consent of the greatest part of the Senat, and that warre taken in hand against most of their wils.

W hilest these things were in doing, Barbarussa put to sea againe to haue relieved CASTRON-OVUM; but being at sea, many of his gallies were by the violence of a sudden tempest driuen vpon the ACROCERAVIAN rocks, and there cast away. It is reported, that he lost there twen-tie thousand men, which with the broken pieces of his gallies were found almost all alongst the coast of DALMATIA. This shipwracke being certainly known, Capellius would haue persuaded Auria to haue presently pursued Barbarussa so distressed: which motion Gonzaga well liked, as a man desirous by some notable exploit to recompence the disgrace before receiued at LEVCADIA.
But Auria for diuers causes not liking of the matter, was so set downe vpon his returne to IT-ALIE, that he presently hoysed saile: leauing the Venetian Admirall in such a rage, that he detested himselfe for submitting himselfe to another mans power; and wished the captaines there present, neuer to subject themselves to the commaund of a stranger, for as much as that Geno-way, either vpon cowardise or malicious mind, as an old enemy to the Venetian state, would not prosecute to manifest a victorie, but put vp so shamefull a disgrace as he had before receiued. But of all this Auria made small reckoning, referring all that he both said and did, so far vnto the em-perors commoditie, that Valerius Vrsinus a noble gentleman, then seruing in the Venetian pay, merely said, That Auria had done nothing but wisely and politickly, in setting the Venetians together by the eares with the Turks, & opening a gate for a long war, whether the Venetians would or not, so as the emperour himselfe could not haue better wished, and that without the losse of one gallie. For it was thought by many, that the long wars betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, would sort to the great good of the emperour; when as the Venetians worne out and spent with those long and chargeable warres against so mightie an enemy, should be stripped of their lands and territories, either by force, or some hard composition wrung from them by necessity.

CASTRONOVUM thus taken, and Sarmenus with a garrison of foure thousand Spaniards there placed as is afore said, and the Christian fleet dissolued, Solyman tooke the matter so grieuously, that hee determined to besiege it againe both by sea and land; and in his furie, caused

A NAVPLIUM and EPIDAVRVS, two of the Venetian cities in the country of PELOPONNESVS, to be straightly besieged. Yet tooke he singuler pleasure, that Barbarussa his Admirall, in all respects worse furnished, had driuen out of the Sea the great fleet of the Christians, which he before that time had made too great account of. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, which was in the yeere 1539, Barbarussa by his commaundement repaired againe his fleet, and notably furnished it with all manner of warlike prouision; manning his gallies for the most part with Tanizaries and other such select souldiours. With this fleet Barbarussa (Sommet now well come on) departed out of the HELESPONTVS, and came to the bay RIZONICVS; at which time also Vlames the Persian, then Gouernour of BOSNIA, shewed himselfe with his forces vpon the mountaines as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbarussa before he entred the straits of the bay; B sent before him Dragut and Corsetus, two notable pirats, with thirtie galliots, who landing their men neere vnto CASTRONOVUM (as they were commaunded) were valiantly encountered by Sarmenus with his Spaniards, and forced againe to their galliots, many of the Turks being slaine and taken prisoners. After that came Barbarussa, with ninetie gallies, and three tall ships which carried the artilerie for batterie and other necessarie prouision for the campe; where he spent three daies in landing his great ordinance and casting vp trenches, which could not be done but by night, by reason of the continuall shot out of the towne: wherewith the Spaniards had in that three daies space slaine about a thousand Turkes; amongst whom was Agus Hariadenus, who had made himselfe as it were a king at TATORMA, a citie neere TRIPOLIS in AFRICA; whose death much grieued Barbarussa, as one of his most antient and best friends. At length Barba-russa hauing cast vp his trenches, landed foure and fiftie great pieces of artilerie for batterie; wher-C of he gaue a fourth part to Vlames to batter the towne on the North side, whilest he in the mean time, in three diuers places battered the East side; and Salec from Sea with ten gallies, did morn-ning and euening batter another part of the wall. W hilest Sarmenus was thus in so many places assailed, and did what was possible to haue repaired the breaches; the Turks by force tooke one of the towers, where after they had displayed their ensignes; they from thence with their shot fore troubled the Spaniards. At the same time also, Vlames had made a breach, and was readie on the other side of the citie to enter. In which extremities, Sarmenus seeing no meanes longer to defend the citie, commanded the hurt souldiours to get them into the castle below, and the rest with him to take the market place, there to die together like men: where the Turks straightway D breaking in on euerie side vpon them, made a most bloudie and cruell fight, wherein the Spaniards ouerwhelmed with shot, and the multitude of their enemies, were slaine almost euerie man.
Sarmenus wounded in the face with three arrowes, and weatied with long fight, seeing Sancius Fria a captaine readie to flie, sharply reproofed him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarry by it, vntill they were there both together slaine. Many valiant captaines were there lost, whose names for breuitie I omit. Aloysius Arius, and certaine other captaines, who together with the wounded souldiours were got into the castle, seeing no meanes to defend the place, yeilded themselves: whom Barbarussa according to his promise, took to mercie in sparing their liues, yet carried them away into captiuitie to CONSTANTINOPLE. The dead bodie of Sarmenus could not be knowne amongst so many heapes of the dead, although Barbarussa had E caused most diligent search to be made for it, and offered great sums of money and libertie also, to who fouer could discouer it; being desirous to haue sent his head for a present to Solyman.
Barbarussa proud of this victorie, began forthwith to gape after CATTARYS a citie of the Venetians in the bottome of the same bay: and thereupon writ threatening letters to Ioannes Bembus one of the Venetian Senators then Gouernour of the citie, presently to deliuer the citie; which he would (as he said) otherwise assault by force. W hereunto Bembus answered againe by letters, That in so doing, he should violate the league lately made with Solyman; and that he should find him readie by force to repell his forces. W herewith Barbadussa displeased, sent certaine gal-lies into the bottome of the bay; who discharging certaine great pieces at the citie, made shew as if they had come to besiege it. At whom Bembus as a man of good courage, caused as many F mo like pieces to be discharged; and shewed his men vpon the walls. W hich thing *Bar-

The long warres betwixt Charles the emperour and Francis the French king, were now well Vaſtus his Oration to the Venetian Senat.

pacified, and ſuch friendſhip (at leaſt wiſe in ſhow) now growne betwixt theſe two great princes, that moſt men thought that all other quarrels laid aſide, they would now at length with united forces go againſt the great and dangerous enemy of Chriſtendome: VVhich opinion nor altogether of the wiſer fort beleueed, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many extraordinary and rare courteſies then paſſing betwixt them, which concerne not this hiſtory: as alſo, in that two of their moſt famous captaines, Alphonſus Vaſtus, and Hanibald, were as it were with one conſent by them both ſent embaſſadors to VENICE, to haue drawing the Venetians into the confederation of that warre againſt the Turke. VVhich two renowned captaines coming to VENICE, moſt gallantly accompanied, were by Landus the duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence receiued, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in every place to behold them ſo noble captaines ſent from ſuch mightie princes; but eſpecially Vaſtus, whoſe ſame hauing many times before filled their eares, made them now the more deſirous to ſatiſſie their eyes alſo with the beholding of his tall and comely perſon. VVhich two famous captaines admitted into the Senat, for that purpoſe fully aſſembled, and audience giuen: Vaſtus aſſing from the dukes ſide, in theſe or like words, deliuered their embaſſage.

It is come to paſſe (as I ſuppoſe) by the great providence of Almighty God, and of all the diuine powers (moſt noble duke and honourable Senators) that two of the moſt mightie kings of EVROPE, who of late had of long time made mortall warres one upon another, touched with the Zeale of religion, are become great friends: Vndoubtedly to that purpoſe onely, that hauing made a firme peace; they may bring ſuch a generall quietneſſe to the long troubled and afflicted ſtate of Chriſtendome, as becometh their greatneſſe; and taking in hand a ſacred warre, to reuenge ſo many calamities received from the Infidels. That this might be made knowne vnto you (moſt noble Venetians) theſe mightie Monarchs haue ſent vs hether in good time to kinde in you the like Zeale, wherewith it is well knowne you haue alwayes for the honour of your State been enflamed: for you of all others, which are of ſuch power and valour at ſea, they wiſh for, as their fellows and confederates in this ſacred warre and hoped victorie, and thinke you worthe, which ſhould enioy the eſpeciall fruit of all that labour. For as much as the Chriſtian forces once renewed, and ſo great and ſtrong a fleet once aſſembled, every man ſeeeth that the Turkes muſt needs be too weake: although they brag, that they carried away the victory of ſlate at ACTIUM, when as they then eſcaped the victorious bands of our men, not by their own valour, but by the unexpected hap of a ſudden ſtorme. For all the powers of heauen and earth, and of the ſea alſo, will be propitious vnto vs, uniting ſo great forces, in the regard of our ſacred religion, and will ſo take away the hearts of the Infidels, that they ſhall learne to be overcome. As for our land forces, we are to hope nothing but well, for as much as vnto thoſe which the emperor of late brought into the field at VIENNA, and cauſed the Turkiſh emperor to ſtie, ſhall be toynd not onely all the horſemen and infanterie of FRANCE, a wonderfull ſtrength, but Sigismund alſo king of BOHEMIA will without delay bring forth his armies, wherewith he hath bene uſed in the quarrell of the Chriſtian religion happily to fight againſt the Infidels: ſo that it is not to be doubted of a moſt certain and aſſured victorie. Wherefore the victorious emperor and moſt Chriſtian king Francis moſt inſtantly requeſt you to enter into the like godly cogitations, conceived for the generall good of the Chriſtian name, and religiously to embrace the hope of a moſt true & glorious victorie: and further exhort you, by a wholeſome decree to auert your religious and courageous hearts from the friendſhip of the Infidels. For it may worthily ſeeme vnto your moſt honourable minds, a moſt foule and ſhamefull thing, to haue renewed your league, and to haue preferred an infamous and vncertaine peace before a moſt religious and iuſt warre: Neither doth it beſeeme this moſt wealthy State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any charges of war, be they neuer ſo great: for if we ſhall once overcome, which is incident to this preſent and long wiſhed for aſſaſſion, we ſhall by the proſperous victorie, either by ſea or land, to your incomparable praife receiue all the ſpoiles by your former times receiued.

The anſwer of the duke to Vaſtus.

VVhereunto the duke in the name of the whole State anſwered, That there neuer happened M any thing at any time vnto the Venetian Senat more honourable, for the manner of the embaſſage, or for the publique ſecuritie of their eſtate, more to be deſired than the hope of ſuch a peace: alter that two moſt mightie kings by two ſuch famous captaines their embaſſadors, did conſiſt them of their attonement and aſſured peace, moſt glorious to themſelves, to their eternall praife, whole.

A wholeſome alſo to the Venetian ſtate, beſet with ſo many dangers, and wonderfully to be wiſhed for of all the other princes of Chriſtendome, if they would ſincerely & religiously with their forces by common conſent vnited, reſolve vpon that ſacred war: for then would not the Venetians be wanting to themſelves or the Chriſtian commonweale, but end the league they had with the Turke, not with a diſhonourable peace but with armes and victorie. VVherefore it was to be requeſted of Almighty God by prayer, That thoſe puiſſant kings would with religious and happy euent ſpeedily and ſeriously fulfill all that hope of peace, which they had by their mutuall diſcourſes and embracings in ſhew promiſed vnto the world.

In few dayes after certaine of the ſelect Senatours ſitting in counſell, after the manner of that State, called the embaſſadors vnto them and asked them, VVhether they knew any thing of the articles and capitulations wherewith league and confederation was to be concluded: and by the way, whether they thought the emperor in regard of that peace would giue vnto the French kings ſonne the dukedome of MILLAN, as was reported: VVhereunto Hanebald the French embaſſador anſwering nothing, Vaſtus ſaid, That he knew nothing more, but that the two great princes had agreed thereof betwixt themſelves, and that the emperor had deſired the peace, as one willing to helpe the afflicted and declining ſtate of the Chriſtian commonweale: which thing any man might ſee could not be effected or brought to paſſe, but that the emperor muſt in many things yeeld to the requeſts of the French king, and redeeme his good will: For the noble mind (ſaid he) worthe Senatours, can eaſily make light of the greateſt loſſe of his owne things, when it foreſeeeth a large way opened thereby to eternall fame and glorie. Theſe words were very glorious and gracious to the hearers: but they, as men of great experience, could not let it ſinke in their minds, that the emperor whom they had often deeply ſounded, would euer depart with the dukedome of MILLAN, which only thing the French king required, and had for the recouering thereof vnfortunatly ſtrien almoſt twentie yeares, to the trouble and diſquiet of a great part of the world. The nobilitie and authoritie of this embaſſage more moued the Senat than did the other former embaſſadors, Didaco Mendoza, a Spaniard, and Guilhelmus Pellicerius, a Frenchman, then both preſent: yet was it much ſuſpected by the Venetians, becauſe it contained no certaine reſolution, but onely the bare hope of a future peace: ſo that it was by many men ſuppoſed to be but a matter deuſed to deceiue others and to ſerue the emperours turne to his greater profit. Yet all the cunning ſeemed to reſt in this point, That the Venetians led on with the hope of this league, ſhould neglect the renewing of the league they had the yeare before taken with Solyman, which was now almoſt expired. Vpon which vncertainetie of other mens reſolutions, the graue Senatours thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

Vpon this queſtion of this new league and confederation to be made with theſe Chriſtian princes againſt the Turke, the Senat was wonderfully deuided: ſome fauouring the emperours requeſt, inueighed againſt the renewing of that ſhamefull league with the infidels, which they ſaid was nothing els, but as much as in them lay to betray vnto them the other parts of Chriſtendome, and eſpecially ITALIE, deſtitute of their helpe, and yet not to be obtained without great charges; and with many reaſons vrged the honourable confederation with theſe Chriſtian princes: others of a deeper reach, conſidering what infinit harmes they had from time to time receiued by falling out with the Turks, and ſuſpecting alſo the emperours drift, and joyning thereunto the conſideration of the great dearth then raiging in the citie, which was not to be relieved but out of MACEDONIA and GRÆCIA, the Turkes countries; the emperor hauing at that time as it were of purpoſe impoſed ſo great a cuſtome vpon all corne to be tranſported out of SYRIA, that the very cuſtome came to as much as both the price of the corne and the freight together: all which miſcheefes they ſaid were to be preuented by renewing the league with Solyman. This matter was with great heat debated in the Senat too and fro, either part hauing great fault: ſo that the Senatours ſpent almoſt whole VVinter nights in the court in diſcourſing and conſulting what were beſt to be done. But whatſoeuer was there ſaid or decreed, was forthwith by one of the factions or other made knowne, not onely to the embaſſadors preſent in the citie, but by letters alſo diſcouered into provinces far off: a thing neuer before in that ſtate knowne, which had euer vſed as it were with a religious ſilence to keepe ſecret whatſoeuer was there decreed. VVhich thing Martius Foſcarius, an old Senator and a man of great wildome, perceiving, ſaid openly, That the ſtate was betrayed by the multitude and corruption of voices, and muſt needs ſhortly periſh, if it were not ſpeedily committed to the graue and faithfull iudgement of ſome some few: for there was almost two hundred of them which gave voices; reducing that multitude to the number of fiftie, who for their experience and love toward their country, were holden for men of greatest gravitie and secrecie: so was the madnesse of many stayed by the discretion of a few. But Foetus shortly after fell into such hatred of the multitude, grieved to be as light headed men without discretion, so excluded out of the counsell, that he was by the voices of the multitude first thrust out of the counsell himselfe; and by them kept a great while after from all the preferments and honours of the citie: being indeed one of the greatest Senators, and a man of deepest judgement. Which disgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had foreseene much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traiterously revealed the secrets of the State.

A peace concluded between the Venetians and Solyman.

The traitors who revealed the secret of the Venetian Senate to Solyman, executed.

But this long consultation concerning the confederation, came to this end: That the Senators doubting the union of those two great princes, and yet willing to expect the event, decreed forthwith to send three embassadours; whereof two should be sent to the emperor: and the French king to discover their designs, and the third, which was Aloysius Badoerius, a wise and well spoken man, was with all speed dispatched away to Solyman, to prevent the fame of the distrust to be conceived of the agreement of those great Christian princes; and if he could by any means, to spare for no cost, to save unto the Venetians their cities of NAVLIVM and BRADAVRVS, which Solyman required of them before he would graunt them peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and craftie tyrant, than to yeeld unto necessity, and to conclude a peace with him vpon any conditions: which course the Decemviri thought to be most expedient for the State: yet concerning the yeelding vp of the cities, they gave him secret instructions and warrant, fearing forsooth the force and tumult of the headstrong multitude; who if they had knowne any such thing, would vndoubtedly thereupon have taken occasion to have crossed and overthrowne that most wholesome decree: for there was no doubt, that if they had delayed that matter, and sought for peace too late, but that Solyman would vpon another mans weakenesse and necessitie have encreased his insatiable desire, and not graunted them peace, being brought low & forsaken, except they would deliver unto him the islands of CEREALENIA, ZACINTHVS, and CORCYRA, a matter no lesse grievous than the destruction of the very citie of VENICE it selfe. So that the great embassadours Vassius and Hanebald, who came of purpose to have hindered the league with the Turke; by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreseeing the danger of their estate, should as they did, make hast to conclude the same: for it falleth out in mens purposes and actions, That a good and happie successe otherwise well hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hanebald was sent by the French king but for fashion sake, and secretly vnderhand by Pellucarius the old embassadour perswaded the Venetians to hasten the conclusion of peace with Solyman. Which as Badoerius their embassadour was carefully following the matter at CONSTANTINOPLE, and being loth to yeeld the strong cities which Solyman required, offering unto him in stead of them a great summe of money: Solyman tooke him vp with threatening words as a shamelesse dissembler, earnestly protesting, That he would neuer graunt him peace, without the yeelding of those cities; rehearsing unto him the most secret points of his embassage, and how that he was authorized from the Decemviri to yeeld them unto him: which thing the embassadour little thought Solyman had knowne. Wherefore Badoerius so shamefully reprooved, and standing in doubt of his life, seeing the greatest secrets of his embassage revealed to Solyman and his Bassaes, was glad to accept of peace, by yeelding unto him NAVLIVM and EPIDAVRVS, two cities in PERIOPONESVS, and with them MAVLIVM and LABRANA, two castles of DALMATIA, to the great greefe of the whole Senate: for graining whereof the common people ignorant of the secret decree of the Decemviri, and supposing that Badoerius had given away that which he had no authoritie to give; were so enraged against him at his returne, that it was much adoe to save the guiltlesse man from exile; and his goods from confiscation, although the traitors were then knowne which had discovered the secrets of the State unto the Turke. These were Mapheus Lequius a Senator, and Constantinus Corbinius, secretaries to the college of the Decemviri, and Franciscus Kalerius, one of the Senators base fonnies, the traitorous disperser of the Turkes money for the corruption of others: who with other his complices were for the same fact hanged in the market place, when as Leonius and Corbinius were a little before fled into FRANCIA. About

About the same time which was in the yeare of our Lord 1540, died Ioannes Sepsius king of HUNGARIE, Solymans tributarie; after whose death ensued great warres in HUNGARIE, and the lamentable subversion of that flourishing kingdom: for the better conceiving whereof, it shall not be amiss with as much brevitie as the plainnesse of the historie will permit, to open the causes and grounds of the endlesse calamities which afterwards ensued, and neuer tooke end, vntill that warlike kingdom was to the great weakening of Christendome vterly subuered.

King Ferdinand and this tributarie king John, had with like desire of peace and quietnesse, made betweene them a league; profitable to them both as their estates then stood, rather than honourable: yet most welcome to the Hungarians, who devided into factions, and hauing followed some the one king and some the other, enjoyed neuertheless their lands and goods by the benefit of this peace; the townes and castles being still kept by them in whose possession they then were at the making of the peace. In the capitulations of which peace, it was comprised, That Ferdinand should from thenceforth call John by the name of a king, whereas before he had both in his common talke and letters called him by the name of the Vayvod onely: It was also expressly set downe in the same articles of peace, and subscribed with the hands of diuers of the nobilitie of HUNGARIE, That if king John should die, king Ferdinand should succeed him in the whole kingdom of HUNGARIE: Which condition was suppressed and kept verie secret for feare of Solyman, who accounted of that kingdom as of his owne, gotten by law of armes, and bestowed vpon king John as vpon his vassalle: neither was it to haue been thought, that if he should haue knowne thereof (being of a haucie mind by nature, and not able to endure any injury) he would haue suffered that kingdom, got and defended with so great danger and cost, to be by the will of an vnthankfull man, transferred vnto his enemies.

This matter of so great importance, was (as it is reported) by Hieronymus Lascus embassadour for king Ferdinand to CONSTANTINOPLE, revealed vnto Solyman and the Bassaes, to bring king John into hatred. So much did this noble gentleman, for his rare vertues otherwise greatly to haue been commended, yeeld vnto his griefe, and desire of reuenge: when after the death of Aloysius Grittus, he fell from the friendship of king John, being (as is before declared) by him committed to prison, and hardly afterwards enlarged, at the request of king Sigismund. Whereupon Solyman being exceedingly angrie with king John, called him vnworthely doe these and turning himselfe about to Lutzius Bassa his brother in law, said, How vnworthely doe these two Christian kings weare their crownes vpon their faithlesse heads; who as shamefull deceiuers are not afraid, either for worldly shame or feare of God, for their profit to falsifie their faith! But king John vnderstanding thereof, and wonderfully fearing his owne estate, did by good friends and rich presents, pacifie Solyman againe, laying all the blame vpon king Ferdinand, as better able to beate it. Not long after, king John hauing set his kingdom in good order, and strongly fortified the citie of BUDA: being now farre stricken in yeares, at the earnest request of most of the nobilitie of HUNGARIE and other his best friends, married Isabella the daughter of Sigismund king of POLONIA, a gracious ladie, and of great spirit: which king Sigismund had long before married Barbara king John his sister, after whose death he married the ladie Bona Sfortia, the daughter of Ioannes Galeacius duke of MILLAIN, by whom he had this ladie Isabella whom king John now married. Which marriage Solyman liked well of, hauing many times by way of talke before condemned the single life of the king: but king Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all, plainly foreseeing, that the Hungarians (if the king should chance to haue a sonne) would forthwith looke vpon him as their naturall king, and reject himselfe as but a stranger.

This young queene in short time (as he had feared) conceived with child; and was now verie big: when king John was enforced to make an expedition in person himselfe against Maylat (a Turkish child, big: when king John was enforced to make an expedition in person himselfe against Maylat (a Turkish child, famous for the death of Aloysius Grittus) and Balas, both Governours of TRANSILVANIA: whereof Maylat not contented with the name of Vayvod or Gouverneur, sought to make himselfe king. But Solyman detesting the impudent arrogancie of the faithlesse man, and hating him for the death of Grittus, and the Turkes slaine with him, aduertised king John of all the matter: so that him to be more circumspect whom he trusted with the government of so great and rich a country. So Maylat shamefully rejected of Solyman, and out of hope of a kingdom, fearing also to be thrust quite out of his government by king John, thought it best for his owne safetie, to raise vp all the province into rebellion, and to take part with king Ferdinand: which thing Ferdinand by his diuers agents secretly furthered to the vttermost. For these two kings, although though they were at peace the one with the other, and in words and shew made semblance of friendship; yet in heart they envied and hated each other, as if they should presently have waged warre. At that same time king Iohn exacted of his subjects, and especially of them of TRANSILVANIA, a great summe of money, to pay the Turke his tribute, then two yeares behind: which thing serued Maylat and his complices, as a fit occasion to raise the people into rebellion; perswading them, that there was no reason to pay vnto the Turke such a tribute, as would serue well to wage ten yeares honourable warre against him: so that by that and such like persuasion, all the prouince was in an vprore, little differing from manifest rebellion. To appease these dangerous troubles thus arising, king Iohn sent certaine of his chiefe nobilitie and best capitaines with a great power into TRANSILVANIA, following after himselfe in his chariot, nor yet well recovered of his late sicknesse: These noble men entring in two places into TRANSILVANIA, and H scouring vp and downe the country, had in short time so vsed the matter, that what by force what by policie, the tumult was well pacified, and diuers of the chiefe offenders worthely executed. Maylat the ambitious author of this sedition, not able to hold the field against the king, and seeing himselfe beset on euerie side with his enemies, retired himselfe with all his wealth into a towne called FoGARAS, a place of great strength, which the kings power shortly after hardly besieged: the king himselfe then lying at SIBYNIUM, the chiefe cite of TRANSILVANIA, about a mile distant from FoGARAS, sicke of an ague, whereinto he was againe fallen through too much care and paines taken in traouelling in that hoar time of the yeare, the daies being then at the longest. Whilste he thus lay sicke at SIBYNIUM, and his armie fast by at the siege of FoGARAS, newes was brought vnto him from the court, That the queene his wife was deliuered of a faire young sonne: which was no sooner bruted abroad, but the Hungarians as men ouerjoyed, came flocking to the court where the king lay, discharging their pieces in triumph, with all other signes of joy and mirth they could possible deuise: the noble men came from the campe to reioice with the king, and all the armie was filled with gladnesse. And for the greater solemnitie of this so common a joy, a royall feast was prepared, which the noble men would needs haue the king to honour with his presence, though he were thereto vnwilling, being as yet but a little recovered: Howbeit yeelding to their importunitie, hee suffered himselfe to be ouerruled and brought to the feast by them, which was vnto him the merriest and the last that euer he made: for willing to shew his inward joy, and to content his nobilitie there present, he forgot himselfe, and eat and dranke more liberally than was for the health of his weake bodie: whereby the fea- K uer which had but a little before left him, was againe renewed, in such sort, as that he well perceived he could not long endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw fast on, he made his will, appointing his young sonne to be his heire, whom he committed to the tuition of George bishop of VERADIVM, and Peter Viche a noble gentleman and his neere kinsman, vntill he came to age; requesting the rest of the noble men to preferre his sonne in the succession of the kingdome, before a stranger, telling them, That Solyman would vndoubtedly take vpon him the protection both of the kingdome and of his sonne, if they would in time send embassadours vnto him with presents, and promise for his sonne, that he should raigne as his tributarie as he had done before: and so presently after died.

This king was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountifull, and in all his doings just, of no fierce and rough disposition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a most ciuile behaviour, garnished with good letters, and thorowly schooled in the diuers chances of both fortunes, not measuring his actions by the strength of his power, but by the exact rule of discretion; for in time of businesse no man was more circumspect or vigilant than he, nor in time of recreation any man more courteous or pleasant. He vsed oftentimes to say, That the fauour and loue of valiant men gotten by bountie and courtisie, was the best treasure of a prince; for that courteous and thankfull men; did oftentimes in some one worthie piece of seruice, plentifully repay whatsoever had been bestowed vpon them: as for such as were vnthankfull, they did to their shame beare the testimonie of another mans vertue.

The kings death was kept secret vntill such time as the noble men had agreed with Maylat, M that he should take an oath of his faithfull alleagance to the king; and his sonne his lawfull heire, and so still to enjoy his former place and gouernment: which offer Maylat gladly accepted. Then calling together the counsell, it was decreed to send the same embassage to Solyman, which was appointed the old king yet liuing: So were presently dispatched away two most hono- ble

tius the Chancellor, a man of great yeares, carrying with them ten boles of pure gold curiously wrought, six hundred of siluer, gilt and engrauen; fortie pieces of purple silke and cloth of gold for Turkes gownes; and fiftie pound of coined gold, to be paid in the name of two yeares tribute. Which embassadours passing directly from SIBYNIUM ouer Danubius into SERVA, and so traouelling thorow THRACIA, came to CONSTANTINOPLE. In the meane time, the dead body of the king was with much heauinesse carried from SIBYNIUM to ALBAROALS, most part of the armie following it, and there with great solemnitie buried. After this the young child was christened and called Stephen, and there presently crowned with the antient crowne of king Stephen, who first erected that kingdome, & without which the Hungarians neuer accounted their kings lawfully crowned. Yet the royall dignitie was by the common consent of the nobilitie giuen vnto the queene, with condition, that in all publike writings the names of the sonne and of the mother should be joyned, and the kings money coined with the same inscription: but the chiefe authoritie rested in George the bishop; for he was treasurer, and had at his commaund the castles and strong holds: yet were the souldiors with their ensignes and furniture, at the deuotion of Valentinus Thuracus: In the middle between these two was placed Peter Viche the kings kinsman, and by the old king appointed for one of the tutors to his young sonne, suspected of neither part, honoured with the name of high Conitable. But because the name of this George the bishop was most famous in this wofull warre which we are about to write, I thought it worth the labour to speake something of his nature and disposition, that it may be knowne to C all posteritie by what pollicie this war was managed, and how this flourishing kingdome by the madnesse of the Hungarians came into the hands of the Turkes.

This George was borne in CROATIA, and brought vp from his youth in the house of king Iohn, where vertue and industrie neuer wanted reliefe; when as he vnadvisedly before, had entered into the orders of a monasticall life, and wearie too late of the straightnesse thereof, had forsaken his profesion. Wherefore being of a wonderfull pleasing nature, and still following king Iohn, driuen out of his kingdome and long liuing in exile, he woon such credit and commendation for his fidelitie, integritie, and readie counsell in the kings most doubtfull and dangerous affaires, that after Sibacchus that worthie bishop, was by the treacherie of Aloysius Gritus slaine at BAXOVA, he obtained the great bishopricke of VERADIVM. After that, when he had strengthened his credit with great wealth, he alwaies as a faithfull counsellor swaied and happily ruled both the court and kingdome, to the profit of the king. But he was of such a diuers and pliant nature, that performing in all actions all the parts of a most readie and excellent man, he seemed to be made of contrarie qualities, and borne to doe any thing: For in saying of his princely seruice, and performing the other ceremonies of the Christian religion, he shewed, or at leastwise counterfeited such a contrition in his deuout countenance and speech, that a man would not haue thought it could possibly be the same man, who in the most waightie affaires both of warre and peace, did most stoutly shew the wonderfull force of a most pregnant and courageous wit: For he vsed to keepe whole companies of most excellent and ready horsemen, and would oftentimes come forth into the battell armed: he would with often banquets and rewards win the hearts of the souldiors; and after the manner of great chieftaines, maintaine the honour and credit of his name, both with punishment and reward, as occasion required. Besides that, no man looked in to the wealth of the kingdome more diligently than he, no man did to more profit let to farme the customes, gold mines, feedings, and salt pits; no man could deuise finer meanes to raise money, of all others the readiest way to credit: in so much, that king Iohn would confesse himselfe to raigne by the especially industrie of that man: and king Ferdinand would many times say, That he envied at K. Iohn for nothing he had, but for one hooded fellow, which was better for the defence of a kingdome, than 10000 with helmets on their heads. Wherefore this bishop hauing taken vp on him the tuition of the young king, was still busied in all the waightie causes of the kingdome, both ciuile & martiall: he laboured with great care, that the Hungarians should agree together in loue and vnitie, and did what he might, prouidently to foresee that no tumult or rebellion should F anywhere arise, whereby the beginning of the kingdome, yet but weake, might any way be troubled. But king Ferdinand hearing of the death of king Iohn, thought it now a fit time for him to recouer againe the kingdome of HUNGARIE, which he had so long desired. Wherunto he was also the more prickt forward by the persuation of Alexius Torso, Ferentius Gnarus, Petrus dinand to invade Hungarie.

Bachit, Balbazar Pamphilus, Erancus Capolnates, Ianus Castellamphus, and Casparus Sereus, all G noblemen or gentlemen of great account in HUNGARIE; who in the former troubles follow- ing the part of king Ferdinand against king John, lined now in exile: these all with one consent told king Ferdinand, That now or neuer was the time when they might be againe restored vnto their countrey with honor; and that the warre might that Autumne be dispatched, if he would make hast: for as much as Winter comming fast on would stay the comming of the Turks, and such noble men of HUNGARIE as tooke part with the queene, did not very well agree together, being vnwilling to be commaunded by George the Apostata monke, who (as they said) with great cunning and dissimulation seducing the queene, and possessing the treasure, enjoyed all alone the power of a king: and that they, which for taking part with the right had long liued as banished men, might now safely returne into their countrey, and be honourably preferred by the queene; the Bishop (which all commaunded) assuring them thereof, if they would returne vnto the young kings court, vnto their friends and auncient houses. But they had as they said, before giuen their faith vnto him as to a verieous and faithfull prince, whom they had preferred before one that was an Hungarian borne: wherefore he should doe both vnadvisedly, and vnkindly, if letting slip the occasion presented; he should deferre to make warre. For what could be more dishonour to him so great a king, and also emperour elect, than by shamefull delay to forsake them, being noble and valiant gentlemen, which had followed his part, and were then ready with strong troupes of horsemen to doe him the best seruice they could?

The German capitaines in like manner perswaded him to take the matter in hand, who as martiall men, expecting some one preferment, some another, in the atchieue, were desirous of honour, pay, and prey, the chiefe comforts of their trauell and perill.

But Laschus the Polonian, who in matters concerning peace and warre, saw more than all they (as he that knew the disposition of many princes, and had seene the manners and fashions of diuers nations, hauing trauelled thorow a great part of the world, and oftentimes bene embassa- dour in the courts of the greatest princes) was of a contrarie opinion, and told king Ferdinand plainly, That the kingdome of HUNGARIE was to be obtained rather by policie than by force, by crauing it at Solymans hand, to hold it of him by tribute as king John did.

For (said he) that may by petition and faire entreatance be easily obtained of: that heroicall prince (who in his vaine humor oftentimes fondly seeketh after honour) which will neuer be got from him by force of armes. I thorowly know (said he) Solymans haughty mind, and the proud disposition of his Bassaes: he contemneth wealth, and is cloied with so many kingdomes: but they vpon their insatiable covetousnesse and exceeding pride, desire nothing, nor perswade him to nothing more than warre. Wherefore it is good to beware, that with the noise of this sudden warre you stir not up the Turks, which lie ready as it were expecting such an occasion, which cannot be withstood, but by the united forces of the Christian princes; which might by their generall consent be done, but that their eyes blinded with far all darknesse cannot see it, and the vnitie of the Christians now desperate, seemeth by God reserved to some better time: seeing that of late the Christian kings are fallen off, and cannot agree vpon the long expected peace. Is not (said he) the French king deceived of his hope? and as he would haue it thought, greatly dishonored with this late unkindnesse? which renewing his old wound, will reuiue in him an endlesse hatred. Away with all dissimulations, enemy vnto graue counsells, and let plaine truth, although vnpleasant vnto princes eares, preuent flatterie: Vndoubtedly, he being a prince of no base courage (as it oftentimes falleth out with men thorowly grieued) will in his anger as an enemy powre forth his gold, whereof he hath good store, to crosse the emperours designs, to trouble the assemblies of the states of GERMANY, to withdraw the minds of the princes, and with bountie to gaine them to himselfe: who mightily enuying the imperiall dignitie, woom to be indifferently giuen to them that best deserued the same, to be as it were inuested in the house of AVSTRIA; which in this perpetuall succession of so many emperours, hath as it were got a right by long custome. Wherefore they will secretly conspire together, and as notable lingerers by nature, will either giue no helpe at all, or else too late: at such time as the Turkes garrisons shall come flying to the succour of the young king. Neither is there any cause why any man should thinke that the gouernours of the Turks countries neere at hand, will for the approach of winter be slacke in this cause: for they vndoubtedly making an honest and honourable shew will take vpon them the defence of the fatherlesse child and widow, of purpose, to make an entrance to the secret desire they haue to gaine the kingdome to them- selves.

A selues: for if you shall once ioyne with them in battell, if the best happen, and fortune fauour our first attempts, truly you shall haue war without end, with such an enemy, which will bring with him wealth that will neuer be spent, power not to be overcome, and courageous souldiours sworne to our destruction: so will it come to passe, and I pray God I be a false prophet, that in seeking for the kingdome of HUNGARIE by warre, you shall at length be glad to fight for AVSTRIA it selfe and your owne kingdome also.

This speech so moued king Ferdinand, that although he purposed to goe on with the warre, yet he thought it good by an honourable embassage to proue Solymans mind and purpose also; which to doe no man was thought fitter than Laschus himselfe, author of that counsell, being vnto him very well knowne, and familiarly acquainted with all the great Bassaes of the court: which seruice Laschus refused not, but being furnished with all things needfull for such an embassage, departed from VIENNA towards CONSTANTINOPLE.

Yet for all that king Ferdinand persisting in his former purpose, made with all preparation for warre, trusting vpon the aid of the emperour his brother, and the comming ouer of the Hungarians, who euer thought it cause honest ymough for them to reuolt, if it so stood with their present profit. But before he would enter into open warres, he sent Nicholas countie of SALMA King Ferdinand

C offered to giue vnto the child the prouince of SERVSIA, as was before agreed betwixt the two kings expressly in the league, and to the queene a great reuenew, and whatsoever else she had in dowrie. But if he would forget that lawfull league, he threatened, that neither the emperour Charles his brother nor he wanted force wherewith to recouer by strong hand the kingdome, annexed to the house of AVSTRIA both by auncient right and the new consent of most of the Hungarian nobilitie. The countie SALMA being receiued at BUDA, hardly obtained to be admitted to the presence of the queene: for George the Bishop, and Viche, mistrusting her womanlike courage, said, she was not to be spoken withall, by reason she was so full of heauinesse and sorrow; and that they were of authoritie, as the kings tutors, and ready to giue him both audience and answer. Which opinion of her weakenesse, and want of judgement, the queene being

D a woman of an heroicall and royall spirit, tooke, as tending so much to her disgrace, that she said she would kill her selfe, if the embassadors were not permitted to come into her chamber (which was a darke roome hanged with blacke, as the manner is;) and she sitting vpon a low pallet negligently attired, as one that had no care of her selfe, wan and pale coloured, but as then shedding no teares, yet with voice and countenance so heauie, as might shew her teares to be rather dried vp with long mourning, than that her sorrow was any thing abated: for the desire of bearing rule had now so possessed her mind, that she contemned all the dangers of imminent warre, and for defence of her soueraignetie resolved with her selfe to call in the Turks. After the countie admitted to her presence, had with due reuerence and great protestation deliuered his message, she demurely answered, That such was the fortune of her sex and yeares, that being bereft of the king

E her husband, and perplexed with the dayly greeces both of bodie and mind, she could neither take nor giue counsell, but purposed in so weightie a cause to vfe the aduice of Sigismund her father, whose integritie and justice was such, as king Ferdinand needed no other iudge or arbitrator to end that controuersie: Wherefore she requested a conuenient time and space, wherein she might aske counsell of her father; to whose iust judgement she said she would stand, as she thought the nobilitie of HUNGARIE would also. Which small time of delay if it should be denied, and that they would needs forthwith make warre vpon her, she said, that the emperor and king Ferdinand his brother should surely win no great honour, if they should come to oppugne her a widow consumed with teares, and a young child yet crying in his cradle. The countie so sent away, when he was returned to king Ferdinand, told him, That the queene was altogether F in the power of the Bishop, and could neither say nor doe any thing, but what she had before received from him: for he only (as he said) commaunded all: as for the rest of the nobilitie, they shared amongst them the honours and preferments of the realme, and as men desirous of credit and gaine, had rather be the gouernours of the young prince, than the seruants and waiters of a great and mightie forraigne king: all which he said he had both heard and seene. Wherefore all the hope was in warre, wherein such speed was to be vied, as that the queene with her sonne vnderprouided, and expecting the euent of their embassage from CONSTANTINOPLE, might be diuened out of BUDA before they could take vp armes or well aduise themselves, what to doe; and that the queene sought delay but to make her selfe the stronger, and in the meane time to call in the Turke, and so to make a more dangerous warre. Wherefore if euer he purposed to reigne in HUNGARIE, he should forthwith cast off all other cogitations, and make readie his forces with all speed possible.

Hereupon king Ferdinand furnished with money from Charles the emperour, without delay raised a great armie, which he sent downe the riuer Danubius to STRIGONIUM, which citie had all the reigne of king Iohn continued faithfull to king Ferdinand. The Generall of this armie was Leonardus Velsius, a nobleman of RASTIA; who for many causes thought it expedient first to open the way to BUDA, for almost in the middle of the way stood VITIGRADA, with a goodly citie vpon the top of an hill by the riuer side; which towne (but not the citie) Velsius after nine dayes siege tooke, with the losse of about two hundred of his men; all the garrison souldiours therein being either slaine or taken prisoners, with Valentinus Litteratus their capitaine. From VITIGRADA he passed over the riuer Danubius to PESTH, which he tooke, being forsaken of the enemy. With like successe he tooke the citie of VACIA, without losse and remouing thence, and crossing againe the riuer with his fleet, came and encamped before BUDA, to terrifie the citizens, and to discouer as farre as he could the purpose of the queene. Where Perennis, Stephanus Rascaius, and Franciscus Francopanes bishop of AGRIA, all men of great nobilitie amongst the Hungarians, revolted from the queene to king Ferdinand: the Bishop was reputed for a man of great integritie, and vpon meere conscience to haue gone over to Ferdinand; yet was he by letters from George the kings tutor challenged to haue revolted, in hope by means of Charles the emperour to be made a Cardinal. Velsius lay with his armie at the hot bathes about a mile and a halfe from the citie, as if he would rather besiege it, than assault it. The Germanes lying there, did fetch in bootie round about the country; which was taken in euill part by the Hungarians on their side; who seeing their owne cattell or their friends driuen away, the villages burnt, and the poore husbandmen bound and taken prisoners, fell together by the eates oftentimes with the Germanes. On the other side they of BUDA sending out their troupes of horsemen, skirmished with the Germanes, if they did but stirre out of the campe, and well defended the villages from the iniurie of the enemy: for Valentinus Thuraccus, Generall of the queenes power, had taken into the citie a wonderfull number of light horsemen. Whilist the armie lay thus encamped, it fortuned that Balthasar Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, straying out of the campe euen to the gates of BUDA, desired the warders at the gate to giue him leaue to talke with Valentinus their Generall, for that he desired to see his old friend, and to confesse with him of certaine matters concerning the good of the common state. Which thing being graunted by the Generall, he was immediatly receiued into the citie with his troupe of horsemen. Shortly after returning againe into the campe, he reported how he had bene entertained by his old acquaintance in the citie: where viewing the garrison, the great artillerie and fortification of the citie, he perceiued it was not to be taken without a greater power, and in a more seasonable time of the year. Which thing so moued Velsius, by nature suspitious; and doubtfull of the fidelitie of a stranger, that he commaunded him in anger to void the campe, because he had without his leaue gone into the citie, and vpon his owne priuat insolencie had conference with the enemy, and by amplifying their strength, to haue discouraged the armie, by putting them out of hope of victorie. Wherefore Velsius neuer attempting to assault the citie, returned againe to VITIGRADA to besiege the higher citie (wherein the auncient crowne of king Stephen, wherewith the Hungarian kings were euer after him crowned, was kept) which citie he also tooke with something lesse losse than he had done the lower towne. Not long after he marched with his armie to ALBA REGALIS, the citie where the Hungarian kings were vsually crowned and buried, which by the meanes of Perennis was deliuered vnto him, and a garrison put into it for king Ferdinand. These things thus done, Velsius retired againe to STRIGONIUM, which he did the rather, because the Germanes and Hungarians, two rough nations, could by no meanes agree together; in somuch, as that Velsius the Generall in parting them was wounded in the thigh, and Perennis hurt with a stone; besides that Winter was now come farre on, and the souldiours cried out for pay. For which causes Velsius (being also sicke of the stone) billitted his souldiours for that Winter about

A about in the countrey. Yet before that he new fortified PESTH, and left therein a garrison; because it was reported, that the Turkes vpon their frontiers were making preparation to come to aid them of BUDA.

At such time as king Ferdinand was leuying his forces for the inuasion of HUNGARIE, the queene by the counsell of the Bishop, had in good time craued aid of the Turkes lieutenants in the countries bordering vpon HUNGARIE, especially of Vstref, gouernour of BOSNA (a very aged man, and of great honour, who had married one of the daughters of Baiazer, the old emperour) as also of Mahometes gouernour of BELGRADE, and Amurathes who had the charge of the frontiers of DALMATIA: from whom she receiued one answer, That they might in no case without expresse commaundement from Solyman depart from the places of their charge. Besides that, Mahometes was by rewards overcome by Lascus, as he passed by BELGRADE to CONSTANTINOPLE, not to stirre or aid the queene. Wherefore she rejected by these great capitaines, certified Solyman by her embassadours what danger her selfe, her sonne, and the kingdome was in, crauing his speedie aid. Lascus was not yet come to CONSTANTINOPLE, being fallen sicke by the way, but had sent before Ptolomus his physition to the great Bassaes, and especially to Lutis his old acquaintance, vpon whom he had bestowed great gifts; and was in hope by him to haue obtained what he desired: but all in vaine, for Solyman who thought it much for his honour to defend his owne right, and that he had before giuen vnto king Iohn; thought also, that it would redound both to his great profit and glorie, if he should, as it were vpon charitie take vpon him the protection of the widow and fatherlesse child, in their so great distresse and danger. Wherefore calling vnto him the embassadours, the three great Bassaes standing by, he said, That he had of his meere bountie before giuen the kingdome of HUNGARIE vnto king Iohn, to descend to his posteritie, so long as they should retain the kind remembrance of so great a benefite; wherefore to declare his constancie, inseparable from his bountie, he said he would take such a course in the matter, as that the Germanes his enemies should not long reioice of the warres they had begun. And in token of friendship, and that he had taken vpon him the protection of the young king, he caused to be deliuered vnto the embassadours a royall robe of purple and gold, a buckler with the bosse most curiously wrought, a horsemans mace with a handle of gold, and a scimitar with the scabbard richly set with stones: and afterwards writ effectually to Vstref and Mahometes, his lieutenants, that they should without delay aid the queene, and not to make excuse, because it was Winter, threatening them, that if she tooke any harme through their default or negligence, it should cost them their heads. The queenes embassadours glad of their good dispatch, were scarce departed from the Turkes court, when Lascus came to CONSTANTINOPLE; and vnderstanding by his physition the successe of the Hungarian embassadours, proceeded for all that in his businesse, and deliuered his message, and vpon many reasonable conditions requested the kingdome for king Ferdinand. But when he in speaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the emperour, as if he would with all the power of GERMANIE aid his brother; Solyman was so moued therewith, that he was presently taken away and committed to prison: the great Bassaes, but especially Rustan, Solymans sonne in law, a proud and furious young man, chiding him and shaking him vp as worthe of death, for offending with his libell speech the maiestie of so courteous a prince, and as it were mocking the king of kings, requiring friendship, when in the meane time his master most impudently made warres in HUNGARIE.

Vstref and Mahometes, the Bassaes aforesaid, hauing receiued such straight commaundement from Solyman, assembled their dispersed souldiours, and by shipping brought them downe the riuers Sauus and Dranus into Danubius, (for it is a hard matter to performe any great thing by warres in HUNGARIE, without the helpe of a great fleet, for conueying of the great ordnance, victual, and other such necessities of the armie, from one side of the great riuers to the other, as occasion requireth) but as then being the midst of Winter, and the North wind blowing so hard, Danubius was so frozen on both sides, that the middle of the riuer was scarce open: so that the Turkes not able to passe for the extremitie of the weather, nor daring, to returne for the straight command of Solyman, were enforced in their tents there to abide the hardnesse of Winter, to shew their readinesse. It is almost incredible to be spoken, with what patience and resolution the souldiours endured all the extremities of the time, in so bare a place, their horses which of all other things they hold most deare, staruing for cold and want of meat.

Solyman the Magnificent,

The Spring at length comming on, right welcome both to the Turkes and the queene; Matthias hometes with his Turkes and wild Illyrians, and Vstref with his souldiours of Bosnia, entred in to Hungarie, with whom Valentinus Generall of the queens forces joyned also, with a strong power of Hungarians brought from Buda. And the queene to further the matter, sent presents to the Turkes Generals, victualled the campe, and furnished them with great ordinance, for the besieging of such cities as were holden by king Ferdinand and her enemies. They passing ouer Danubius tooke the cite of Vacia, being but badly defended for king Ferdinand, and putting many to the sword (after the manner of their barbarous-crueltie) burnt the cite. From thence they remoued to Pesth, which was so valiantly defended by Barocius and Fotisus, the one a Hungarian capitaine, the other a German, that the Turkes despairing of the winning of the cite, and norwell relieved with victuall by the queene, then fearing future want, passed againe ouer Danubius, and faithfully restoring the great ordinance without any more doing, returned againe into their owne countries: but in their retreating, the Hungarians by the leading of Ferentius Gnarus slew many of them, amongst whom was one Achomates, one of their best and valiantest capitaines.

King Ferdinand aduertised of the Turkes departure, returned again to his old hope of recouering the kingdome: perswading the emperor his brother, not to giue ouer the war so fortunately begun, especially now that the Turkes hauing forsaken the queene, were departed and gone: Wherefore the new forces lately before raised in Austria, Bohemia, Silesia, and Moravia, for the supply of Vellus his armie, were presently sent into Hungarie vnder the leading of the Lo. William Rogendorff steward of the kings house, who was then gone as farre as Possone. Vnto to haue relieved them of Pesth, vnto whom as a more auncient and honourable Generall Vellus gaue place: He, furnished with these new supplies, three moneths victuall, and great artillerie from Vienna, joyning with the old armie, marched directly to Buda, and laid siege vnto it. Ouert against the stately castle of Buda wherein the queene lay, was a great hill called S. Gerrards mount, so high, that the middle thereof was equall with the highest place of the castle, and from the top thereof they might looke into the streets of the cite, betwixt which hill and the castle was a great valley and a deepe ditch: vpon this hill, Rogendorff to beat the castle and to terrifie the queene, planted his batterie, and so shooke a new built tower thereof, that it was thought it would haue suddenly fallen; which if it had, yet was it supposed a dangerous matter to assault it, because it was walled about with a treble wall. But the sumptuous turrets and princely galleries of the kings pallace in the castle, which euerie man saw Rogendorff might haue beaten downe with his great ordinance, he spared: but whether of himselfe, or else commaunded by the king (as loath to destroy so goodly buildings, as could not without great charges be in long time againe repaired) was vncertaine. Wherefore by diuers heraulds sent vnto the queen, he wished her to breake in sunder those giues and fetters wherein the bishop vnder the colour of protection had fast bound her sonne and her, and to accept of king Ferdinands offer, who was readie to bestow vpon her a goodly seignorie, wherein she might most honourably liue at quiet, and bring vp her sonne in safetie: Which thing, if she as a simple woman, and ignorant of her owne danger, should refuse and obstinately contemne the perill wherein she stood, he would forthwith in most terrible manner beat downe the pallace about her eares. Whereunto the bishop in the queenes behalfe answered, That she was not such a foole as to exchange the kingdome of Hungarie for the principallitie of Servisia: and that she thought Rogendorff a yette doting and mad old man, who being once before well beaten in those ditches, came now againe like a foole to receiue his vtter destruction in full guerdon of his rash folly: Wherefore he should cease to terrifie valiant men, fighting with discretion for their naturall king and countrey against his drunken companie, for that they were nothing troubled with the noise of his great shot: But yet he said, that he would about all the rest by way of priuat courtesie, gently request Rogendorff to discharge his pieces with a little lesse noise, because he had a sow at home great with pigs, which terrified with the thundring of his guns, would farrow he doubted before her time, to the griefe of his guests. For the bishop was of a sharpe and taunting spirit, and such a contemner of the Germans, that when two of them were taken in the kings orchards burning certaine houses, he in derision caused two hogs to be hanged vpon the same gallows with them. Not long after, Rogendorff remoued his campe from the mount of S. Gerrard to a more convenient place for the battering of the cite, called the Iewes graues, neere vnto the gate called the Iewes gate. Which fourth Emperour of the Turkes.

A Which thing the bishop seeing, after his quipping manner requested of Rogendorff to pardon him, in that he had of late wrongfully called him a doting old man; for that in remouing his campe into a mote commodious place, he seemed to be a proper wife man and of good discretion, now that he had pitched his tents in a most fit place amongst the dead, both for himselfe being an old man and almost worne with vaine labour, and for his armie there condemned to die with him. Rogendorff thus encamped, begun in two places to batter the wals: Perenus and the Hungarians with the Bohemians neere vnto the gate called Sabatina in one place, and hee himselfe with the Germans betwixt the Iewes gate and the castle in another: which was done with such violence, that a great part of the wall was beaten downe, & another part thereof overcharged with earth, which the defendants had cast vp on the inner side for the strengthening thereof, was at the same time born quite out and so fell downe, to the wonderfull dismay of all that were in the cite. Which faire opportunitie to haue taken the cite Rogendorff let slip, either not well aware thereof by reason of the great smoke of the artillerie on both sides, and the dust arising with the fall of the wall which couered all; or else according to his naturall disposition, doing all things leasurely and suspiciously; so that a little delay bereft him of the present apprehension of so sudden a resolution: and the Germans, vfed more to standing battels than to assault, were not to be so easily brought on to assault the breach vpon the sudden, as were the Spaniards, Italians, or French. The wall was opened in that place almost two hundred paces in length, yet standing almost the height of a man, which might easily haue been scaled with short ladders; but night was now comming fast on, wherein the Germans would not willingly attempt any dangerous matter: so that the assault was deferred vntill the next morning. Whereas they of Buda in the meane time taking the aduantage of the enemies delay, with incredible diligence and labour in that night raised vp a new rampier in steed of the wall that was fallen, euerie man without exception putting his hand to the worke. In the morning the Germans comming to the breach, gaue such a fierce assault vnto the new made rampier, that Otho Fotisus desperately entered into a shattered house which joyned vnto the wall; and certaine other companies, one souldiour helping vp another, had almost recouered the top of the rampier, and were there readie to haue set vp their ensignes. When they of Buda with wonderfull constancie and resolution withstood the assailants, George the bishop encouraging them and fighting amongst them; who hauing laid aside his hood, was now to be seene with his helmet on his head, running too and fro as need required all alongt the rampier. At length the Germans seeing themselves to strue in vaine against resolute men, were enforced to retire. In this assault Rogendorff lost about 800. men. Perenus was also in like manner, but with lesse losse, repulsed at the other breach he had made at the gate Sabatina. After that Rogendorff attempted by vndermining to haue taken the cite, but was by countermines disappointed of his purpose. Yet for all this, they in the cite began to feeble the want of many things, so that it seemed they were not able to endure any longer siege; the common people pinched with hunger crying openly out in mutinous fort, that it was time to yeeld and make an end of those common miseries: but such was the authoritie of the bishop with his prouident foresight of all vrgent euents, that once shewing himselfe in the market place as if he would haue preached, he could turne the peeuish minded people which way he pleased.

E After all this, it missed but a little, but that this cite which could not by enemies force be woon, had by shamefull treason beene lost: there was at that time in Buda one Bornemissa a lawyer, who had in former time beene maior of the cite: this Bornemissa exceedingly hated the bishop for taking part with a bankerout Iew against him, and being full of malice, and desirous of reuenge, promised to Renalins (martiall in the enemies campe) to deliuer vnto him a blind posterne in S. Maries churchyard, whereby he might enter the cite: which gate acsered the citisens in time of peace to go thorow to the riuer. Rogendorff the Generall made acquainted with the matter, so liked thereof, that he in himselfe thought it not good, in a matter of so great importance, to vse at all the seruice of the Hungarians: Quite contrarie to that Bornemissa had requested of Renalins, who desirous to haue the matter brought to passe without the slaughter of so many guiltlesse people as was by him to be betrayed, would haue had it altogether performed by the Hungarians, who he was in good hope would shew mercie vnto their countrey men and kinsmen, and vse their victorie with more moderation than the Germans, who prouoked with many despights, and comming in by night, were like enough to make great effusion effusion of blood. But Rogendorff after the manner of his nation, to be counted pollicke, ying G to keepe promise with no man, and hoping by excluding the Hungarians to haue all the glorie of the conceiued victorie wholly to himselfe; made as if he would haue vsed onely the Hungarians, and glosed with Renalius, whose son for the more assurance he tooke aspledge. For against the appointed houre, which was about midnight, hauing before giuen straight charge that no man should stir in the campe, he sent foure select companies of Germans with great silence vnto the posterne; at which time his sonne Condi stood with a strong troupe of horsemen, ready to haue entred, at such time as the Germans (receiued into the citie) should breake open the great gate, as was before agreed. Neither did Bornemissa faile to performe what he had as a traitor promised: but opening the posterne wee spake of, had with great silence receiued in most part of those German companies. But when he still asked softly of them as they came in for Renalius, he and heard them answere nothing but in the German language; although hee was otherwise a man of a bold spirit, yet then surprisid with a sudden feate (as it oftentimes chanceth in such additions to men deceiued of their expectation) he stood as a man amazed that knew not what to doe, & forgot to conduct the Germans: who altogether vnacquainted with the citie, knew not which way first to go; and stealing on softly in the darke, went on with no great courage, for feare of treason, still asking of them that followed, for him that should direct them. The Germans could not go so closely, but that they were by the clattering of their armour and the light of their marches, descried by the watch; who asking for the word, and they not giuing it, presently raised an alarm: but now all too late, the citie being as good as halfe taken, had the Germans well conducted resolutely gone on with the matter so well begun; but they ignorant of the way, and now delcied and chafed with their owne feare, ran backe againe to the posterne, in such halt, that one of them miserably wrong another, in striuing who should get out first; and their passage out much letted by the pikes and weapons which they which fled first had cast crosse the way to run the lighter into the campe. The first that set vpon the Germans was Bacianus, who had that night the charge of the watch; and after him Vicche, who kept the court of guard in the market place, and hearing the alarm, came thither with a strong companie both of horsemen and footmen. Many of the most valiantest Germans, who comming in first, were in flight become last, were slaine or taken, and amongst them many of Bornemissa his familiars and friends (as for himselfe, he was got out amongst the formost) from whom the bishop by exquisite torture wrong out the whole plot of the treason, and afterwards caused them to be severally executed K to the terrour of others. Renalius in the meane time complaining in the campe, That he was deceiued by the Generall: and Bornemissa wofully lamenting, That hauing worthily got the name of an infamous traitour, hee had thereby lost all his substance, and vndone his friends and kindred. The Generall Rogendorff (condemned euen of the common souldiors, for his foolish arrogancie and pride) was hardly spoken of thorow all the campe, as he that by too much insolencie had ouerthrowne the fairest occasion of a most goodly victorie: wherefore from that time he attempted no great matter, but set himselfe downe by long siege to tame his enemies, and so to win the citie.

Solyman vnderstanding of the queenes distresse in HUNGARIE, and with what desire Ferdinand (supported by the emperour his brother) thirsted after that kingdome; consulted with his L Bassaes of the purposes and power of his enemies, both there and elsewhere: and politickly resolved at one time, with his deuided forces, to withstand their attempts in diuers places, and those farre distant one from another, wherby the greatnesse of his power is well to be perceiued. First he sent Solyman Bassa an eunuch to BABYLON, to defend the countrey of MESOPOTAMIA, and the frontiers of his empire along the riuer Tygris, against Tamas the Persian king. Mahometes another of his great Bassaes, he sent into HUNGARIE to relieue the besieged queene: And after him Vstref Bassa, which was the fourth of his chiefe Bassaes, with another army to stay at BELGRADE, in readinesse to aid the other Bassa sent before him as occasion should require, if he should find his enemies too strong. Vnto Barbarussa he committed his naue, for the defence of GRECIA and EPHYRVS against Auria, who but a little before aided by the gallies M of SICILIA and NAPLES, had driuen the Turkes and Moores (which tooke part with the Turkes) out of CLYPEA, NEAPOLIS, ADRYMENTVM, RVSPINA, TAPSVS, and all alongst that coast of AFRICK which the Moores call MAHOMEDIA, except the citie of LEPTIS, and caused those cities to submit themselves to the government of Auleasses, king of TYNES. These

A These cities are at this day called CALIBIA, SVSA, MAHOMETA, MONASTERIVM, SPAXIA and AFRICA. And because Solyman vnderstood, that Maylat the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA tooke part with king Ferdinand, he sent against him Achomates gouernour of NICOPOLIS, and commaunded Peter of MOLDAVIA, prince of VALACATA, to aid him: who afterwards accordingly came vnto him with thirtie thousand horsemen. He himselfe also doubting the purposes of the Christian princes, and especially of Charles the emperour, more than he had need, came to HADRIANOPLE, and in the countie thereabouts raised a third armie, to aid the two Bassaes sent before into HUNGARIE; keeping with him his son in law Rustan, whom he had made one of the foure great Bassaes of his counsell, hauing thrust out Lustibinus, whom the Turkes call Luzis, his brother in law; and exiled him into MACEDONIA for euill entreating and striking his wife, which was Solymans sister, as is before said, but was at this time done.

B Mahometes the Bassa desirous to doe his great Master the best seruice he could, entred into HUNGARIE with his armie about the middle of Iune in the year 1541, taking with him in his way the other Mahometes gouernour of BELGRADE, who gaue the shamefull ouerthrow vnto the Christians at EZER; joyning also with him the power of BOSNA, now commaunded by Plamas the Persian, for that Vstref the old Bassa was lately dead. The captaines of the Christian armie hearing of the comming of the Turkes; entred into counsell, Whether they should continue the siege, or els goe and meet them by the way and giue them battell. But the period of the Hungarian kingdome drawing fast on, and the ineuitable destinie thereof so requiring, the opinion of Rogendorff preuailed against the rest for the continuing of the siege, he seeming more willing to die than to crosse ouer the riuer to PESTH, or to retire to VICEGRAD or STRIGONIVM, as diuers would haue perswaded him: wherefore he removed from the place where he lay before, and encamped his armie on the further side of the citie at the foot of S. Gerards mount, where the hill lying betweene BUDA and the campe, and departing from the riuer leaueth a faire plaine toward the East; of purpose, that the Turkes which he knew would not goe far from the riuer and their fleet, should be enforced dangerously to passe by the mouth of his great ordinance, which he had aptly placed vpon the front of his trenches: for such was the nature of the place, that the campe lay defended on the right hand with the steepe hill, on the left hand with the riuer, and behind toward the citie with a strong bulwarke. Vpon the right hand, vpon a little rising ground he placed the lesser campe, wherein were the Hungarians which fauoured king

D Ferdinand, and then followed his ensignes. He made also a bridge from his campe into a little island which lay in the riuer, and with a fort well planted with ordinance commaunded both the riuer and the plaine, so to beat the enemies fleet comming vp the riuer, and themselves also as they should march alongst the plaine. He was about also to haue made a bridge of lighters and boats quite ouer the riuer, from his campe to PESTH, and in this order to expect the comming of new supplies from king Ferdinand, and to repell the enemy who was comming, and with long siege to wearie them in BUDA: for there was such store both of victuall and all other warlike prouision in PESTH, as would well haue sufficed his armie vntill Winter had beene sent. As soone as the Turkes were come nigh the citie, Valentinus as an embassadour from the queene met them with two thousand horse, and fully instructed both the Mahometes what the Christians did, what strength they were of, and how they might most conueniently encampe E their armie. Wherefore the Bassa marching on boldly forward, came within halfe a mile of the Christian campe, where he quickly entrenched himselfe round with a strong trench, filling a great part of the plaine with his tents. But the other Mahometes, gouernour of BELGRADE, a most pollicke captaine, tooke the higher ground towards the rising of the hill, neerer vnto the tents of the Hungarians than of the Germanes. Vnto these two armies thus encamped, belonged also two fleets, the Christian fleet consisted of foure and twentie galleots, about fourefore small pinnaces, and little lesse than a hundred ships of burden and other great boats: whereas the Turkes fleet was not thought to be past halfe so great. Neere vnto the little island, joyned as we haue before said by a bridge to the Christian campe, beneath in the riuer had the Turkes taken F another island called CEBELIA, oueragainst their owne campe; where casting vp a great bulwarke in the vppermost end thereof, and planting it with great ordinance, they from thence shot at the fort which the Christians held in the little island, and at their vessels passing too and fro in the riuer; as the Christians did at them likewise. This island of CEBELIA lieth somewhat more than fortie miles in length in the riuer Danubius, full of countrey villages, so commodious fly, fly, that if Rogendorff had at the first taken it and fortified it, before the coming of the Turkes, as the Hungarians persuaded him to have done, the Turks could by no means have encamped in the plaine, but must needs have forsaken their fleet, fetching a great compass about more toward the West, further off from the river: which would have turned to the Turks great disadvantage. But no man is so wise as to foresee all things, when as the very euill successe, be the plot neuer so well laid, shall of it selfe, beside the losse, leaue vnto the unfortunate man the note of the want of prouident foresight and discretion. But Rogendorff was not willing to deuide his forces, vntill he had some new supplie from king Ferdinand. VVhilest the armies lay thus neere one to the other, there were some light skirmishes made euery day, either by the horsemen or the footmen, and sometime one braue man challenging forth another hand to hand, whom he thought by his armour or some other signe of his worth, to be like to himselfe, which was so pleasant a sight to behold, that both the armies vpon a militarie courtesie, as if it had been so agreed, would many times for certaine houres forbear to shoot any shot, of purpose to see those gallants, with true prowesse to prooue their valour and manhood one vpon another with their speares and swords only. In which light skirmishes the Germane horsemen were oftentimes put to the worst, who mounted vpon great heauie horses, fitter for a set battell, could neither so readily charge the enemy, nor pursue him in his flight; as could the Turks with their nimble and readie light horses, so well acquainted with that manner of flying fight, that they would with wheeling about easily frustrate the first charge of the heauie horsemen, and by and by come vpon them againe with a fresh charge, & so often retire and come on again, vntill they had either wearied or ouerthrowne them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that manner of fight, as well as they, and also better armed, did easily encounter the Turks, and foile them, although they were in number more.

Skirmishes betweene the Christians and the Turkes.

Rayschachius for sorrow of his sonne slaine by the Turks, suddenly dieth.

There was amongst the Germane captaines a noble man called Eckius Rayschachius, whose son (a valiant yong gentleman) being got out of the armie without his fathers knowledge, bare himselfe so gallantly in fight against the enemy in the fight of his father and of the armie, that he was highly commended of all men, and especially of his father, who knew him not at all: yet before he could cleare himselfe, he was compassed in with the enemy, and valiantly fighting slaine. Rayschachius exceedingly moued with the death of so braue a man, ignorant how neere it touched himselfe, turning about to the other captaines, said, This worthie gentleman, whatsoeuer he be, is worthie of eternall commendation, and to be most honourably buried by the whole armie. As the rest of the captaines were with like compassion approving his speech, the dead bodie of the vnfortunat sonne rescued, was presented to the most miserable father; which caused all them that were there present to shed teares: but such a suddaine and inward greefe surprised the aged father, and stricke so to his heart, that after he had stood a while speechlesse, with his eyes set in his head, he suddenly fell downe dead. From that time the Generall commaunded, That no man should vpon paine of death go out of the armie to skirmish with the enemy without leaue, wherein he was so seuer, that he hanged vp one or two which presumed to transgresse his commaundement: which thing much discouraged his own men, and so encouraged the enemy, that they would sometime braue the Christians vpon the top of their owne trenches.

Many dayes had now passed since the coming of the Bassa, the Turkes and they of Buda daily encreasing both in strength and courage: when on the other side, faint courage, weak strength, troubled counsell, vncertain resolution, the ominous signs of an vndoubted ouerthrow, were easie to be seene; and hope it selfe, the stay of all human actions, especially of martiall affairs, almost lost: the onely things that held their fainting hearts, was the often letters from king Ferdinand, and the firme opinion they had conceived, That Charles the emperor would not in so great a danger faile to aid his brother, both with men and mony: and last of all, the firme resolution of the Generall, which farre passed all reason, the sooner to draw him to his end. The armies lying in this order, the Turkes from the higher ground, and out of Capellia, perceiuing the Germanes in the little island as carelesse men to keepe but negligent watch, agreed amongst themselves at one instant out of both their camps, to assaile diuers of their forts: and so in the breake of the day landed with their fleet so closely and suddenly to the Island, that they had slaine almost six hundred of the Germanes, before they were thorowly awake or could well arme themselves: wherewith the rest were put in such a feare, that they fled to the campe in such hast, that many of them fell beside the bridge and were drowned in the river. All the campe was wonderfully troubled with the suddenesse of the matter, the Turks with their hideous cries raising

The Turks suddenly assaile the Christians in the Island.

A sing the alarm in diuers places at once: yet for all that, certaine German companies in one of the forts nearest vnto the river, and the souldiers in the fleet, well declared their present resolution and valiant courage, in recouering againe of the island. For Herbessulfus the campe-matter, persuading them not to suffer the Christian ensignes and great ordinance to be so shamefully carried away of the Turkes; and Marius the Admirall at the same time landing diuers companies in the island with his pinnaces and great boats: they so contrariouly charged the Turks, then busied in the spoiling of the dead bodies and drawing away of the great ordinance, that they draue them againe to their boats, leauing vnto them as victors, both the island and the ordinance, hauing before their departure, receiued no lesse losse themselves than had the Germanes before.

B It was reported; that the Turkes fleet might that day haue bene quite ouerthrowne, if the Christians vying the victorie, and holpen with the course of that swift river, had contrariouly pursued them and landed with them: But many things after a manner is done are easily seene, which in the verie heat and hurle of the danger cannot well be foreseene; for as much as suddain accidents attended with great perill doe oftentimes hazle the minds of right wise and valiant captaines: yet sourse of the Turks pinnaces were suncke and threewaken, and many of the Turkes slaine or drowned in the river. Shortly after, the Turks more and more encouraged with the multitude of themselves, and the fearefulnesse they perceiued in their enemies, did at sundrie times so insolently trouble and assaile the campe of the Christians on euery side, that they left them almost no time of rest, one company still succeeding another: so that they were almost in C despaire, to be able long to defend their campe, the enemy still growing both in strength and courage. For the Bassa that lay at Buda still taking vnto him the sicke and wounded souldiers, sent continually fresh men in their steed: and Valentinus taking vnto him a companie of the Turks Janizaries harquebusiers, had downe Perenus with the Hungarian horsemen out of the upper campe. So that they in the nether campe were now hardly beset with their enemies on euery side: yet were they well holpen by the great artillerie from Pesth, which much troubled Valentinus and his horsemen in assailing the campe on that side.

Some report that Valentinus, not greatly angrie with the Hungarian banished men, but with the Germans, did by the way of priuat courtesie and friendship, by a faithfull souldior with Perenus speedily to prouide for the safetie of himselfe and the Hungarians with him; for that there D was a great beast comming, which would at one morrell deuoure them all. For Solyman aduertised of the doings of the emperor and king Ferdinand, thinking that they would haue come downe to Buda with a puissant armie, was resolved to be present himselfe at so notable a battell, and was therefore comming thither with his armie in all hast: VVherefore Perenus thus forewarned, said plainly to Rogendorff and the other captaines, That except they would presently rise with the armie and depart, he would now whiles he had yet time, make shift for himselfe and his countrey men. Their opinions diuersly deliuered, at last they all agreed that it was best the next night to passe ouer the river to Pesth: only the Generall vpon a fatall obstinacie said, He would not without king Ferdinands commaundement depart from Buda: and therefore sent countie Salma with a swift pinnace vpon the river to Viana to know his pleasure therein. In the E meane time vrged with feare, Perenus fretting at their long stay, it was resolved vpon, that they should the next night after the Moone was downe, passe ouer the river in foure conuoyes to Pesth: In the first, were to passe ouer the Hungarians, with the great ordinance: in the second, the German and the Bohemian horsemen: and in the other two, the footmen and the baggage of the armie. For it was not so easie a matter to make a bridge ouer Danubius, as they had at first supposed: for after they had begun it, and almost planked it, there rose such a wind and tempest, and the violent river became so rough, that the timber wherewith the bridge was fastened together was broken, the joints vnloosed, and many of the boats whereof the bridge was framed, their cables being broken, were carried away with the force of the streame. The first and second conuoy fortune so well fauoured, that they passed well ouer: for although they of Buda and F the Turks, seeing in the day time from their high places the fleet drawing together into one place, might haue some suspition of the matter, some guessing one thing and some another; yet could they foresee nothing of the sudden departure of the enemy: But that multitude of ships and boats now passing too and fro, could not long deceiue the attentue and vigilant enemy; and so much the lesse, for that two fugitiue Hungarians euen then discovered vnto the bishop, the flight of the Germans; who presently certified the Bassa and the other Mahometes thereof, which without farther delay came almost with all their power to assault the Christians in their camp: the great ordinance was brought forth, and after the Janizaries & other footmen followed the horsemen, dismounted from their horses to do the better service; who all with a horrible cry assailed the trenches. Then began the Germans to quail, their flight being now discovered; yet did they with the Bohemians for a while notably resist the enemy. All the campe was filled with tumult and confusion, and especially at the river side, every man in that great feare striving to get aboard, without regard of order or shame: for the dead time of the night then covered with darke and thicke clouds, made all things more terrible; even unto them which were of best courage: the authoritie of Rogendorff the Generall (in the darknesse of the night, and for great da- mour both of his owne people and of the enemy, and the thundring of the ordinance) was no- thing: He (besides that he was then sicke in mind) lay in his bed wounded, by a wonderfull and fatal chance: for as he was writing letters to the king, a faulcon shot out of the enemies campe falling in his tent, and striking in sunder a chest which stood there, wounded him grievously in the left shoulder with a splinter of the same. The other captaines of the footmen, enuying that the horsemen were so well escaped, stood as men more carefull of themselves than of the com- mon danger, faintly resisting the enemy. The uppermost tents wherein Perenus lay, were first taken by Mahometes of BELGRADE, and Valentinus; and the German footmen chased all over S. Gerrards mount. They of BUDA also sallied out, and entered the campe on that side which was next unto the citie, and with wild fire burnt the tents a little before forsaken by the Germans. And the bishop at the same time caused a great steeke of straw standing by the kings stables neere unto the rivers side, to be set on fire; which gave such a light, that a man might have seene all over Danubius unto the wals of Pesth, as if it had been light day: whereby the great confu- sion of the Christian armie by land, as well as the shamefull flight by water, was of the Turkes plainly discovered. Then was the great artillerie from every place discharged vpon the flying fleet, as well from BUDA as the Turkes campe. And to encrease the feare, Caslon the Turkes Ad- mirall rowing with his light boats against the streame, set vpon the ships crossing the river to Pesth, where he tooke certaine boats loded with souldiours, and with his great ordinance sunk diuers others: so that the river was filled with dead bodies, and the miserable companie of soul- diours and mariners labouring to save their liues by swimming: for at such time as the Janizaries hauing slaine the first companies, were broken into the lower campe; and the rest of the Ger- mans flying ouer the bridge into the little island, were there slaine without mercie; by the Turkes pursuing them, many of them leapt into the river, and there perished. Three hundred saile of one sort of ships and other, were so confused and mingled together, that Danubius seemed that night to haue bene covered ouer, as if it had bene with a great bridge. But the Christian fleet seeing all lost, cleered themselves so soone as they could of the Turkes; and so bearing them backe with their great ordinance out of the pouples of their ships, got vp the river to COMARA. The rest of the land forces endured the same fortune in the campe, of whom the Bohemians died most honourably, slaine by the enemy in fight. Many falling into the hands of them of BUDA were saued, or slaine, as was their fortune to fall into the power of a mercifull or mercilesse man. But the sunne rising, plainly discovered the slaughter of the Christians and the victorie of the Turkes, not so well before knowne. There was about 3000 men of one sort and other, who in warlike manner had taken a little hill by Saint Gerrards church, and there stood vpon their guard, vntill such time as more than two thousand of them were slaine; the rest casting away their weapons yeeled in hope of life, and were referred for a spectacle more grievous than death it selfe.

At the same time Caslon with his victorious fleet comming to the shoare of Pesth, brought such a feare vpon them that were escaped thither, and might easily haue defended the wals (only with the cry of his souldiours and the thundring of the artillerie) that the horsemen for haile to get out, were like to ouerrun one another. The Germans had at that time so much forgot their wonted valour, and so trembled at the name of the Turkes, that as soone as they saw their white caps in their ships, they ran away as men dismayed, vnarmed, leauing behind them their place, their carriages, and whatsoever good thing they had elfe. Yet some of the Hungarian horsemen, more desirous of the spoile than afraid of death, staid behind rifling the merchants shops: for Pesth was become a notable rich matt towne for all kind of merchandise, merchants resorting thither

Turkish crueltie

Solyman sendeth
for the young king
into the campe.

A thither from all other places of the troubled country, as to a strong and commodious citie, and of more safetie than the rest: But Caslon now entering without resistance, slew some of those greedy Hungarians; and ran thorow the towne with such barbarous crueltie and thirst of the Christian blood, that he spared neither man, woman, nor child; except some few such as either for their beautie or strength of bodie were reserved for the Turkes beastly lust or slavish laboure: so that in this warre it is reported, more than twentie thousand Christians were one way and other by diuers chances slaine. There was taken at Pesth in the campe, and in the island, six and thirtie great peeces for batterie, of wonderfull beautie; and of lesser field peeces a hundred and fiftie. As for shot, powder, armour, weapons, and victuall provided for Winter, such store was found, that the Turkes accounted it for the greatest part of their victorie. Rogendorff the vnfortu- nat Generall, at such time as the Turkes hauing woon the trenches were fighting in the midst of the campe, desiring rather to be slaine in his tent, than to liue after so great an ouerthrow, was against his will by strong hand carried about a little pinnace by his physition and chamberlaine to COMARA: where he shortly after, partly for the painefulnesse of his wound, but more for greefe of mind, died in a little country village called SAMARIVM, leauing unto the Germans a wofull remembrance of his accursed obstinacie and pride. Solyman still doubting the comming of Charles the emperour and king Ferdinand to BUDA, was comming with his armie from HABRIANOPLA in such hast, that he caused the Janizaries his best footmen, contrary to their man- ner, to march as fast as his horsemen: but vnderstanding by the way of the late victorie obtained by his captaines, he tooke more leisure, and came with a great power to BUDA in August, and there encamped on the other side of the citie, to auoid the noisome sauer of the dead bodies, which lay yet vnburied. Where calling vnto him the other armie, and making one huge campe of both, he highly commended all his captaines, but especially the two Mahometes. And vnder- standing that the victorie was especially gotten by the meanes of Mahometes gouernor of BELGRADE, he made him generall of all his European horsemen; one of the most honourable pre- ferments of the Turkish empire: the other captaines he rewarded according as they had deser- ued, and withall augmented their pay.

After that, he caused the prisoners, in number about eight hundred, to be brought out: who bound in long ropes, were in derision led all alongst the armie, ranged in order of battell, and af- terward by his commaundement slaine by his young souldiours: saying with seuerie contumacie, that they were worthe of such death, which by embassadours dissemblingly entreating of peace, had in the meane time craftily waged warre. Amongst these prisoners was one souldior of BEL- VARIA, of an exceeding high stature, him in despite of the Germane nation he deliuered to a little dwarfe (whom his sonnes made great account of) to be slaine; whose head was scarce so high as the knees of the tall captiue; with that cruell despite to aggravate the indignitie of his death: when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the legs a long time by that apish dwarfe with his little scimitar, as if it had bene in disport, fell downe, and was with many feeble blowes hardly at last slaine by that wretch, still heartened on by others, to satisfie the eyes of the princes, beholding it as their disport.

This barbarous and cruell execution done, Solyman sent his embassadours with presents to the young king, which were three beautifull horses, with their bridles of gold, and their trappings richly set with pretious stones, and three royall robes of cloth of gold, and vnto the cheefe of the nobilitie he sent rich gownes and chaines of gold. The embassadours which brought these pre- sents, in courteous manner requested of the queene to send the young king her sonne, attended with his nobilitie, into the campe, and without all feare to hope that all should goe well both with her and her sonne: for that Solyman, who exceeded all other kings, not in power and fortu- tune onely, but in vertue and vpright dealing also, was of such an hericall disposition, that he would not onely defend the child, whom in the right of his father he had once thought worthe his protection and fauour; victorie confirming the same, but would also augment his estate, with the largest bounds of his auncient kingdome: Wherefore he was desirous to see the young king, and to behold in him the representation of his father, and with his owne hand to deliuer him to be imbraced of his sonnes; that of his protection renewed, so happily begun, might be grounded a firme and perpetuall friendship with the Orthoman kings: and that he would alwayes account of her as of his daughter. But the cause why he came not to see her, which he did in courtiesed fire, fire, was, for that by auntient custome the Othoman kings were forbidden that point of courtie, to visit other mens wiues in their houses. Besides that, Solyman (they said) was not so forgetfull of his modestie and honour, as to receiue into his pauillion the daughter of a king his friend and allie, and she the late wife of a king his friend and tributarie, and the faire young mother of a son, growing in the hope of like regall dignitie; for feare he should draw into any suspition the inuoluate name of her chastitie, which in queenes was to be guarded with an especiall and wonderfull care. Whereto the queene (a manifest feare confounding the tender fences in her motherly affection) answered very doubtfully: but the bishop perswading her, and instantly requesting her not to giue the Turks occasion to suspect that she had them in distrust, by her little and vnprofitable delay, sent her young sonne in princely swathing clothes, in a rich chariot, with his nurse and certaine great ladies in the campe, attended vpon with almost all the nobilitie to whom Solyman had sent presents. In his comming to the campe, he was for honours sake met vpon the way by certaine gallant troupes of the Turkes braue horsemen: and all the way as he passed in the campe, orderly stood the Ianizaries of Solymans guard. As soone as he was brought into the pauillion, Solyman courtteously looked vpon him, and familiarly talked with the nurse, and commaunded his sonnes there present to take him in their armes, and to kisse him, in certaine token of the loue they would beare him, whom they were in time to haue their friend and tributarie, when he was growne to mans estate: these were Selymus and Bataçet, begotten of his faire concubine Roxalana, bearing the names the one of his grandfather, the other of his great grandfather. As for Mustapha his eldest sonne by his Circassian wife, he then liued in MAGNISTIA, a great way off: who though he was a prince of so great hope, as neuer any of the Turkish kings had a sonne of greater, and was therefore exceedingly beloued of the men of warre; yet was he not so well liked of his father, brought out of fauour with him by Roxalana, as if he had traitreously gone about to take the empire from him, yet liuing, as did Selymus his grandfather from Bataçet: for which cause Solyman secretly purposed to take him away, as afterwards he did, and to appoint Selymus for his successor, as hereafter shall appeare.

But Solyman, at such time as the noblemen of HUNGARIE were dining merrily with the Bassaes, had commaunded certaine companies (to whom he had before giuen instructions what he would haue done) vnder the colour of seeing the citie, to take one of the gates called SARATINA, and the cheefe streets: which was done so quietly and cunningly, that a warie watchman standing there, and beholding the manner of the Turkes comming and going too and fro, could hardly haue perceiued how the gate was taken, vntill it was too late. For many of the Turkes walking faire and softly by great companies into the citie, as if it had bene but for pleasure, to haue scene it: and other some to colour the matter, walking likewise backe againe, as if they had sufficiently viewed the citie; by that meanes they without any tumult or stirre quickly tooke the appointed gate, with the market place and cheefe streets of the citie. Which so finely done, the captaine of the Ianizaries caused proclamation to be made in all parts of the citie: That the citifens should without feare keepe themselves within their houses, and forthwith as they would haue their liues, libertie, and goods saued, to deliuer all their weapons: which they seeing no remedie, did: and hauing deliuered their armes, and taken the Turkes faith for their securitie, they receiued them into their houses, as their vnwelcome guests. But such was the quietnesse and modestie of the Turkes, by reason of the severitie of their martiall discipline, that no citizen which tooke them into their houses, was by them wronged by word or deed. Solyman vnderstanding that the citie was thus quietly and without resistance taken, sent the child backe againe vnto the queene, although it was now almost night; but the cheefe noblemen he retained still with him: these was George the bishop and treasurer, Petrus Vioche the young kings high kinsman, and one of his tutors, Valentinus Turacrus Generall of the queenes forces, Stephanus Verbetius chancelor, and Bacianus Urbanus gouernour of the citie of BUDA. This sudden and vnexpected change exceedingly troubled all their minds, and so much the more, for that the great Bassaes with changed countenances began to picke quarrels with them, and as it were, straightly and impudently to examine them, and to call them to account for all that they had done. The queene seeing the citie so craftily surprisid, and the nobilitie injuriously detained in the campe, troubled with feare and greefe, by humble letters requested Solyman not to forget the faith he had long before giuen vnto her, and euen of late confirmed by his embassadours; but mindfull both thereof and of his wonted clemencie, to send backe vnto her the noblemen, who for their fidelitie and valiant ser-

A vice had well deserued both of him and her: this she did by Rustemes Bassa, whom she had loded with gifts, and amongst other things of great price had sent him a faire coronet of her owne of orient pearle, and a goodly jewell set with rich stone to send vnto his wife (Solymans daughter) for a present.

After that, Solyman consulted with his Bassaes foure dayes what order to take concerning the kingdom of HUNGARIE. In discoutse whereof his great Bassaes were of diuers opinions, Mahometes aduised him to carrie away with him to CONSTANTINOPLE both the child and all the nobilitie, and to leaue such a gouernour in BUDA, as by his wife and moderat gouernment, rather than by rigour, might put the people out of feare of seruitude and bondage, by defending them from wrong, and yet by little & little lay vpon them the yoke of the Turkish gouernment. But Rustemes Bassa (before corrupted, and a man in greater fauour than the rest, because he was Solymans sonne in law, and therefore farther from all suspition of flatterie) stood altogether vpon tearmes of honour, saying, That nothing could be more dishonorable vnto so great and mightie a monarch, who neuer had at any time with any spot or staine blemished the glorie of his name, than after victorie against all right and reason to breake his faith at once with a weake woman and sillie infant, whom he had before taken vpon him, to protect and defend. On the other side, Mahometes gouernour of BELGRADE (an old mortall enemy of the Christians, of all the rest best acquainted with the state of HUNGARIE, and for his great experience and approved valour then extraordinarily admitted by Solyman into counsell amongst the great Bassaes) disliked of both the former opinions, as too full of lenitie: and being asked his owne, deliuered it in mischievous manner as followeth.

I know (said he) most mightie Solyman, that he which in consultation of matters of so great consequence is to deliuer his opinion last, shall if he discent from the rest, be subiect to enuie and reprehension. And therefore it cannot be, but that I being of a quite contrarie opinion to them that haue before spoken, my speech must also be vnto your eares both vnpleasant and tedious. But I refuse not to be counted by my selfe, yea and presumptuous, if you will so haue it, rather than a smoother up of other mens sayings, as one of no iudgement; whilst I recount those things, which as the present case standeth, may wonderfully profit your designes & the imperiall state: for of right I may desire you to yeeld a little to my yeares, and (if I may by your good fauour so say) to that I haue already done: when as I now growne an old man in warres against these Hungarians, haue by experience learned those things of the state and strength of this kingdom, and the disposition of the people; which being here laid downe, may much auail for your better determination of this so waightie a cause as amitteth no repentance, if you shall now be ouerseene therein. You haue now within the space of these twentie yeares come in armes your selfe in person five times into this countrey, when I as no obscure captaine or souldior, was in all those warres and battels euer present, of purpose as I suppose to reuenge your iniuries, to enlarge your empire, and in breefe to assure you of a good peace, which could neuer be but by force of armes and victorie. And therefore you valiantly woon BELGRADE, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of most outrageous theues and robbers, and in former time famous for the vnfortunate attempts of your auncestors: when as from thence the Hungarians in time of peace had at their pleasure, whilst your father was then occupied in the Persian warre, spoiled the borders of SERVIA and ILLYRIA. The same Hungarians about five yeares after, for that they had in cruell manner slaine your embassadours, you ouerthrew in battell, and slew their king: and possessed of BUDA, to manifest and make knowne by a notable demonstration the magnificence of your heroicall mind, euen vnto the remotest enemies of our name, did chuse out of the reliques of that vanquished nation, one whom you might grace with the honour of the regall crowne; although not borne of royall blood, or vnto you knowne for any other desert, than that he was a little before both your priuat and publike enemy, and coming against you with a strong power out of TRANSILVANIA, he had in the meane time lost his brother, a better man than himselfe, slaine with our sword. After that, rise up the Austrian king, a new enemy, to expulse this Hungarian, reigning by your courtiesse, & so you tooke in hand the third warre against the Germanes, which you so effectually prosecuted, that hauing forthwith restored the king, you carried the terror of your selfe not onely to the wals of VIENNA, but into the very heart of GERMANIE. But two yeares yet scarcely past, the same king (neuer long contented with peace or warres) supported by the power of his brother Charles, and in vaine besieging BUDA, defended by your garrisons, stirred you up againe to reuenge the iniurie, slaughter, and spoile by his sonliuous fire, was, for that by auncient custome the Othoman kings were forbidden that point of courtisie, to visit other mens wiues in their houses. Besides that, Solyman (they said) was not so forgetfull of his modestie and honour, as to receiue into his paullion the daughter of a king his friend and allie, and the late wife of a king his friend and tributarie, and the faire young mother of a son, growing in the hope of like regall dignitie; for feare he should draw into any suspicion the inuoluntarie name of her chastitie, which in queenes was to be guarded with an especiall and wonderfull care. Whereunto the queene (a manifest feare confounding the tender fences in her motherly affection) answered very doubtfully: but the bishop perswading her, and instantly requesting her not to giue the Turkes occasion to suspect that she had them in distrust, by her litte and vnprofitable delay, sent her young sonne in princely swathing clothes, in a rich chariot, with his nurse and certaine great ladies in the campe, attended vpon with almost all the nobilitie to whom Solyman had sent presents. In his comming to the campe, he was for honours sake met vpon the way by certaine gallant troupes of the Turkes braue horsemen: and all the way as he passed in the campe, orderly stood the Janizaries of Solymans guard. As soone as he was brought into the paullion, Solyman courteously looked vpon him, and familiarly talked with the nurse, and commended his sonnes there present to take him in their armes, and to kisse him, in certaine token of the loue they would beare him, whom they were in time to haue their friend and tributarie, when he was growne to mans estate: these were Selymus and Baiazer, begotten of his faire concubine Roxalana, bearing the names the one of his grandfather, the other of his great grandfathers. The Oracion of Mahometes of Belgrade to Solyman, concerning the disposing of the kingdome of Hungarie.

done: for that you thought it to stand with your honour to protect him with your power, whom you had G of your rare bountie made a king, and then desired above all things to fight a noble battell with the two brethren for the empire of the west. But they at such time as you with fire and sword ran thorow their auntient kingdomes, endured not the noise of your comming. After that ensued a peace between the Hungarian and the Germane, your Maiestie permitting and approouing it; at such time as you made hast to goe against the Persians: but the Germane king so broke that peace that had not in good time reneged his trecherie by the ouerthrow of a great armie of his at EZEK, you must of necessitie haue beene sent for from BABILON your selfe, as but now you were glad to come in hast by long and painfull iournies from CONSTANTINOPLE, to aid us in time, and as I verely hope, to make an end for all; that all things set in firme order in HUNGARIE, the inconueniences of so many labours and so great charge, siue times undertaken for another mans profit, might now at length take end: except H (as I see some wish) you be in mind neuer to giue ouer the protection of the child & widow a matter full of infinit labor & perill, not to be counteruailed with that glorious shew of honor, which by these (in my opinion) too too wisemen is pretended to your haughtie mind, euer desirous of honor and fame. But I as a blunt man vnderstand not this high point of wisdome, abounding with glorie, which in the very course thereof cutteth in funder the sinewes of victorie, and is neuer by politticke Generals admitted into their campes. In which doing, as I wish you more fortunat than your auncestours, who haue united eightene kingdomes to this your empire, so would I not haue you more wise than they: for what can be a more unwise part, than alwayes to play the unwise man? that is to say, alwayes to be carefull of other mens affaires, and in meane time oftentimes to endanger his owne estate, his health, his wealth, his honour. You haue satisfied (and that in my opinion) plentifully the duties both of charitie, fidelitie, and if it must needs be so, of honour and glorie also; if it be to be gotten rather by cour-tesie, clemencie, and lenitie, than by the inuincible strength of wise policie, and the constant resolution of a martiall mind: for by these instruments, and none other, hath worthie vertue alwayes promoted and supported the Othoman kings. Wherefore let those vaine shewes (as seemeth vnto me) of counterfeite honour delight the minds of idle and slouthfull kings: assuredly, they neuer pleased your armed auncestors, but after the enimie was quite ouerthrowne, the triumph made, and the trophies of victorie erected. But let this be as best pleaseth your high wisdome and iudgement, whereunto the greatest wits giue place. Truly I (if I well foresee the chances of war, and the assured events of things) will not follow that manner of counsell which the pleasure of my mind perswadeth me vnto; when as necessitie, which ruleth all things, presently forceth me and sheweth me a farre better K course. The Hungarians about all other things notably warne vs not to trust them, who infamous for their unconstancie, often reuolt, and trecherie, are still at variance amongst themselves; and their banished men are continually setting on the Germanes to inuade the countrey; and the weake power of the queene and the child is not such as may withstand so neere and so mightie an enimie: so that another mans kingdome must of necessitie be defended by our helpe, which may not be lesse than a strong armie, without our great perill. To be breefe, euery yeere to take in hand so long an expedition of so great labour and tranell, with an armie furnished with horsemen, footmen, artillerie and a fleet of ships for defence of another man, as commonly we doe, seemeth to me meere madnesse: Neither doe I thinke it to stand with the maiestie of the Othoman emperours, thus to be mooued euery yeare at the request of a puling woman, crying for helpe: except you thinke it more profitable and honorable to maintaine a defenseue than an inuasive warre. Wherefore (in my opinion) it is best to turne this kingdome (so often conquered and defended by law of Armes) after the manner of your auncestors, into the forme of a Prouince: the queene I would haue sent to her father, and the boy her some brought up in your Court at CONSTANTINOPLE, and there instructed in our religion: the mobilitie of the countrey I wish to be laine, and their castles rased; and the notable families which haue the brauest minds, to be carried away out of all parts of the countrey into ASIA: as for the base multitude, I would haue kept vnder with good garrisons, to till the ground, and inhabit the cities. By this onely meanes (mightie Solyman) shall both the Hungarians perceiue themselves conquered; and the Germanes glad to forbeare comming into HUNGARIE, vnlesse they will rashly and unfortunately haue both STYRIA and AVSTRIA.

As I thinke counsell.

Solyman entred Buda the 30 of August 1541, and there first sacrificed after the Mahometane manner.

But Solyman thinking it good to doe sacrifice before he would resolutely determine of so great a matter, entred into BUDA with his two sons, Selymus and Baiazet, the thirtieth day of August in the yeare 1541: and there in the Cathedrall church dedicated to the virgin Marie (being before

A before by his priests purified after the manner of their superstition) sacrificed the first Mahome-tane sacrifice in BUDA. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great counsellors, prouided out of them all, both for his owne securitie and honour, and published a decree the fatall doome of that flourishing kingdome, where vnder it yet groweth at this day: That BUDA should from that day be kept with a garrison of Turks, and the kingdome conuerted into a prouince of the Turkish empire; and that the queene with her young sonne should presently depart the citie, and liue in LIPPA in a fertile and quiet countrey, beyond the riuer of Tibiscus; which something to comfort her, was neere vnto the borders of her father Sigismund his kingdome, to be safely conducted thither with all his wealth and jewells by his Janizaries: VV here fore the queene and her sonne according to this decree, with teares and mourning, detesting in-B her heart the tyrants perfidious dealing (which necessitie enforced her then to dissemble) departed from BUDA, constrained by the Turkes to leaue behind her all the ordinance in the castle and citie, with all other the warlike prouision & store of victuall: The noblemen went with her also, who although they went sorrowfull for this wofull and vnexpected change of things, yet were they verie glad of their libertie and safetie, whereof they had for the space of three daies despaired. Only Valentinus was kept in safe custodie in the campe, because he was a martiall man, of greatest power amongst the Hungarians; and besides that, much hated of the Turkes for the hard pursuit of Cason, and his hoisemen, slaine at STORAMBERG in AVSTRIA. Thus the roiall citie of BUDA fell into the possession of the Turkes, whereupon not long after ensued the finall ruine of that great kingdome, sometime the strong bulwarke of Christendome, but lost to the C great weakening of the Christian common-weale; which may justly be imputed to the pride, ambition, and discension of the Hungarians amongst themselves, and the calling in of the common enemie: the due consideration of whose onely comming, might well haue sufficed to haue set them agreed.

Whilest these things were doing at BUDA, king Ferdinand expecting the euent of this war at VIENNA, and hearing of the shamefull ouerthrow of his armie, and that the Generall deadly wounded was fled to COMANA, and that Solyman (same encreasing the euill newes) was com-ming towards VIENNA; sent Leonardus Velsius (who neuer liked of the siege of BUDA) to COM-MANA to stay the further flight of the souldiours, and to gather together so well as hee could the dispersed reliques of the scattered armie, and to comfort againe the discouraged men with the D hope of new supplies, & of a pay. And somewhat to stay Solyman, who as it was thought would suddenly come to VIENNA, he sent countie Salma and Sigismund Lithestaine, a noble and graue counsellor, his embassadours, with presents and new conditions of peace to Solyman. The presents was a high standing cup of gold after the German fashion, curiously set with rich stones; and a wonderfull globe of siluer of most rare and curious deuise, daily expressing the hourelly passing of the time, the motions of the planets, the change and full of the moone, the motion of the superiour orbes, euery mouing by certaine wheeles, and waights curiously conuained within the same, and exactly keeping due time and motion; liuely expressing the wonderfull motions and conuerfions of the celestiall frame. A most curious and strange piece of worke, deuised and perfected by the most cunning Astronomers for Maximilian the emperour, whose noble mind ne-E uer spared for any cost to obtaine things of rare and strange deuise. These embassadours passing downe the riuer of Danubius, were at their landing, first receiued by Cason the Admirall of So-lymans fleet, and by him brought into a rich tent the ground vnder their feet being all couered with rich carpets: to whom Rustan Bassa sent such good cheere as the campe afforded, but especially most excellent wine, no lesse forbidden the Turkes by their law; than desired of the Germans. The next day after, the great Bassa feasted the embassadours, Solyman himselfe dining not farre off in his pavilion: at which feast the Bassaes for the more courtisie, dined with the embassadours, not sitting with their legs gathered vnder them flat vpon the ground, as their manner was, but sitting in chaires at a high table, after the manner of the Christians: only Mahomet, Gouvernour of BELGRADE, for his age and valour an extraordinarie guest, sat downe vpon F a cushion beneath the Bassaes. Their cheere was onely rice and mutton, and that so plainly and sparingly dressed, as if they had thereby noted our gourmandise and excess; who measure not our cheere by that which nature requireth, but that which greedie appetite desireth; as if their confited the greatest nobilitie: And the drinke for the great Bassaes themselves, right calle to be had, was faire water out of the riuer Danubius. After dinner the embassadours were brought brought in vnto Solyman, each of them lead betwixt two Bassaes holding them fast by the armes, G as if it had been for honour sake; and so brought to kisse his hand. For the Turkes suffer no stranger otherwise to come vnto the presence of their superstitious emperours, but first they search him that he haue no weapon about him, and so clasping him by the armes vnder the colour of doing him honour, dissemblingly bereaue him of the vse of his hands, least he should offer him any violence: yet hath he alwaies as he sitteth in his thronelieing at hand readie by him, a target, a scimiter, an yron mace, with bow and arrowes. The great globe was also brought in by twelue of the embassadours seruants, which with the strangenesse thereof filled the mind of Solyman, and the eyes of his Bassaes with admiration: for Solyman was of so sharpe a wit, that he was not learned onely in such books as contained the lawes and rites of the Mahometane superstition, but had also curiously studied Astronomie, and especially Cosmographie; in which profitable and pleasant studies, he much recreated himselfe as his leisure serued. The embassadours desired, that he would giue the kingdome of HUNGARIE to king Ferdinand, almost vpon the same conditions that Lascus had before required it for him at CONSTANTINOPLE, paying him such yearly tribute as king John had vsually paid, and promising farther to draw Charles the emperour his brother into the same league: so that Solyman deliuered of all feare that way, might at his pleasure turne his forces vpon the Persian, which it was thought he most desired. Besides that, they said he should deale neither honorably nor indifferently, if he should present the young child before king Ferdinand, who beside his auncient right vnto that kingdome (which they were not now to vrge, as oppressed by his happy victories, but might in time be requied) had also a late interest by a league betwixt him and king John, wherein he had expressly covenanted by the soleme consent of the greatest part of his nobilitie, that king Ferdinand should succeed him in the kingdome. Wherby they excused him of the late warre, as iustly taken in hand against the queene and her sonne vsurping vpon his right; which king John knowing to be good, and moued with conscience, had by his soleme act acknowledged, though to the great offence and prejudice of Solyman his setter vp and defender, as also to the touching of himselfe in honour, to haue so vnthankfully and fraudulently dealt with his patron, to whom hee was by the oath of obedience bound. Wherfore they requested; That sith he being a prince of all others most mightie and magnificent, standing vpon his vpriight dealing both in peace and warre, had so lightly regarded the sic dealing of so ingratefull a man: he would rather accept of king Ferdinand so many waies injured, as his friend and tributarie, than to haue him his perpetual enemy. Concluding, that nothing could be vnto him for the good report of his iustice more commendable, or for the assurance of a perpetuall peace more profitable, or to the immortal praise of his bountie more honourable, than to call a king of a most auncient dissent, famous for his vertue and fidelitie, chosen for a king by the Bohemians, desired for a king by the Hungarians, emperour elect of the Roman empire by the Germans, and the naturall brother of the great emperour, his tributarie king of HUNGARIE. Solyman with cheerefull countenance accepting and commending of the presents, answered them two daies after by Rustan the Bassa his sonne in law, that this was his resolute condition of peace and friendship: If king Ferdinand would forthwith restore all the cities towns & castles which were before belonging to K. Lewis, and for euer after abstaine from HUNGARIE: and whereas he had bene so often prouoked by him to warre, and had therein bestowed to great charges, and taken so much trauell, he could for that be content with an easie paine (which should be for his greater honour) to impose an easie tribute vpon AVSTRIA: vpon which conditions he was content to enter into league with them: but if so be that those conditions seemed vnto them too heauie, and that they would rather make choise of warre than peace, hee would bring to passe by continuall warre, that such things as they had taken from the kingdome of HUNGARIE, should be required with the destruction of AVSTRIA. But the embassadours, although they were much moued at the proud demand of tribute for AVSTRIA, as that wherein the two brethren of mightie power, Charles the emperour and king Ferdinand were disdainfully abused: to keepe the best course of their negotiation, and to win some time in so hard estate of things; required a truce, vntill such time as king Ferdinand and the emperour his brother might be made acquainted with the matter. Which their request (the Turke perceiuing their drift and purpose) would in no case grant, for Winter was now fast comming on. It was lawfull for the embassadours, all the time they were in the Turkes campe, to view euerie part thereof; Rustan Bassa conducting them from place to place: where

A where about all things, they most wondred at the perpetuall and dumbe silence of so great a multitude, the fouldiours being so readie and attentiu, that they were no otherwise commanded but by the beckning of the hand, or a nod of their commanders: They manieled also at the exquisite order and sweetnesse of the Turkes campe, finding therein nothing disordered or noisome; so that it seemed not the campe of such a rude and barbarous nation, but rather of them which were the authors of martiall discipline. The embassadours being rewarded and so sent away, Solyman commanded the old Gouvernour of BELGRADE to spoile the borders of AVSTRIA all alongt Danubius: Cason also Generall of the voluntarie horsemen, he sent into MORAVIA for like purpose; who neither of them did any great harme, by reason of the sudden rising of the great riuers, with the abundance of raine then falling in Autumne. After that, Solyman appointed one Solyman an Hungarian (who taken prisoner in his youth by the Turkes, had from that time followed the Mahometane superstition) gouernour of BYDIA: who by the vpriight administration of justice, and courteous vsing of the people, with Verbetius the old chancellor, should doe what was possible to put the people in hope of long peace and tranquillitie. Which things done, after he had staied about twentie daies at BYDIA, hee determined to retorne againe into THRACIA, because the raine of Autumne, and the cold of Winter, was now come in: and was also in doubt to be shut in with the rising of the great riuers, wherewith the countrey of HUNGARIE is in euerie place so watered, and on euerie side so compassed; that it is a hard matter to passe. By the way he set Lascus king Ferdinand embassadour againe at libertie, whom he had left in prison at BELGRADE: but he long enjoyed not that benefit, for shortly after returning into POLONIA, he died of the flux; which caused many to suppose, that he was poisoned by the Turkes. A man for his vertue and learning famous, worthe of a longer life, whose death the king himselfe much lamented.

As Solyman was returning into THRACIA, and was come to the riuer Dranus, it was told him, that Stephen Maylat Vayvod of TRANSILVANIA, who tooke king Ferdinand his part, a professed enemy of the Turkes, was taken; by the cunning of Peter of MOLDAVIA, and prince of VALACHIA, and that all the countrey of TRANSILVANIA was well pacified and yeelded to his obedience. Of which newes Solyman was passing glad, for he exceedingly hated Maylat: a martiall man of a froward nature, desirous of rule; and readie vpon any occasion to reuolt; forasmuch as he remembered Gritus his legat, and the Turkes by him slaine; and knew also, that the Transiluanians, an inuincible people, borne to trouble, and more delighting in vncertaine warre than assured peace, was by him stirred vp; whom he wished rather by gentlenesse to appease, than by force of armes and strong hand to subdue: But because we haue oftentimes before made mention of this Maylat, of whose taking Solyman so much rejoyced, it shall not be amisse in few words to declare by what finenesse he fell into the hands of this treacherous and bloudie man, Peter of MOLDAVIA.

This Moldauian by the commaundement of Solyman (as is aforesaid) had joyned his forces with Achomates Gouvernour of NICOPOLIS, against Maylat; which being vnited, were in number fiftie thousand horsemen, beside footmen, which after the manner of those countreies were not many, euerie man almost in the countrey be he neuer so poore, keeping a horse to serue vpon. Maylat beset with the multitude of his enemies, and finding himselfe too weake to encounter them, despairing also of aid from king Ferdinand, whom he knew to be buised in a greater warre; forooke the field, and fled againe into the strong towne of FOARAS, as he had done the yeare before, when he was ouercharged by king John his power: for there as in a most strong place both by nature and fortification, he had laid vp his greatest substance and provision for the wars, but especially the rich spoile he had long before taken from Gritus. Achomates comming thither with his power, and perceiuing the place was not to be battered or taken by force, but with much labour and long time: thought it best, to assay if he could overcome him by craft and deceit: Wherfore he sent a messenger vnto Maylat, to perswade him to yeeld himselfe vnto Solyman, and to make choise rather to be called of him his friend, than to be judged his enemy; of whom he might well hope of all goodnesse, which had giuen whole kingdomes vnto his enemies: promising, that he would vse the vttermost of his credit, which was not small, and labour for him as his friend; that he might seele the fruit of his clemencie and bountie; and still enjoy the gouernment of TRANSILVANIA, paying him some small yearly tribute, as he had before requested: for as much as he could take no course better, being beset with so many enemies, enemies, than to make his peace vpon reasonable conditions, and that with as much speed as were possible: in which doing, besides that he should well prouide for his owne safetie, he should also saue both his wealth and honour; for Solyman was comming (as he said) with his victorious armie, who would with assured death reuenge his vaine hope of holding out the siege, if he should vpon a stubborn and obstinate mind then refuse to obey his commaund. Wherevnto Maylat, who foresaw that it was better for him to make a certaine peace, than to endure an vncertaine warre, answered, That he could be content to conlude a peace, so that it were not vpon any hard conditions; and would not greatly refuse Solymans commaund, which was wont to be both reasonable and just: wherefore vpon sufficient pledges he would come into the campe, in presence to agree vpon the conditions of the peace, and demanded to haue Achomates, his sonne, a valiant young gentleman, deliuered in hostage. Which thing Achomates denied, for that he had (as he said) before giuen him to Solyman, as the manner was, and therefore had ouer him no more power: but he promised for him, that was but one, to giue soute of his best capitaines. Which offer Maylat (misdoubting no deceit) accepted, and with a great and gallant reinue attended vpon, came into the enemies campe, where he was courteously and honourably receiued. But the parley, as it could not be conveniently begun immediately after their first salutation, so could it by no means be then ended, but was deferred vntill the next day: to the intent, that the treacherous Moldauian might take his well acquainted and well knowne guest, whom he had against that time invited to a solemne banquet. By that meanes, the next day about the middelt of dinner, fortune so fauouring the intended treacherie, Maylat who was off proud and cholericke a nature that he could not well brooke the least indignitie, was by occasion of some insolent speech of purpose ministred by the Moldauian guests, put into such a fret, that laying his hand vpon his sword, he in a rage slung from the table: at which time all the other guests starting vp also, laid hands vpon him and tooke him, fuming, and in vaine crying out, that he was shamefully betrayed. His followers were all forthwith stript of all their brauerie by the needie Moldauians, and their horses and armour taken from them. Whilest Maylat was yet furiously exclaiming of this treason, in came Achomates, who to seeme guiltlesse of the matter, with deepe dissimulation sharply reprov'd the false Moldauian, that he had in doing so foule a fact shamefully violated the lawes of hospitalitie, reuerenced of all nations, falsified the faith which he had giuen him for his safetie, and betrayed the liues of such notable captaines as lay in hostage for him. Wherevnto the Moldauian (as if it had been in contempt) scornfully answered, That he had vpon good cause taken Maylat prisoner, and so would in safetie keepe him for Solyman, vnto whom it onely belonged to iudge, whether he had justly or vnjustly detained him.

Transilvania giuen by Solyman to the young king.

Charles the emperor returneth out of Germany to invade Algiers.

Nor long after, the strong towne of Fogaris was deliuered, with the hostages; but whether by feare or by corruption of Maylats lieutenant, is vncertaine. So Valentinus Turaccus, and Maylat, two of the greatest noble men of Hungarie, sufficient of themselves to haue restored the Hungarian kingdome (first rent in sunder with ciuile discord, and afterward with the inuasion of the Turkes) fell into the hands of the enemy, not vanquished in battell, but deceived by treason. The towne being thus surrendred, almost all the countrey of Transilvania, was by Solymans consent deliuered to the young king, vnto whom all the people most willingly submitted themselves, and tooke the oath of obedience, remembering that his father had almost for thirtie yeares space with great iustice and quietnesse governed that prouince; and with manie presents honoured the young king lying in Lippa, with the queene his mother, and his two tutors, the bishop, and Vicche.

At the same time, Charles the emperor at the importunat sute of his subjects of Spain, had prepared a great force both by sea and land for the conquering of Algiers: from whence the Turkish pirats did so infest all that coast of the countrey, from Gades to the mountaines Pirene, that the Spaniards (all trade of merchandise being set apart) were glad to keepe continual watch and ward all alongst that coast for defence of the countrey. Wherefore although he well knew of the comming of the Turkes to Bvda, and how hardly he was by the Lantgraue and others spoken of, for leauing his brother so hardly bestead, to go against a sort of pirats in Affricke; yet persisting in his former determination, he departed out of Germany into Italy, where by the way hee was met by Octauius Farnesius his sonne in law, Alphon-sus Vastius his lieutenant, by the Venetian embassadours, next to Verona, and so brought to Mil-

A MILLAIN, where he was with great solemnitie joyfully receiued of the citizens, and vnder a canopie of gold brought vnto the pallace: he himselfe going in a plaine blacke cloake, and a homely cap in mourning wise; when as the women and vulgar people, vpon a curious simplicitie, expected to haue seene so great an emperour in his royall robes, glistering with gold and pretious stone, and the imperiall crowne vpon his head. His heauie countenance answerable also to his attire was much noted, as presaging the wofull ouerthrow which was the day before receiued at Bvda, but not yet knowne in Italy. From MILLAIN he departed to Genoa, where he was aduertised by letters from his brother king Ferdinand, of the ouerthrow of the Germans, of the victorie of the Turkes, and the comming of Solyman. Vpon which newes, Vastius and Auria, his two chiefe commaunders, the one at land, the other at sea, would haue persuaded him to haue deferred his intended expedition for Africa vntill the next Spring: and with such power as he had already raised in Italy, & brought with him out of Germany, to stay still in Italy, so to make shew vnto the Turkes as if he would haue returned and holper his brother: and in the meane time to assure himselfe of his state in Italy against the French, who (as it was thought) would be readie to take all occasion of aduantage, if any mishap should befall him, either by the force of the enemy, or violence of tempest. But he constant in his former resolution, answered them as they sate in counsell, that they had persuaded him for great reasons to stay in Italy; but that he was for farre greater to passe into Africa: for if he should then stay in Italy, it would be thought, that he was for feare of the Turkes fled out of Germany: which disgrace could no otherwise be preuented, but by the present prosecuting of his former determination for Algiers, and satisfying the expectation of his subjects of Spain; and so by sea valiantly to proue their better fortune, which had of late not so euill fauoured them at land, in hope that Algiers might be woon before the seas should grow rough and dangerous with Winter tempests: which if it should fall out according to his mind, hee would not, as he said, greatly care what the French could doe. Yet was it thought, that the dissembling friendship betwixt the French king and him, would not long endure: and the rather, for that there was a new grudge risen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Rnco, who for certaine yeares had lien embassadour for the French king at Constantinople to Solyman, and was a few moneths before sent backe againe by him into France to the king: but returning backe againe with new instructions from his master, for the confirmation of a further league betwixt the Turkish Sultan and him, he was by certain Spaniards of the emperors old souldiors, who had knowledge of his comming, belaid vpon the riuier Padus as he was going down to Venice, so to haue passed into Egypt, and slaine, together with Cesar Fregosius: or as the common report went, first taken and tortured, to get from him the secrets of his negotiation, and afterwards slaine. Which report so much touched Vastius in credit, that in purgation of himselfe, he offered the combat to any man of like qualitie to himselfe, that durst charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion, that he was well and worthely taken away; for vndertaking so odious a charge, as to stirre vp the Turkes against the Christians, and to shew vnto them such opportunities as might best serue their purpose, by discouering vnto them the emperours desseins, to the great hurt of the Christian commonweale. But were it well, or were it euill; as Paulus the third of that name then bishop of Rome, meeting the emperour at Lucca, as he came from Genoa, could not, or would not determine; sure it serued as no small occasion to set those two great princes againe at odds, whereby the wished vnite of the Christian state was sore shaken, and a way opened for the Turke. The emperour at his comming to Lucca, was honourably receiued by the cardinals and bishops, and lodged in the court: the great bishop was before placed in the bishops pallace, whither the emperour came thither to talke with him, and the bishop to him once. But the bishop hauing nothing at all pretailed with the emperour, and the French embassadour, for the appeasing of the troubles euen then like to arise betwixt him and the French king: did what he might to persuade him to employ such forces as he was about to passe ouer with into Affricke, against the Turkes in defence of his brother Ferdinand, and of the countrey of Austria, if Solyman should happily pursue his late obtained victorie at Bvda. But hee still resolute in that fatall determination of inuading of Affricke, rejected that the bishops request also. So the great bishop hauing moued much, and preuailed little, in the greatest matters which most concerned the common good, taking his leaue of the emperour, returned by easie iournies to Rome.

The emperor in the meane time with certain bands of Italians, vnder the leading of Camillus Columna and Augustinus Spinula, and six thousand Germanes, came from LYCA to the port LYNE, and there embarking his souldiours in certaine marchant ships provided for the purpose, and five and thirtie galleys, departed thence, commaunding the masters of the ships to direct their course to the islands of BALBAES: but after they had put to sea, they were by force of tempest suddenly arising, brought within sight of CORSICA: where after they had bene tossed too and fro two dayes in the rough seas, and put out of their course, the wind something falling, they put into the haven of SYRACUSA, now called BONIFACIUM. The dispersed fleet once come together into the port of SYRACUSA, and the rage of the sea well appeased, he put to sea againe for the islands BALBAES, now called MAIORCA and MINORCA: where in his course he met with a tempest from the West, more terrible and dreadfull than the first: wherein diuers of the galleys hauing lost their mastes and sailes, were glad with extreame labour and perill in striuing against the wrought sea to get into a harbor of the lesser island, taking name of Barchinm Mago the famous Carthaginensian, whose name it retaineth vntill this day. From hence the emperor with all his fleet passed ouer to the greater island, being wonderfull glad that Ferdinand Gonzaga his viceroy in SICILIA was in good time come with the Sicilian galleys and ships of ITALIE, in number a hundred and fiftie saile, wherein he had brought such store of bisket and victuall, as might haue sufficed for a long waire. Mendoza was also expected to haue come thither with his fleet from SPAIN, but he by reason of contrarie winds being not able to hold that course, altered his purpose according to the tempest, and so happily cut ouer directly to ALGIERS. So the emperor nothing misdoubting the careful diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which was indeed alreadie chanced, and the wind now seruing faire, by the perswasion of Auria his Admirall hoysed saile, and in two dayes came before ALGIERS, and there in goodly order came to anker before the citie in the sight of the enimie. Whilist the fleet thus lay, two of the pyrats which had bene abroad at sea seeking for prize, returning to ALGIERS, not knowing any thing of the fleet, fell into the bay amongst them before they were aware: the bigger whereof Viscontes Cicada stemmed with his galley and sunke him, the other with wonderfull celeritie got into the haven. In the meane time Mendoza with his galleys had passed the promontorie of Apollo, now called the cape of CASSINAYS, and in token of honour saluting the emperor after the manner at sea, with all his great Ordinance, gaue him knowledge that the Spanish fleet was not farre behind. In this fleet was about a hundred tall ships of BISCAY and the low countries, and of other smaller vessels a farre greater number. In these ships besides the footmen was embarked a great number of braue horsemen out of all parts of SPAIN: for many noble gentlemen had voluntarily of their own charge gallantly furnished themselves with braue armour and courageous horses, to serue their prince and countrey against the Infidels. Over these choice men commaunded Ferdinand of TOLEDO, duke of ALBA, for his approoued valour then accounted a famous captaine. These ships going altogether with sailes, were not yet able to double the cape, as did Mendoza with his galleys, for now it was a dead calme: howbeit the billow of the sea went yet high, by reason of the rage of the late tempest, and did so beat against the plaine shore, that it was not possible to land the souldiours, but that they must needs be washed vp to the middle: which thing the emperor thought it not good to put them vnto, and so to oppose them seaficke and thorow wet against the sudden and desperat assaults of their fierce enemies. He also stayed for the coming of the Spanish ships for two causes: first, that he might with his united power more strongly assault the citie, and terrifie the enimie; then, to communicate the whole glorie of the action with the Spaniards, at whose request and forwardnesse and greatest charge he had vndertaken that waire. Which fatal delay of two dayes, although it was grounded vpon good reason, did not onely disturbe an assured victorie, but to the notable hurt of the whole armie, opened a way to all the calamities which afterwards ensued.

In the meane while the emperor sent a conuenient messenger to Almagas, otherwise and mote truly called Assan-Aga, or Assan the eunuch: who with a little flag of truce in his hand making signe of parley, and answered by the Moores with like, and his manners is, went on shore, and was of them courteously receiued and brought to Assan. This Assan was an eunuch, borne in SARDINIA, brought vp from his youth in the Mahometane superstition by Barbarossa, a man both politicke and valiant, and by him left for the keeping of his kingdome of ALGIERS in his absence with Solyman. This messenger brought into his presence, required him forth-forthwith to deliuer the citie (first surprised by force and trecherie by Horrucius, and afterwards to the destruction of mankind, fortified by Harademus Barbarussa his brother) to Charles the mightie emperor, come in person himselfe to be reuenged on those horrible pyrats: which if he would doe, it should be lawfull for the Turks to depart whether they would, and for the naturall Moores to abide still, with their goods and religion wholly reserued vnto them vntouched; as in former time: and for himselfe, he should receiue of the emperor great rewards both in time of peace and warres, so that he would remember himselfe, that he was borne in SARDINIA, and was once a Christian; and accept of the fairest occasion which could possibly be offered for him to returne againe to the worshipping of the true God, and to enjoy the saubour and bountie of the most mightie emperor, and withall to reuenge himselfe of the cruell tyrant Barbarussa, for the vnnaturall villanie done vnto his person. But if he would needs dally on the time, and make prooffe of the strength of so great a preparation, he should vndoubtedly with the rest of his followers receiue the same reward of his obstinacie, which they had to the example of others receiued at TUNES. Wherunto the vngracious eunuch answered, That he thought him altogether mad, that would follow his enemies counsell: and with a grinning countenance asked him, Vpon what hope the emperor trusted to be able to win the citie? the messenger pointing with his finger directly to the fleet, told him, That which you see, with his great artillerie, and valour of his souldiours, both horse and foot: VVherat the eunuch scornfully laughing, replied, And we with like force and valour will defend this citie, and make this place, already famous for your ouerthrowes here twice, now the third time of all others most famous by the emperours discomfiture. It is reported, that there was in ALGIERS an old wretch, famous for her predictions, who had (as it was said) foretold the shipwrackes and miserie of Didaco Verra and Hugo Moncada to them of ALGIERS; and also prefixed a time when as the Christian emperor adventuring to besiege that citie, should there receiue great losse both by sea and land: The fame of which blind prophesie setting fitly to confirme the hope of good successe in the minds of the vulgar multitude, Assan so fed and augmented (although hee himselfe being a craftie wise fellow, beleued no such vanities) that he did therewith not only encourage his owne souldiours, but also strucke a terror into the minds of the weaker sort of his enemies, seeing themselves cast vpon so dangerous a coast vpon the approach of VVinter. There was in garison in the citie but eight hundred Turkes, and most of them horsemen, but such as whose valour and resolution farre exceeded their number. For Assan had lost many of his best men, some in fight against Mendoza; and other come at sea, slaine or taken by Auria in CORSICA; and in other places by the Rhodian, Neapolitane, and Sicilian galleys; but many more were by his leaue gone to aid the Moores against the Portingals: the other multitude did scarce make vp the number of five thousand; which were partly naturall Moores borne in that countrey, and partly such as were born in GRANADO; to whom was joyned many fugitiues out of the islands of MAIORCA and MINORCA, who in former time hauing entred into rebellion, and fearing condigne punishment, were fled to ALGIERS; and there revolted to the Mahometane superstition. But the captaines of the wild Numidians made vp a great number both of horse and foot: which lying stragling without the citie in the open fields, should night and day vex and molest the Christians. This brutish people, naturally enemies vnto the Christians, had Assan with rewards and hope of a rich spoile, allured out of the countreys thereabout to aid him: neither was it lawfull for any man to carrie his wife or children out of the citie into places of more safetie farther off, or to shew any small token of feare, paine of death: being by the imperious eunuch proposed to whosoever should but looke heauily for feare of danger, or speake a word fauouring of cowardise. The emperor by Auria making choise of a most conuenient place for landing his men, laid his galleys so close vnto his tall ships, that his armed souldiours might with ease come out of the high built ships into them, and so out of them into the long boats, to be forthwith set on shore: And such was the speedie diligence of them that had the charge of that matter, and the plentie of boats still readie to receiue the souldiours as fast as they could come out of the galleys, that the footmen were in a very short time all landed. The emperor hauing a little rested and refreshed his souldiours, deuided his armie into three equall battels, which was in number about twentie thousand footmen, besides horsemen, and others who of their owne voluntarie will thereto followed the emperours fortune. Vnto euery battell he appointed three field pieces, to terrifie the Numidian horsemen, which were still pricking vp and downe about them readie to charge, if if they could take them at any aduantage. And so setting forward a few furlongs, encamped in a strong and conuenient place, neere vnto the citie betweene two deepe ditches, which the water falling from the mountaines had naturally worne so deepe, that neither horseman nor footman could well passe ouer, but by bridge: and fast by vpon the left hand was a hill, from the top whereof it seemed the citie might with great ordinance well be battered.

The description
of Algiers.

The citie of ALGIERS, sometime the royall seat of the great king Iuba, called of the Romans Iulia Cæsarea, is in forme of a triangle, situate fast by the sea towards the North, hauing a haven, but neither great, neither safe from the North wind. The houses farther off from the sea, stand in seemly order vpon the rising of a steepe hill, as it were vpon degrees, in such sort, that the windowes of one row still ouerlook the tops of the next beneath it, into the sea; most beautiful to behold. The emperor hauing deuised his campe into three parts, euerie nation by themselves, lying on the East side of the towne, was in great hope to win it: and the rather, for that whilst he assaulted it on that side, his ships and galleies from the North side, might in time of the assault with their great ordinance beat the enemy all alongst the wall: which still rising higher and higher according to the rising of the steepe hill, could not conueniently be defended with one bulwarke, as we see it may in plaine ground. Neerest vnto the rising of the hills, lay the Spaniards; in the midst, the Germans with the emperor; and in the plaine neerest vnto the sea, the Italians.

The Numidians skirmish with the Spaniards.

In the meane time whilst the great ordinance was landing, and the horses vnsipping, the Numidians with a hideous outcrie shewed themselves vpon the tops of the mountaines about the Spaniards, and from thence easily gauled them with their darts and shot: for they nimble running too and fro in the knowne paths of the rough mountaines, would suddenly and fiercely assaile them, but after the manner of their nation, skirmishing a far off, rather than neere at hand. In which manner of light skirmishes, all that day was spent vntill night with small danger, but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, these wild people, one companie still succeeding another in the place they had before taken, neuer left shooting; for wheresoever they saw any fire in the Spanish campe, thither came arrowes, darts, and stones flying as thicke as haile: for remedie whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their fires, and with silence to expect the day, that they might come neerer vnto them.

The Spaniards
put the Numidians to flight, and gaine the hills.

Wherefore as soone as the sunne was vp, the Spaniards by the persuation of Auarez Sandes, master of the campe, valiantly climbing vp the high mountaines, repulsed and put to flight the Numidians, and tooke the top of the hills, and there lay as it were incamped in the poore shepherds cottages. But the same day such a multitude of the wild people was flockt about them, that they were compassed in round, and glad to fight on euerie side in a ring. Yet this fiercenesse of this barbarous people, was by the valour of the Sicilian companies quickly repressed, whose pikemen glistering in their bright armour, made small account of the Numidians arrowes and darts, but orderly stepping forwards with their pikes, and the harquebusers close by their sides, easily repulsed their naked enemies. The Numidian footmen are for most part youths halfe naked, with long haire not vnlike the Irish, vsing no other weapons but darts: they fight mingled with their horsemen, trusting the one to the other, and are of a wonderfull swiftnesse and agilitie of bodie.

The description
of the Numidian footmen and horsemen.

Their horsemen vse long speares, armed at both ends, which they with a marvellous dexterity vse to the endangering of their enemy pursuing them: they vse also long and light targuets made of leather, wherewith they so cunningly defend themselves and their horses, both in their charge and retreat, that for a small trifle, in respect of the danger, they will giue a man leaue to cast: seu en darts at one of them, which they will all most surely auoid, either with their speares, or receive them without harme in their targuet. In the mean time, whilst this wild people thus skirmished all the day, at night a sudden mischance ouerthrew all the emperors hope: for as he stood beholding the vnsipping of his great ordinance, his horses, viestual, and other necessaries of the armie, a storme of wind and raine began about six a clocke in the afternoone, holding on all the night without intermission, with such rage, as if heauen and earth should haue gone together: wherewith the whole armie at land was wonderfully troubled; and a great part of the fleet at sea by force of tempest driuen aground, perished. That night three companies of the Italians, by the appointment of their Generall, lay without the trenches against the sudden assault of so vncertaine an enemy, who when they had all the night endured the vehement raine and extreame cold, were so overcome with the extremitie of the weather, that neither was their minds able to relieue their weake bodies, neither their feeble bodies their discouraged minds: for they could

neither conueniently stand nor lie downe, all the ground being so mirie, that at euerie step they sunke vp to the calfe of the legge. Vpon these staruen companies, the Turkish horsemen and Moores footmen, who diligently obserued the watch of the Christians, perceiuing their distress, suddenly sallied out in the dawning of the day; and so fiercely charged them, their match and powder being now so wet that they could not vse their pieces, that they all fled, except a few pikemen, who made a stand, and were all quickly slaine by the Turkes: who so desperately pursued the rest in chase, that they followed them ouer the trench into the campe. This alarm being heard, Camillus Columna the Italian Generall came presently thither, being sent by the emperor, who with certaine companies issued out ouer the bridge against the enemy: who now in shew discouraged with the comming out of this new supply, did in deed, or at leastwise made as if they did disorderly retire for feare. At which time Ferdinand Gonzaga, vicetoy of Sicilia, a man of greatest account in the armie next vnto the emperor, comming in also, and angrie with them which had before fled; persued them as valiant men, to recompence their shamefull flight with a fresh charge, by driving the enemy home to his owne doore: which thing Columna said could not be done without great perill: But Gonzaga being a man of noble courage, desired to haue the disgrace which the Italians had receiued, salued some way, although it were with neuer so great danger: thinking also that it might happily fall out, that the enemy being put to flight, and hastily pursued, they might together with them enter the citie, without danger of the artillerie. So without farther delay, the rest of the Italian companies were fled forth of their trenches with great cheerefulness by Augustine Spinula, who so valiantly charged the enemies that they put them to flight, and pursued them so hard, that they came with them to the verie gates of the citie: where many shut out for feare of letting in the Italians together with them, escaped by knowne waies, some to another gate, and some into the mountaines. But then these barbarous people, with darts and shot from the wals, began to ouerwhelme the Italians which were vnadvisedly come within their danger, and with terrible outcries to terrifie them: and they which before were fled without the wals, returned againe to fight. They also which had shut the gate, sallied out againe, and hardly charged the Italians, who already galled with shot from the wals, and rent in funder with the great ordinance, fled most disorderly: for why, they were but raw souldiours taken vp in hast, little or nothing acquainted with the wars. At which time Ascanio also falling out, who was easily knowne by his countenance and rich attire, pursued the chase with his troups of Turks and Moores footmen. Only certaine knights of the Rhodes fought valiantly, and retired orderly: and Spinula with some other gentlemen making a stand at a little wooden bridge, somewhat staied the enemy and saved the liues of many. So the Italians which first charged most valiantly, being in the flight become hindermost, the enemy suiking them downe as they fled, couered the fields with their dead bodies by the space of halfe a mile, especially they which fled towards the sea: for there they were circumuented and slaine by the mercilesse Numidians, who beholding the shipwracke, were come downe to the sea side for prey. But the foremost companies of the Italians which first fled into the campe, fled in so much hast and so great feare, that none of the leaders in so great and sudden a perplexitie, remembered either the common safetie, or performed the ducie of an aduised captain: so that all seemed at once lost, both by sea and land. Only the emperor, armed with an inuincible courage against all the chances of fortune, and not to be dismayed with any mishap, was both vnto himselfe and others that day the greatest captain; for when as all was almost lost, he in good time staied the matter by comming on with the Squadron of Germans, whereof he sent before three ensignes to stay the flight, and with them as a sure and fresh supply to guard his campe beyond the bridge which was ouer the ditch, seruing his armie for a trench as we haue before said. But such a feare had possessed the minds of the flying Italians, and such was the fierce pursuit of the enemy, that those Germans (not before wont to turne their backs) as if they had been afraid of the Turkes white caps, or not able to abide their sight, or to hold vp weapon against them; by and by turned their backs, and shamefully fled for companie with the Italians. Then the emperor gallieping forth with his horse, and his sword in his hand drawne, reproving them of cowardise that fled, set forward with the German Squadron, and with a stout and manly courage spake to them these few words in their owne language: When will you (fellow souldiours) shew your faces to your proud enemies; if now when you should fight for the honour of the Christian name, for the glorie of the German nation, for the safeguard of your owne liues, in the presence of your emperor, you feare a few disorderd and naked Barbarians? Immediately when he had thus said, the Germans touched G with shame, and disdaining that it should be thought they needed any exhortation to performe the parts of valiant souldiors, issued out against the enimie: who moued with their comming, and seeing the Italian battell againe restored by the valour and trauell of certaine valiant and expert capitaines, stood still a while, and began to retire; whether it were because they feared the great artillerie & assault of the Germans, or that they thought they had done enough for that fall: when as for the full accomplishment of the victorie they saw the Christian fleet overcome with a most horrible tempest, miserably to perish before their faces; and many of their men, especially the Moores hastened to the sea side in hope of a more certaine prey, whereas was no enimie to be feared. For the blustering winds blowing from diuers quarters, as if they had conspired to raise a most horrible tempest, had made such a wrought sea, and the hugie billowes went so high, that H the ships by the violence of the weather, and rage of the sea, put from their anchors, fell foule one of another, and were so lost; or else driuen vpon the maine, were there beaten in pieces in the sight of the armie: so that all the sea-coast Westward, from ALGIERS to CERCEILLO, lay full of dead men and horses, and the ribs of broken ships. The Numidians beholding this miserable wracke, came downe by great companies from the mountaines, and without mercie slew all that came aliuie to land. In the space of a few houres was lost about an hundred and fortie ships, and all the small boats and catuels, which were in number many. Some of the gallies, when they had from midnight to the next day at noone, by the painfull labour of the marriners and skilfullnesse of the masters, rid it out; being no longer able to endure the rage of the tempest, and fearing to be eaten vp with the sea, with sailes and oares ran a ground: but the souldiors and marriners swimming to land in hope to saue their liues, and thinking that the greatest danger had been now past, were by the Numidian horsemen which ran vp and downe the sea side, slaine. There might a man haue seene free men of all sorts, with teares commending their liues and libertie to their owne gally-slaues; that by the speech and intreatie of them, which by the sudden change of fortune had but euen now shaken off their yrons, and with merrie hearts swam out to their libertie, they might be saued from the cruelty of the fierce Numidians. It was a most grieuous and wofull sight for diuers hard extremities; when as euery man according to the disposition of his mind and skill in swimming, standing doubtfull in most assured death, which to receiue or refuse, was by fatall destinie drawne to his end, and either drowned in the sea, or thrust thorow with the enemies lance: yet most made choise to abide the danger of the sea, and to expect the euent of the tempest, rather than to hasten their end by the enemies mercilesse hand. By that meanes it came to passe, that that barbarous crueltie of the enimie (as a thing most feared of the marriners and souldiors) saued many gallies, which by the appointment of the fearefull marriners and passengers should otherwise haue been run on ground. But after that, a notable gally wherein Iannettin Auria went, was seene to come neere vnto the shoare, and to be driuen vpon the sands by force of weather and the beating of other gallies. The emperor not enduring to see so valiant a young gentleman, capitaine of many gallies, slaine without helpe by the Moores in the sight of Auria his vncke; sent by and by one of his capitaines called Antonius of ARAGON, with three bands of Italians to the sea side: by whose comming the Moores were put to flight, and he with the rest in the gally saued; but so, that the sauing of him was the losse of L diuers other gallies. For many deliuered of the feare of the Numidians, and trusting to the rescue of the souldiors come downe to the sea side, desiring to saue themselves from the rage of the sea, ran their gallies on ground; and had not some bold capitaines (grieved to see so great a losse) run vp and downe the banks with their drawne swords in their hands, and by threatening death vnto the gally-slaues and marriners, staied their rowing, most part of the gallies had by the example of the other perished. Auria, not so angrie at himselfe as at the emperor (who, contrary to the obseruation of skilfull seamen, could not be dissuaded from taking in hand that great expedition in so suspitious a time of the year) with an inuincible courage strue against the violence of the tempest, and rage of the sea: insomuch, that being requested by some of his friends, to saue himselfe whatsoeuer became of the gally; he was so angrie thereat, that he commanded them to be bestowed vnder the hatches. Foure gallies also of Virginus Virinus, earle of ANOVILLARIA, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example rid it out, the reputation of their honour exceeding the feare of death. Certaine gallies also of SICILIA, NAPLES, and SPAIN, happily endured all the rage of the tempest: yet was there fiftene great gallies cast away; with the

A hard chiefe.

Many gallies lost by sauing of one man.

A the losse whereof, besides the losse of so many ships, the tempest still enduring, so great sorrow and deperation in the wofull expectation of the wracke of all, possessed the whole armie, that not onely the young souldiors regarding onely their owne liues, but euen the most valiant capitaines, carefull of the common estate, were vtterly discouraged: for neuer was armie in any memorie, ouerwhelmed with a greater concourse of calamities, when as all their victuals being lost in three daies, nothing was left to relieue them withall, and they wanted tents wherein to shroud and rest the souldiors spent with labour, hunger, cold, and wounds, in such perpetuall raine and so durrie a countrie. In which so great miseries, a wonderfull care heauier than the former fear exceedingly troubled the minds of all men, to thinke vpon that horrible wracke; when as hauing lost so many ships, & they poore men landed in AFRICA, were in doubt how euer to return again into B their native countries. Yet the notable courage of the emperor still kept the distressed men in hope, which neuer altogether forsaketh wretched men in the midst of their calamities: for he with a courageous heart & cheerfull countenance performed all the parts of a prouident & courteous Generall. For when he had againe made sure his campe against the assaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied capitaines, especially the duke of ALBA (wonderfully wearied in the late skirmish) and dung wet, to spare themselves, and take their rest: he comforted the wounded men, and caused them to be carried and cherished in the tents which by chance yet stood (for the tempestuous wind had almost ouerthrowne them all) and so not sparing himselfe for any paines, being in his armour and thorow wet, wooon the hearts of all his souldiors the more. In this consist he lost about three thousand men, amongst whom was five of his forward capitaines, and C three knights of the RHODIANS: but many moe were hurt. The greatest losse was thought to be in losse of the ships and of the marriners, which was also encreased by the losse of a wonderfull deale of great ordinance; reckoned so much the greater, for that it would come into the hands of the Moores, to the common harme of the Christians, so soone as the sea would giue them leaue to diue for it. Shortly after, Auria (as he was to foresee a tempest, a wonderfull obseruer of the sea, of the heauens, and of the clouds) mistrusting that place, departed with the remainder of the fleet to the cape called METAFYSIVM; because it was a place of safer riding for his gallies, and better for the taking in of the souldiors: aduising the emperor to march thither by land. Which his counsell the emperor liking well of, to relieue the hunger of his souldiors, commanded first D after them the horses for seruice, to be killed; and deuised for meat amongst the souldiors: As for wood to make fire of, they had plentie of the planks and ribs of the broken ships, fortune as it were with that one poore benefit recompensing so many calamities. The next day the emperor departed from ALGIERS, with his armie deuised into three battels, the sicke and wounded men being receiued into the middle: and when he had marched feuen miles (the enemies horsemen still hovering about him) he came to a headie brooke, which the Moores call ALCARAZ: which was growne so high with the abundant taine and the checke of the wind and of the sea, that being but a shallow thing before, it was now to be passed ouer by a good horseman. Wherefore the emperor of necessitie there encamped, in such sort, that lying with his armie in forme of a triangle, two sides of his armie was defended with the sea and the brooke, and the other with E a strong guard of armed men, for he thought it not good to depart from the sea, a sure defence for his armie on the left hand, to seeke a fourth further of: many aduenturing to swim ouer, were by the violence of the streame carried away and drowned. Wherefore the emperor caused a bridge to be made ouer it, of the masts and saile yards of the broken ships, which were by chance there taken vp, and so passed ouer the Italians and Germans. The Spaniards marching higher vp the brooke, found a fountaine whereby they passed ouer. After which time the Turkes pursued them no further, being called backe againe by Assan their gouernour: as for the Moores and Numidians which still followed at hand, alwayes readie to skirmish, they were easily repulled by the harquebusiers, and field pieces appointed to euery nation: but vpon such sicke and wounded men as were not able to keepe way with the armie, they exercised all manner of crueltie: for there was none which in that small hope, possessed with feare of their owne sate, was greatly moved with the compassion of their fellowes miserie. The next day passing ouer another little F river, which the souldiors waded ouer vp to the breasts, they came in three dayes march to the rode where the fleet lay, and encamped in the ruines of the old cite TIPSANE vnto the sea side, which serued them in stead of a forresse against the Barbarians. The sea was now calme, the wind laied, and the weather so faire that all men thought the souldiours might now well be embarked and transported into EVROPE; wherefore the emperor to the great joy of the whole armie commaunded every man to make himselfe readie to goe abroad, in such sort, that first the Italians, next the Germanes, and last of all the Spaniards should be embarked: but so many ships and galleies as is before said, being lost by shipwracke, it was thought that those which were left were not able to receive the whole armie, although it were crouded together as close as were possible. Wherefore the emperor commanded the masters and owners of the ships to cast all the horses overboard into the sea, reputing it an unmercifull part to preferre the safegard of those horses, although they were of great worth, before the life of the basest common souldiour or horseboy in his campe; which thing much grieved the minds of the noblemen and owners of those goodly beasts, not only for that they were (not without extreame necessitie) for the present deprived of such an inestimable treasure, but should for ever, as they said, lose the most notable race of horses in SPAIN: there, with greese and vaine compassion, was to be seene goodly horses of service, bearing high their proud heads, swimming all about the sea vnto the ships neereft vnto them for safegard, as if it had beene to the shore, and in the end wearied with long swimming to be there drowned. But scarce halfe the souldiours were yet embarked, when the East and North-east wind, and straightwaies after, diuers contrarie winds almost as great as the first, rose: whereupon the ships which had alreadie taken in the souldiours, not expecting any commaund, for feare of being driuen vpon the rockes, directed their course according as the wind carried them with full sailes alongst the coast: They were quickly out of sight and dispersed with the tempest, some into one countrey, some into another, carrying the same of that shipwrack, and the report that all was lost, into all the Islands of the Mediteranean and ports of ITALIE. The force of this tempest was so great, and the billow went so high, that some of the ships were in the sight of their fellowes swallowed vp of the sea. But amongst the rest two Spanish ships full of souldiours were by wonderfull mishap by contrarie winds driuen againe to AEGERS, and there set fast vpon that fatal shore, where the Numidian horsemen with a multitude of Moores following them, came running downe to the sea side, to kill them as they should come to shore: for the barbarous people thirsting after Christian blood, would not receive them to mercie, although they were readie to yeeld themselves, and cōueniant nothing but the safegard of their liues. At which their crueltie the Spaniards disdainig, with their weapons in their hands got to shore, and standing close together as desperat men, withstood them who had with their multitude quickly compassed them in round: yet in despite of what that barbarous multitude (without regard of humanitie or law of armes) could doe, they made way thorow the midst of them, from the place where they were cast on shore, vnto the very gates of the citie. But seeing the Turkes fallie out, they called vnto them, offering to yeeld themselves prisoners to Assan, without further resistance, if they would assure them their liues, which they were in good hope of, for that he was borne of Christian parents in SARDINIA, and was attended vpon with many renegate Spaniards. So Assan comming forth of the citie, gaue them his faith for their safetie, and beating away the Moores and Numidians, courteously saved them all, wisely making great account of so great a gaine as would redound vnto him by so many prisoners, joined with no small commendation of his clemencie in saving them. Of the Germans the third part neuer returned home, but were either lost with shipwracke, or els dead of the sickness ensuing to great miseries. The emperor perswaded (or rather overruled) by Anira to avoid the violence of the tempest, sailed alongst the coast of AFFRIKE Eastward to BVZIA, the castle whereof was kept with a small garnison of Spaniards: where the emperor landing, found some fresh victuall, though not much, yet such as did both him and the other noblemen no small pleasure. Whilest the emperor lay at BVZIA expecting fairer weather, a great ship of GENOVA, laden with victuall, chanced to come into the bay, to the great rejoycing of the hungrie souldiours: but such was the violence of the tempest, that her anchors came home, and she driuen vpon the flats, was cast away; yet so, as that part of the victuall which to shore, and halfe spoiled with the salt water, well relieved the encreasing want. In the meane time the emperor when he had long looked for the assuaging of the tempest, and was now out of hope of any new supplie of victuall, sent away Gonzaga with the Sicilian and Rhodian galleies: for the wind before at North was now come to North-west, and put them in hope to adventure againe to sea, rather than to stay there longer. So although with a troublesome yet a prosperous course they came in short time into the port of VRECA, now called FARONAS: where Muleasses king of TVNES bountifullly releecued Gonzaga and his fleet with all kind of victuall and other necessaries. From whence they afterward departed, and landed all in safetie at DREPANVM in SICILIA. The blustering winds were now at length wearied of blowing, and the raging sea became calme, so that the skillfull sea men for feare of new dangers, and wearie of those that were past, thought it best to adventure againe to sea. Almost every houre they were reasoning in counsell, What course they were for most safetie best to take: when some were of opinion, that it was best to beare for SARDINIA or CORSICA: and other some would haue had them to haue kept alongst the coast of AFFRICA, and so directly for SICILIA. But the wind comming faire at East, the emperor directed his course to the islands BALBAES, and from thence at length arrived at the port of new CARTHAGE in SPAIN, greatly commended euen of his enemies for his wonderfull courage and constancie in passing thorow so many extremities, in such sort, as if he had triumphed over the malice of fortune.

About this time the dissembled friendship betwixt Charles the emperor, and Francis the French king brake out into open hatred. The king first thinking himselfe deluded by the emperor, who had long time fed him with the vaine hope of the restitution of the dukedome of MILLAN, when as he meant nothing lesse; and of late abused by the death of Rinco his embassadour, slaine by the Spaniards in passing downe the river Padus, as is before declared. In reuenge whereof he raised a great power in FRANCE, and at such time as most men thought he would haue invaded ITALIE, sent Charles his sonne with the one part of his forces into the low countreies, which were then gouerned by Marie queene of HUNGARIE, the emperours sister; and Henrie his other sonne with the other part of his forces to invade SPAIN, both yong princes of great hope. And not so contented, but desirous by all means to trouble and molest the emperor, as he did in the low countreies by setting on the duke of CLEVE: so by Antonius Polinius his embassadour, a man of great discretion, he earnestly solicited Solyman the great Turke, with whom he was then in league, to spoile the borders of SPAIN with his galleies, at the same that Henrie his sonne was besieging PERPENNA in SPAIN. For which practise he was of most men discommended, as too much fauoring his owne greese; and especially by such as affected the emperor. But how this matter, which drew vpon the French king no small enuie, was carried in the Turkes court, shall not (as I hope) be vnto this historie impertinent to declare.

After the death of Rinco slaine by the Spaniards, Francis the French king sent Antonius Polinius, a man of great dextetitie, his embassadour to Solyman: who passing by many by-ways to VENICE, and so ouer the gulfe to SIBINCVM, crossing ouer ILLYRIA, met with Solyman in MISIA, as he was comming from BVZIA: and there first offered vnto him the present sent from the king his master (for with empty hands no man might presume to come to those barbarous kings of the East) which present was a cupbord of plate, curiously wrought, in weight 600 pounds; and 300 rich garments of all sorts of silke and scarlet to be bestowed vpon the Bassaes and other great courtiers. Solyman after he had read the French kings letters, and heard what he had further to say, seemed to be greatly moued with the death of Rinco, and promised Polinius not to be wanting vnto the French king, by sea or land to giue him aid in his iust watres against Charles his enemy, for breaking of the league: but for as much as nothing could be well determined of such matters in his journey, of so great hast, he told him, that as soon as he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, he should then haue answer by his Bassaes of all his demands. The embassadour about all things desired, that he would send Hariadenus Barbarussas with his fleet against the next Summer into PROVENCE, there to be receited into the French harbors, & to be employed against the emperor as occasion should require: and further, that he would request the Venetians, with whom he was able to doe much, to joine in league with the king his master against Charles the emperor, whose power began now to be dreadfull to their estate. Polinius was not slacke in his businesse, but all the way as he went fought to win the fauour of the Bassaes, still giuing them one present or other, & filling their minds with the hope of greater. But when they were come to CONSTANTINOPLE, in the latter end of December, Solyman promising what he had before said, aduised Polinius to returne into FRANCE with his letters, & to bring him certaine word back againe from the king of the determination of taking those wars in hand: & that he would in the meane time send Tamuseinus his embassadour to VENICE, who had been there diuers times before, & would provide to haue such a fleet in readinesse, as he desired. Polinius exceeding glad of that answer, with wonderfull speed returned back againe to the king, bringing with him as presents from Solyman two goodly Turkish horses, and a sword richly set with stones of great price. The French king hating by his embassadour received Solymans letters and presents, and three dayes together discoursed with him at large of the manner of his proceeding in the Turkes court, in short time after sent him backe againe to Solyman with full instructions both of the time and places, and other circumstances of the intended warre. Polinus comming to VENICE, found not Iunusbeius there, as he had well hoped: yet to lose no time in expecting his comming, he with Pellicerius embassadour Legier for the French king, and other of the French faction, laboured the Senatours in the behalfe of the king. For it was thought likely ynough, that the Venetians still measuring all their counsels by their profit, would easily consent to that league, especially being requested thereunto by Solyman, and put in hope to haue the port towne MARANVS deliuered vnto them in reward thereof; which otherwise the French, in whose possession it was, threatened to deliuer to the Turkes, and to make them their euill neighbours, rather than to haue it taken from them by the Germanes. Wherefore Polinus hauing audience giuen him in the Senat, notably pleaded the French kings cause, grievously lamented the death of the embassadour slaine by the Spaniards, and bitterly enueighed against the ambition of the emperor, who as he said aspired to the whole monarchie of all ITALIE, not by true vertue and valour, but by meere craft and deceit, encroching still vpon the liberties of the free states, and by little and little imposing vpon them the yoke of bondage: In confirmation whereof, hee produced many examples, to them well knowne, requesting them, as ancient friends and confederats of the French, to joyne their forces with the kings, in which doing, they should assure themselves of such rewards of the vndoubted victorie, as they could not desire greater. Whereas if they should refuse so to doe, and would rather sit still and looke on as neuters, they should vndoubtedly, for time hauing decided the quarrell, grievously offend both, and might worthily expect of the vanquished, hatred; and of the conqueror, injurie: Besides that, in taking vp of armes they should highly gratifie Solyman, who prouoked with late injuries, had determined with a puissant armie to inuade HUNGARIE, and at the same time to send Barbarussa with a great fleet against the Spaniards their common enemies: for the imparting of which his designs, he would shortly send vnto them Iunusbeius his embassadour: As for the cunct of the warre, they needed not to doubt, when as they of themselves were strong ynough quickly to thrust the emperor out of the dukedome of MILLAN, being generally hated of the people, feeding his fouldiors with the spoile of the country, and on euery side beset both by sea and land by two of the greatest monarchs of the world. Whereunto the Senat delaying the time for certaine dayes, that Iunusbeius might in the meane time come thither, grauely answered, That the amitie they held with king Francis, ought to be vnto them an ornament, but no burthen: the like also they held with the emperor, whom they would in no case seeme to cast off, although they had bene by him over-raught: Wherefore the Senators and all the citisens generally were of opinion to preserve their peace, as they which in the hard times of war had endured great extremities, which would hardly be recovered with long peace: But if they did once see the ensignes displayed, and the wars begun, they would then take further aduice, whether it were good for them to thrust themselves into those warres or not, when as they were in league and friendship with three of the greatest princes of the world. In the meane time Iunusbeius arrived at VENICE, and was there honourably received. He requested, that the league before made at CONSTANTINOPLE by Baderius their embassadour, might by the authoritie of the Senat be confirmed: & so commended the French kings cause to the Senat, that he requested no more, but that vnto that amitie which they already held with the French, they would joine further courtesies, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his brother, and had vndertaken to aid him against Charles king of SPAINNE: but as to joine in league with him, or in his quarrell to take vp armes, he requested nothing. Which was quite beside the expectation of Polinus and Pellicerius, who by vrging of the matter, and by telling of all, had thought easily to haue persuaded the Senat to haue graunted what they requested, and therefore thought the Turke who had so coldly spoken in the cause, to be some way corrupted. But as it afterward appeared, there was such equitie and modestie in Solymans letters, who was otherwise of a proud and insolent nature, that he would not as then exact any thing of them, which should not stand with the good of their estate. Wherefore Polinus, hauing in vaine staid certaine daies at VENICE, was in one of their publike gallies transported to RAVSVM, and from thence trauelled by land to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he found all things more difficult than than euer he dreamed of. For the great Bassaes said, There could no fleet be set out that yeare, by reason that he was come too late to sue for such a matter, the Spring of the yeare being now past, of all other times most fit for to take in hand so long a voyage. So that Polinus was about measure vexed with care and griefe, that he had so euill sped, and was come so out of season both to VENICE and CONSTANTINOPLE. Dixius also, one of the masters of the Rhodian gallies, was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, to carie newes into FRANCE of the comming of the Turkes fleet: who told Polinus, That the kings sonnes were with strong power far entred into the low countries, and had already inuaded SPAINNE, expecting nothing more than the comming of the Turkes gallies. Wherefore Polinus (as it easily chanceth to men deceived by trust reposed in any other mens promises, and bewailing the euill successe of their vaine trauell) wonderfully tormenting himselfe, cursed the froward and vnconstant manners of the Bassaes, called vpon the faith of Solyman; and besought the great Bassaes one by one, that they would not contrarie to their promise, forsake the king, who vpon the hope of the comming of the Turkes fleet, had now inuaded both the low countries and the kingdome of SPAINNE: for as much as by that delay, which was vnto them neither honourable nor profitable, was (as he said) betrayed the maiestie of his king, and a most assured victorie now as good as gotten, quite marred. In which his obtestations, he was so importunat and tedious, that he became vnto those proud Bassaes rather loathsome than gracious; insomuch that to end his sute, they thought it best sharply to take him vp, and so for that time to shake him off. And therefore sending for him and the other French gentlemen which followed him to the court, the great Bassaes then sitting in counsell, and Barbarussa with them for the honour of his place: as soone as they were come into the counsell chamber, Solyman Bassa the eunuch, turning himselfe about, spake vnto them in this sort.

Frenchmen (said he) this place for dispatch of most waightie affaires, appointed by the graue iudgement of our most mightie emperor to vs his faithfull seruants, doth (as it best becometh) receive vs, daily comming vnto it, void of loue and hatred: and withall doth notably put vs in remembrance, to speake our minds freely. Neither would I, that this franknesse of speech (the messenger of truth, and therefore the faithfull keeper of friendship) should be vnto your eares vnpleasing or troublesome: for sithence your king hath bene called the friend and fellow of the Othoman name, we may not now either forget the duties of loue, or loath your friendship: seeing that our emperor doth maruellously affect you, and is not a little desirous to strengthen you with his power, and by ouercomming your enemies to increase your power and honour. But in your demands is no equitie, no modestie, so that wee tearme you vnmodest and importunat: and others which fauour you not so well, call you plainly by your right names, vnreasonable and shamelesse men; who as too too forgetfull of your duties, doe most fondly trouble the lawes of amitie and friendship. For leagues are confirmed by like profit: by making euen the charge and mutuall dangers; but if neglecting your friends kinnesse and courtesie, you will make no requitall, they will quickly grow wearie of you: So happeneth it vnto you Frenchmen, who euer forgetfull and negligent in our dangers, but in your owne alwaies mindfull and diligent, haue shewed your selues friends vnto vs when need was, not in deeds and certaine aid, but onely in bare letters and embassages. Tell me I pray you, where euer you shewed any signe or token of your good will or aid? whereby the minds of our enemies might at the least wise haue bene kept in suspence of some doubtfull feare, when as Charles with all the power of the West came into HUNGARIE; and Corone and PATRAS were in the meane time shaken in GRACE with the enemies fleet; and last of all TUNES taken with so great a fleet? But all this we pardon you: yet this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not so much as once grieve at our so great iniuries as you ought to haue done; but sent your gratulatory embassadours vnto the bloudie common enemies, who had but euen then slaine so many of our people. At length our emperor came to AVLONA to your great profit, about to passe ouer into ITALIE: but neither then in the arrivall of your fleet appeared the good wils of the Apulians towards you, which were of you so vainly promised; neither did you so much as once move to inuade the upper part of ITALIE: so neither serving our turne nor well fitting your owne, you haue alwaies lost the occasion of the good successe of your affaires. But neither then, neither at any time afterwards needed we your counsell or united forces: for the Venetians to their paine felt both our forces, and our faith: as for the rest, warre, the notable remenger of our wrongs, most happily brought to passe, at such time as you of your owne voluntarie made peace with the common enemies, to inuade vs; and did as unkindly as impudently as it were blow wind in his sailes. But we, without your helpe, haue notably repressed pressed so great assaults of our enemies: when as this same Hariaden Barbaruffa put to flight the fleet at AMERACIA, and happily flew the Spanish pirates of CASTRUM, and having again recovered our owne cities, tooke also from them some of theirs: wherefore we are bound, unto you for no desert, but we had rather forget these unkindnesses, than to faile you, whom we have once received into our friendship. For we performe our fidelitie in deeds: but it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger, to wait occasion; which will not rashly commit his actions to the hazard of fortune. You are come later than you should have done for the setting forth of our fleet: for Sommer now well spent, followeth the pestilent time of Autumne, so that marriners cannot in convenient time be taken up, or safely thrust into the gallies: for in long sailing, who would not thinke, but that such a companie of saylers usually sicke at the change of an unacquainted ayre, would be in danger of their lives? who would not feare shipwracke in their returne, when as this same Hariaden is so great a master at sea, H driven upon the Acroceranion rocks in the moneth of August, lost so many gallies? A fleet would be rigged in Winter, furnished and set forward in the Spring; in Sommer is safe sailing and making warre. Which that it may be so done, we will for the common wealth sake persuade the emperor: for the naue once lost, cannot upon the sudden be againe restored for much gold, whereof the Othoman emperor wanteth no store; heaped up by many ages. If thou be wise take these things in good part as friendly spoken: but whether the emperor will pardon thy boldnesse or not, let himselfe consider, truly we have satisfied both him and our selves in speaking to thee so plainly.

These things seuerely spoken by the eunuch Bassa, did so much the more trouble Polinus, for that they seemed to have been sent from the mouth of Solyman himselfe, who was thought to have heard all that was said. For behind the Bassaes as they fate in counsell, was a window with a brassen grate, and a curtain drawne before it, that the emperor when he pleased, might vnderceiue heare the complaints and sutes of all nations, and note the manners of his great counsellors; whose care for the administration of justice was so much the greater, for feare of his presence. Yet did not Polinus for this repulse, detesting the double dealing of the Bassaes, to give ouer his sute; but winning by gifts the fauour of the Capitaga or chiefe porter, a man euer of great authority in the Turks court, laboured by him to be brought to the speech of Solyman himselfe: who faithfully performed what he had vnderaken. So the French embassadour brought by him into the secretest place of the court, which few Christians had euer been, and so vnto the presence of Solyman, recomtend vnto him how all matters had before passed, and most earnestly besought K him not to faile the kings expectation of the fleet he had before promised, who at that present was invading his enemies in three places. Whereunto Solyman courteously and exprefly answered, That the opportunitie of sending out of his fleet was past; not by his will, which was alwaies immutable and firme, but by his late coming, and the time of the yeare half spent; but promised, the next Spring without doubt to send vnto the king, his friend and brother, twice so great a fleet as he had desired against Charles their enemy. With which answer, the embassadour dispatched away Dixius into FRANCE, vpon whose arrival, king Francis called backe againe Henrie his eldest sonne with his armie, from the siege of PERPENNIA in SPAIN.

The princes and States of GERMANY, at the request of king Ferdinand and the nobilitie of HUNGARY, about this time decreed with one consent, to take vp armes against the Turks, for the recouering againe of BUDA, and other the lost parts of HUNGARY. For besides the dishonour done to their nation at EXTER under the leading of CARLOTT, and againe at BUDA under the leading of the Lo. Rogendorff, they well saw, that if they did not speedily relieue the Hungarians ouerwhelmed with the calamities of the Turks forces, they should in short time be forced to fight for their religion, children, wives, and liues against the same migraue enemies at their owne doores. For presenting whereof, the princes and free cities of GERMANY sent forth a tie thousand footmen, and seauen thousand horsemen, amongst whom was MAURITIUS, after wards duke of SAXONY, then a young gentleman about twentie yeares old; But the Generall of these German forces, was IOACHIMUS Marquess of BRANDENBURG, a man more for the honour of his house than the valour of himselfe preferred to that place; yet so, that vnto him was joynted eight others, men of great yeares and experience, by whose counsell he was abetted. When they were come to VIENNA, king Ferdinand power met them: where besides such as were taken vp in AUSTRIA, HUGANOT, Gouernour of STRASSBURG, came in with ten thousand horsemen.

A horsemen. Vnto these the noble men of HUNGARY, Gasper Seredius, Andreas Bathor, and Petrus Perenus, a man of the greatest authoritie power and experience amongst the Hungarians, joynted themselves, with fifteen thousand horsemen; whiche also Paulus the third of that name then bishop of ROME, sent three thousand chosen footmen out of ITALIE, conducted to VIENNA by Alexander Vitellius, a most famous capitaine. The Marquess with this great army marched from VIENNA along the riuer Danubius, but so softly, that the Hungarian and Italian capitaines said plainly, That the best part of the Sommer, and fittest time for warres, was passed ouer in loitering and dallying out the time to no purpose: especially Iacobus Medicus, who had long before persuaded the king, to be readie to set forward his forces with the first of the Spring; before the Turks could either augment their garrisons, or put in any new forces; for that by such resolute and speedie inuasion, it was like enough hee might recouer both PESTH and BUDA. Which politike and wholesome counsell so well giuen, king Ferdinand too much crediting the great men of his court (liking nothing but what proceeded of themselves) rejected, expecting the full assembly of all his forces, before the setting forth of his armie. At length the Marquess was by soft marches come to STRIGONIUM (king Ferdinand himselfe staying behind at VIENNA) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to lose BUDA, was either in person himselfe coming into HUNGARY, or else sending downe the Generall of his European horsemen, who might neuer set foot forward to warre without sixtie thousand horsemen. Which newes so troubled the Germans, that they made no great hast forward, doubting how they should returne againe if they chanced not to get the victorie: Beside that, it was C thought, that the Marquess neuer purposed to fight a battell, or endanger himselfe or his armie for the kingdome of HUNGARY, but only to defend the bounds of AUSTRIA, and by shewing the strength of GERMANY, to terrifie (if he could) the Turks, if they not contented with HUNGARY, should also prouoke the Germans. But after it was by certaine espials from SAMANDRIA, knowne that all that report of the coming of the Turks great armie was but vaine, and that there was scarce a thousand Ianzaries and twise so many horsemen come to BUDA, and that the Turks fleet was both for number and strength farre inferior to the kings, they set forward againe with more cheerefullnesse, much encouraged by the forwardnesse of the Hungarians, especially of Perenus; assuring them, that if they would without delay march on, and spend no more time in vaine, they should not find at BUDA any such number of Turks as was worth the name D of an armie: for that Solyman vsing but euerie second yeare to make war, did that yeare take his rest, and was not like to vnderake any great expedition. For these reasons all men being readie cheerfully to set forward, the Marquess appointed to passe ouer Danubius: which this Perenus, HUGANOT and Medicus, all expert capitaines, liked not of; wishing him rather to hold on his way directly still on that side the riuer to BUDA, the chiefe citie of the kingdome. But it was the mind of the Generall and all his counsellors, first to besiege PESTH, which might be done with lesse labour and danger, and there hauing made prooffe of the enemies strength and purpose, to come to the siege of BUDA: for then would the souldiours with much more courage and cheerefullnesse endure the siege of BUDA, if they had by good fortune first beaten them out of PESTH: Which counsell was both best liked and followed, and the armie by two bridges with great and painfull labour made ouer Danubius (which was in that place deuided into two parts) transported: At the same time Medicus an Italian capitaine, Admirall of the kings fleet, came downe the riuer, and in despite of the Turks tooke the island of Saint Margaret, lying in the riuer a little aboue BUDA; and by force repulld the Turkes fleet vnto the suburbs of the citie. The Marquess to avoid the danger of the great shot from BUDA, after he was passed the riuer, set a great compass about, and so came to the North side of PESTH: for on the South it was defended with the riuer Danubius, running betwixt it and BUDA, and on the East and West the great ordinance on the one side from the castle of BUDA, and on the other from mount S. Gerard, did so securely stand vpon the hill, that no man could without most manifest danger there abide. For BUDA standing vpon the hill, and deuided from PESTH by the riuer, so overlooked it, and commandeth all the plain country about PESTH, that without perill no man can stir on any side of the citie, but Northward towards AOKA, covered by the citie from the shot out of BUDA. As the Marquess was coming thither, he was told by certaine fugitiues, that BALIS Gouernour of BUDA (who in that place succeeded Solyman the Hungarian renegate, lately before dead of the plague) had in garrison in BUDA two thousand horsemen; and that Iames the Persian Gouernour uernour of BOSNA, was come vnto him with three thousand mo: whereunto Amurathes had also joynd another thousand which he brought out of DALMATIA: and that Segemenes was come thither also with a thousand Ianizaries from CONSTANTINOPLE: as for the rest of the footmen, that they were but wild countrey people, fitter for labour than for seruice in warres. They told him also, that the enemies fleet consisted of sixtie small pinnaces, ten gallies, and a few other great boates: and that Solyman had commaunded his capitaines in any case to defend BUDA and PESTH to the last man, without regard of any other place. And had proposed vnto the valiant, great rewards; and to the cowardly, extreame punishment: charging them further, that if need were, they should in time send for Achomates the Generall of his European horsemen to SOPHIA, to aid them. The Turks vpon the approach of the Christians, issued out at one of the gates of the citie, and skirmished with the Hungarians: but after they had sufficiently proued one anothers strength, and some few were on both sides slaine, they retired into the citie, and the Hungarians to the campe. The next day after, Vitellius going out of the campe nere the citie with five companies, to chuse a place for planting the batterie; the Turks at one instant sallying out at two gates of the citie, gaue him a hoat skirmish, where at the first, the fight was begun with like courage and force: but the Turks still sending forth new supplies both of horse and foot, first the Christian footmen, and after that the horsemen, not able longer to endure the force of the Ianizaries, were constrained disorderly to retire, hauing lost in that retreat foure of their capitaines and two ensignes: and had not Vitellius with one companie of horsemen setted together, valiantly repulsed the insolent Ianizaries, the losse had bene much greater. Vitellius exceedingly grieved with this losse, and perceiuing the manner of the enemies fight, encouraged his souldiors, purposing if he could to be fully reuenged: and aboue all others, requested Perennis to be readie to ioine with him as occasion should require. Vitellius lay encamped in the kings orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally distant both from the great campe and from the citie: out of these orchards he went with twelue companies vnder their ensignes, commaunding the rest to stand still within the wals, in readinesse at all assaies: and so fetching a great compasse about, marched alongst the riuier side towards the citie: Neither did the proud enemy (brag of the former daies victorie) make any delay, but brauely sallied out at the east side of the citie, and couragiously charged them. But Vitellius warned of his former harme, and seeing his enemies come on as he desired, couered his shot with his pikes, and standing close, receiued the enemies charge: his shot still playing vnder the pikes, oftentimes vpon their knees: many of the Turks were there laid on ground, whilst they desperately fought to haue broken the order of the Christians. In the meane time, when many of the Turks horsemen and Ianizaries comming out of the gates, and diuers others beholding the fight were come ouer the riuier from BUDA, to be partakers of the victorie, had filled the hithermost banke; Vitellius in good time, of purpose by little and little retired, as if he had been overcharged: Then began the enemy to giue a great shout, and more fiercely to assaile the Christians: their horsemen also clapt behind them, to haue there charged them. Which thing Perennis diligently noting, and that the Turks in following of Vitellius were drawne a great way from the gates, he suddenly with his light horsemen clapt in betwixt the citie and the Turks at their backs, after whom followed also Mauritius (afterwards duke of SAXONIA) with a strong troupe of German horsemen, of purpose to haue shut them in for retiring backe againe into the citie. But then the Turks perceiuing the danger, and finding themselves shut in, stood as men more than halfe dismayed, bechinking themselves which way to take, and so began to retire. When Vitellius comming on couragiously with his pikemen and his harquebussiers, diuided into two wings, charged them fiercely; and the Hungarian and German horsemen breaking in amongst them on the other side, made great slaughter of them, and stricke such a feare amongst the flying Turkes, that many of them in running to the gate, thrust one another thorow with their pikes, diuers other were also by the horsemen driuen into the riuier, and there drowned. That day Segemenes lost aboue an hundred of his Ianizaries, and foure hundred others. The chiefest commendation for this piece of seruice was giuen to Vitellius, who had so well and so quickly reuenged himselfe of the Turkes: and next him to Perennis, who as a skilfull capitaine had so well awaited the time to entrap the enemy: neither is Mauritius the young Saxon prince vnworthie his due praise, who valiantly charging the Turkes, and hauing his horse slaine vnder him, was in danger to haue bene there lost himselfe, had not Nicholas Ribische one of his followers, couered him with his owne bodie, vntill

A such time as that hee was rescued by others, Ribische himselfe presently dying of his wounds. This little victorie so encouraged the Germanes, that the Marquesse commaunded the great ordnance to be presently brought forth, and the batterie planted, which was at the first placed: so farre off, that it did little harme, although the wall were both old and thin, not aboue fise foot thicke: and the ordnance laied either a little too low, or mounted too high, either shot short, or quite ouer the citie into BUDA: which fault once perceiued, the batterie was remoued neerer, and a faire breach soone made in the wall, with the continuall beating of fortie great pieces of artillerie. Vitellius was the first that offered to assault the breach, so that the Germanes would presently second him, which thing they all by holding vp of their hands promised courageously, but cowardly about by and by to breake that promise: for oftentimes it chanceth, That they which before the danger are readiest to promise their helpe, are in the very danger it selfe of all others most slacke. The Hungarians also for their parts promised not to be behind. The silence of the enemy at the breach and in the citie, was wonderfull, so that many thought he had bene fled backe ouer the riuier to BUDA: for Segemenes capitaine of the Ianizaries, an old beaten souldior, ordered all things with as little stir as was possible: He had receiued new supplies from Plamas, and had cast a deepe countermure within the wall against the breach, and on the inner side of the same had made a strong barricado, with gabions and wine vessels filled with sand and earth: behind which stood the Ianizaries, & next vnto them the Turkish archers, and last of all the horsemen who had left their horses to serue on foot. The signall for the assault once giuen, foure Italian capitaines ran desperately with their companies by the ruines of the wall to the breach: but whilst they there set vp their ensignes, and wondering at the enemies fortification, were readie betwixt hope and feare to leape downe, they were suddenly ouerwhelmed with a shoure of arrowes and bullets. Yet Vitellius still encouraging them, brought them still on, who did what they might to haue entred: but the Germane footmen with their Generall stood still vnder the wals, looking on, as men nothing moued either with the hope of victorie or danger of their friends: and the Hungarians not so much as once looking vpon the enemy, retired: two of the Italian capitaines, Rufus and Fiolla were there slaine, and Carolus, Vitellius his nephew, shot in the shoulder. The Turks with shot and stones still repulsed and beat downe the Italians, whereof the Germanes also standing still, felt part, and were more gauled than a man would haue thought men could haue bene, that did nothing: for there they still stood for shame, least if they should haue also first retired, they should haue incurred a second infamie as bad as the first. Which thing Vitellius perceiuing, would in no case depart from the breach, but wished rather to lose his men by whole companies, than to leaue the least colour of excuse to the Germanes, or that they should say they stayed longest, of whom he with greater anger than greefe complained, that he was forsaken and cowardly betrayed. In time of this assault one of the Turks was heard to speake aloud in the Italian tongue, Why doe not you valiant Italians spare your selues, and giue place to those lasse Germanes. We all wish to spare you, and to beat the drunkenesse out of their most cowardly heads, that they should no more hereafter prouoke us. At length the Germanes wearie of their hot standing and nought doing, got them farther off, after whom the Italians forthwith retired: but so disorderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the enemies shot, that if the Turks had at the same time sallied out at all the gates, it was thought that the whole campe had bene greatly endangered. In this attempt rather than assault, seuen hundred Christians were slaine outright, and many more hurt, who died afterwards of their wounds.

All this while the Marquesse and Hugonot the great commanders of the armie, kept themselves so farre from gunshot, that they were no where to be scene, vntill that Tornielius and Fotiscu, two valiant capitaines, finding them out, wished them for shame to shew themselves for the comforting of the armie. A little before night they consulted with the other capitaines, Whether they should forsake the siege, or continue it still: whereof most of the Germanes best liked to be gone, as the safest way: though Vitellius & some others spake earnestly to the contrarie. At which time a spie comming in, brought newes that Achomates, Solymans lieutenant of the European horsemen, had passed ouer the riuier SAUUS at BELGRADE, and was comming to DRANUS: while comming either cunningly fained, or vainly beleueed, caused the Germanes to make a short conclusion, and to resolute flatly to returne to VIENNA, fearing that if they should longer continue the siege, they should be stayed against their wils by Achomates. Which thing made many of the old Germane souldiors to hang their heads for shame, and the Hungarians to curse both the Germanes and the hard fortune of their nation; vainly wishing for a Generall in courage answerable to the strength of that great armie. Segemenes perceiuing how much the Christian armie was discouraged by the last dayes euill successe, early in the morning, courageously sent out all the horsemen, and after them certaine companies of footmen, to relieue them in their retire; who in many places skitmished with the Hungarians, being nothing inferiour vnto them either in courage or skill: and the matter was brought to that passe, as if it had beene so agreed vpon, that many of the most notable and expert souldiours on either side encountered together hand to hand in the sight of the Italians and Germanes, the Hungarians mixt with the Turks, and the Turks with the Hungarians, with such fidelitie, that they regarded no other enemie but him whom euery one had singled out for himselfe, as if it had beene in a triumph for exercise hand to hand. It happened, that a notable captain of the Turks, desired to see Vitellius, who being shew- ed vnto him (for he was easie to be knowne by his armour) the Turke ran vnto him to embrace him for his honour, and so departed. About fise hundred horsemen so encountered one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were slaine or hurt. The night following the batterie was removed, and the armie matched towards the riuer to the fleet. The Turks perceiuing the Christians to be departed, sallied out of the citie on all hands, and with a great crie vpbraiding them of cowardise, hardly pursued the rereward of the armie. Vlamas was come ouer himselfe from Buda, and so eagerly followed the armie, that it could hardly haue escaped without great danger, had not Vitellius with his Italians made a stand, and requested the Hungarian & German horsemen to turne backe vpon the enemie: which they at his request did, and not onely repulsed the enemie, but also put him to flight, and in the chase slew many. After which time the armie passed on quietly; yet feuen hundred Germanes which were sicke and stragled behind the armie, were by the Turks horsemen miserably slaine in the sight of their fellows. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turks, first at Exek, then at Buda, and now at Pesth, returned full of heauinesse and greefe, as they which were now to forget the subduing of HUNGARIE, and to become carefull of GERMANIE it selfe. The armie comming to VIENNA, was there broken vp, and the Italians sent home into their countrey, who for most part died by the way, of infection taken in the campe in strange aire, and a most queasie time of the yeare.

But to couer the shame of this vnfortunat expedition, and to turne mens talke another way by some notable accident: Petrus Perennis the noble Hungarian was the man pickt out for the purpose to fill mens mouths. He, belayed with the enuie of the court, was for suspicion of aspiring to the kingdome of HUNGARIE, by the commaundement of king Ferdinand apprehended by Liscamus, a Spanish capitaine, in the castle of STRIOONIVM as a traitor, and presently deliuered to Medices the Admirall, to be conueyed vp the riuer to VIENNA. Liscamus at the time of his apprehension most couetously and vncourteously tooke from him his chaine, and a rich cloke lined with fables: which indignitie done to so noble a gentleman, so much offended the minds of the rest of the Hungarians, that about twelue thousand of them thereupon presently returned home to their owne dwellings, cursing the Germanes to the diuell. This Perennis was one of the greatest peeres of HUNGARIE; but of a most haughtie and magnificent mind, so that hee would sometime haue almost an hundred goodly spare horses fit for seruice led before him without his riders; & would sometime speake too liberally against the batennesse of king Ferdinand's court, who polled by his courtiers, hardly maintained his state: which his surpassing magnificence and princely port was cause y enough for the other great courtiers to enuie at his estate, and to seeke his overthrow; who as men overcharged with the burthen of another mans vertue, whereof they neuer bore the least part, and alwayes gaining by the deprauing of other mens perfection, conspired together his overthrow; and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would say, That he fauoured of a crowne. This notable man, as he had many worthie vertues, so was he not without cause, noted of ambition and vnconstancie: For after that king Lewes was lost, he disdaining the preferment of John the Vayvod to the kingdome of HUNGARIE, tooke part with king Ferdinand against him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour vnto himselfe: but after he saw king John againe restored, and his state strongly supported by Solyman, and that all things stood doubtfull and tickle with Ferdinand; he with like leuitie fought meanes by Abraham the great Bassa to be reconciled to king John; which was hardly obtained of him by the intercession of Solyman himselfe (as is before declared) to whom he gaue his sonne as pledge of his fidelitie. After which time he liued in great honour and loyaltie all the raigne of king John: but

A but after he was dead, and saw George the bishop the kings tutor, doing what he list to raigne like a king, he disdained his government, and sollicit by king Ferdinand, reuolted again vnto him, and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the kingdome. But now falling into the enuie of the court, mallice found out matter y enough to worke his confusion. First it was giuen out, That his sonne, who had many yeares beene detained in Solyman's court, as pledge of his fathers faith, was euen then vnder the colour of a faigned escape come into TRANSILVANIA; when as he had secretly agreed with Solyman, that his father being a man much fauoured of the people, should by promising them all possible freedome, allure them to the Turkish subjection: in reward of which good seruice he should be made gouernor of the kingdome of HUNGARIE, and put in hope also to be made the tributarie king thereof, if it should fortune the young king to die: Besides that, it was accounted a thing very suspitious, that hee had the Winter before vled great kindnesse and friendship toward the Turkish captaines, by sending them great presents, and receiving the like againe: And last of all, his letters directed to certaine Hungarian captaines were produced, wherein he seemed to promise them, as his friends and followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his present estate: All which things king Ferdinand (of his owne disposition, not easily to be perswaded to conceiue euill of the Germanes his countrey men, were it neuer so apparant or true, but of strangers any thing quickly beleued, and therefore caused him (as is before said) to be apprehended. But Perennis as he was brought by Medices the Admirall to VIENNA, when he was come neere vnto the gate of the citie, and heard that Philippus Tormellius, with certaine other braue captaines of his acquaintance, were come to meet the Admirall; he requested that the close coach wherein he rid might be opened, and that he might haue leaue to speake to those noble and valiant gentlemen: Which thing was easily granted, for that the nobilitie and approoued valour of the man seemed vnto them which had the charge of him, vnworthie of such restraint of libertie or imprisonment, yea or of the least suspicion thereof. So he turning himselfe towards them, spake vnto them in this sort.

Wretched I, noble gentlemen (said he) whom despitfull enuie hath circumuented guilelesse: but much more miserable king Ferdinand, whom domesticall theues bereaues of substance, friends, and honour all at once. For so it commeth to passe, that by this inconsiderat wrong done vnto me, he shall utterly lose the loue and fidelitie of the Hungarian nation, and may therefore for euer not without cause despaire for the obtaining of the kingdome of HUNGARIE; sithence that it is not lawfull for me (inferiour to none of my nation in birth, and hauing for my good and faithfull seruice well deserved reward of a iust king) so much as to reioice for the deliuerance of my sonne from the captiuitie of the Turkes, but that by my sinister fortune, dreadfull death in stead of incomparable ioy must be presented to mine eyes. For will these malicious pick-thanks, guiltie of their owne cowardise, the wicked contriuers and witnesses of my wrongfull accusation, spare me, being laid fast and in durance, which neuer spared the kings honour? For euery man of what nobilitie soeuer, be he neuer so guilelesse, when he is once in hold, must be content to endure, not what he hath deserved, but what his hard fortune assigneth. Yet my vpright mind and cleare conscience, which onely thing God the most iust indge leaueth as a comfort to men in miserie wrongfully accused, admonisheth me of this take: and so will the Marquesse our Generall, to whom I before vpon a mistrust foretold, that such a danger would shortly befall me, and that I had rather be slaine guilelesse, than to withdraw my selfe from triall: which thing I told him at such time as I was souldard with mine owne strength, that I feared no mans force. I beseech you, doe me this honourable fauon, as a request king Ferdinand in my behalf quickly and honourably to proceed to the trial of my cause, and according to his owne princely disposition, and not the will of others, to discern betwixt his faithfull friends and faigned flatterers. Truly wee are too too vnfortunat captaines, if for a little euill successe we shall be so aduantaged as men that had overthrown their fortune. Cazians peradventure receiued the iust punishment hee had deserved for the shamefull forsaking and losing of the armie at Exek, when as he possessed with an vnquoth feare forgot the dutie of a Generall, more afraid of death than dishonour: for when he had voluntarily committed himselfe to safe custodie, he was so generally condemned of cowardise, that despairing to defend his cause, he brake prison, and as wickedly as vnfortunatly reuolted to the Turkes: But neither was I of late the Generall, neither were we vanquished, although we prevailed not, but honourably retiring, valiantly repressed the insolencie of the pursuing enemie. As for the kingdome of HUNGARIE, I might then well haue affected the same, and easily haue deserued it at Solyman's hands, when as king Ferdinand, after the death of king Iohn, was making his preparation for that warre: G at which time my friends and followers at my deuotion, with the loue of the Hungarians towards me, seeming of no small importance for the obtaining of the victorie, might haue ministered no vnreasonable or vnreasonable hope to haue drawne a man into courses not altogether befitting a Christian. wherefore I haue, and will so long as I liue, fight against the Turkes, if king Ferdinand shall shew himselfe an indifferent iudge in this accusation, falsely surmised against me by the malice of mine enemies.

When he had made an end of speaking, the Admirall courteously perswaded him to haue good hope in the clemencie of the most iust king; and shortly after performed his request: for he and Torniellus taking the king as he was hunting, entreated him to deale fauourably with Pe- H renus: For all that, Perenus could not obtaine that his cause might be openly heard; but was committed to safe keeping, there to remaine in perpetuall prison: but whether it was for the mis-prision of new treason, or for reuenge of his old inconstancie, is vncertaine. Thus, three the only great princes left of the Hungarian blood, equally worthe of the kingdome, Valentine, Maylar, and Perenus, snarled almost in like snares of enuie, cut off all hope of raising a king to their feditious and therefore miserable countrey men: when as Perenus lay too late bewailing his vncon-stancie in perpetuall prison; and the other two fast in chaines neere vnto the Euxine sea, expected death the end of their miseries. This end had the wars, taken in hand against the Turkes by the generall consent of the Germans in the year 1542; which many thought, might worthily be compared with the greatest losses of those times: VVhen as king Ferdinand, hauing in vaine I before conceiued of the strength of GERMANIE; had now as a weakie prince, and subject to iniurie, prouoked against him the Turkes, bold enough otherwise, but as then insolent for their late victories.

Polinus the French kings embassadour still following the Turkes court, ceased not by all meanes to sollicite Solyman, with his gallies to aid the king his master in the inuasion of the dominions of Charles the emperour, in ITALIE, SICILIE, and SPAINIE. In which sute, he was so crossed by Solyman the eunuch Bassa, then Vezier, that he was almost in despaire of speed: for the malicious eunuch, being himselfe a great sea man, and enuying the honor of Barbarussa (who was to be employed in that seruice) fought by keeping him out of all honourable actions, to diminish his former glorie; and concerning the present, protested openly as he sat in counsell, that he saw no other cause why the Turkish emperour should to his great charge and the common danger, send out such a fleet; but to serue Barbarussa his own turne. But Solyman hauing diligently heard, and deeply considered of that the Bassas had said; rejected their opinions, who would not he should haue giuen the French king aid: and honorably decreed, according to his promise, whatsoever should ensue thereof; to send his fleet vnto the king by Barbarussa. Two daies after, the French embassadour before in dispaire, but now reuiued with that decree, was solemnly feasted by Rustan Bassa, Solymans sonne in law; and by Solyman the eunuch Bassa: for so it was their Great masters pleasure, both of them joying of him for the friendship confirmed betwixt the two princes by sending this fleet. After which, diuers gifts were bestowed vpon the embassadour L and his chiefe followers; and at such time as he was to take his leaue, Solyman gaue him great and charge of his naue, that it might be safely kept, and so after the seruice done, againe returned; and withall, deliuered him letters vnto king Francis, wherein after the glorious rehearfall of his proud titles, he writ vnto him as followeth:

Solyman letters to the French king.

We haue vpon a brotherly bountie, granted vnto Polinus your embassadour, such and so great a fleet as you haue desired, thorowly furnished for all assaies: whose direction we haue commaunded Hatiaden our Admirall to follow, and by your appointment to proceed against the enemy. But you shall doe well and friendly, the wars once happily ended, to send backe againe my fleet to CONSTAN-TINOPLE. All things shall undoubtedly fall out according to your owne desire and mine, if you shall M carefully take heed, that Charles the Spanishe king, your perpetuall enemy, doe not againe deceiue you with the motion of a deceitfull peace. For then shall you bring him to a most indifferent peace, when you haue before brought vpon his countries all the calamities of warre.

Polinus

Polinus taking his leaue of Solyman then lying at HADRIANOPLE, returned to CONSTAN-TINOPLE, where he found Barbarussa with an hundred and ten gallies, and fortie galliots readie to put to sea, which he had with incredible celeritie rigged vp and furnished. And so setting forward the eight and twentieth of Aprill, in the year 1543, and passing the straits of HELESPO-NTVS, he arrived first at CARSTVS in EVBEE; and from thence to MALLA, where he was by contrarie winds cast into the bay of LACEDEMON, and there staid nine daies before he could double the cape of METAPONTVM, called in auncient time TERNARVS: After that he came to METHON, and from thence crossing the Ionian, came to the strait of MESSANA; where the Turkish pirats being come with their galliots within the sight of RHODVM, began to land their men. They of RHODVM seeing so great a fleet, and the Turkes already landing, fled out of the citie for feare: but the castle was still kept by Didacus Gaetanus a Spaniard, who refused to B haue any parley with Polinus the French embassadour; and with shot out of the castle slew certaine of the Turkes: wherewith the rest being entaged, brake into the citie, and finding it desolat, set it on fire; sore against the will of Polinus and Barbarussa, who sought to haue found out the authors thereof, and to haue punished them accordingly.

After that, certaine pieces of great ordinance were landed and planted against the castle, which with a few shot so terrified the captaine, already troubled with the crying out of his wife, that he without any more ado yielded himselfe and the castle with all therein, into the hands of the enemie: vnto whom with his wife and children, Barbarussa at the request of the French embas-sadour, granted both life and libertie: the rest he shut vp in a church, and gaue the spoile of the C castle to his souldiours. There was in the garrison of the castle about seauentie Spaniards, but many more citicens, which were all carried away prisoners. One of the captaines daughters, a young gentlewoman of exceeding beautie, had with her good grace so warmed the withered affection of the old pirat Barbarussa, that he now fitter for the graue than for marriage, became amorous of her person: so that taking her from her father, and cutting her into the Mahometane superstition, he made of her as of his wife: Insomuch, that certaine moneths after, he welcomed and bountifully entertained the captaine as his father in law, comming to see his daughter at the port called PORTVS HERCVLIS in TVSCANIE, where the Turkes fleet then lay. Barbarussa sayling alongst the coast of ITALIE, came to OSTIA, in the mouth of the riuier Tiber, and brought such a feare vpon the citie of ROME, that the citicens were readie generally to haue forsaken the D citie; had not Polinus by his letters to Rodolphus the cardinall, then the great bishop Paulus his legat in the citie; in part staid the sudden tumult. The bishop himselfe was then at BVXETVM; a towne betwixt CREMONA and PLACENTIA, traouelling (in shew) with the emperour; to haue made a peace betwixt him and the French king: but labouring in secret to haue bought of him the dukedome of MILLAN, for Octauius his kinsman, the emperours sonne in law. Polinus his letters written to the cardinall at ROME, and sent by the Gouernour of TERRACINA, were to this effect.

The fleet which is by Solyman sent for the defence of FRANCE by Barbarussa his Admirall, is The French em-by his appointment at my commaund: so that it is not to hurt any but our enemies: wherefore make E it knowne to the Romans, and others dwelling alongst the coast of the Popes territorie, that they feare of us no hostilitie: For the Turkes will neuer violat the faith of their emperour solemnly giuen vnto me: and you know most assuredly, that the French king desireth nothing more, than that the estate of ROME might not only be kept in safetie, but also flourish most gloriously, and be therefore preserved from all iniurie. Fare you well.

In like manner he also comforted vp them of NAPTUNIUM and OSTIA, so that they brought vnto the Turkes all manner of victual; and sometimes for foure sheepe or a couple of oxen, redeemed a good prisoner taken in some place of the kingdome of NAPLES. Yet for all this, the Romans did not so much credit the embassadours promise in the behalfe of the Turkes good dealing, but that many of the weaker sort fled out of the citie into the country by night, although the chiefe magistrates did what they might to haue staid them: VVhen Barbarussa had thus liued three daies in the mouth of the riuier of Tiber, and there watered, he passed alongst the coast of ETRVRIA and LVCA, without doing any harme; and so sailed directly to MARITIMA: Where leading him with his fleet for a while, expecting the French kings

farther pleasure; we will againe returne vnto Solyman, who at the same time that Barbarossa was spoiling the frontiers of the emperours dominions in ITALIE, came with a great armie into HUNGARIE, for the more assured possession of that kingdome, wherafter he saw king Ferdinand so much longed. And because he would make all sure before him, he sent Amurathes Gouverneur of DALMATIA, and Vlamas the Persian gouernour of BOSNA, to besiege WALPO; a strong town scituate vpon the riuer Dranus, not far from EXER, famous for the ouerthrow of the Christian armie vnder Cazzianer: after whom followed also Achomates the great commander of his European horsemen. This towne (part of Perennis his possessions) was against all these forces kept and worthily defended by Perennis his wife (her husband then lying in prison at VINNA) and her friends, by the space of three months: but was at last by the treacherous souldiors deliuered to the enemy, together with their Generall; whom when they could by no means persuade to consent to the yeelding vp thereof, but that he would needs hold it out to the last, they tooke him perforce, and so deliuered him with the towne to the Turkes: who receiued him with all courtesie, and vsed him honourably: but those traitorous souldiors, whether it were in detestation of their treacherie, or for the spoile of them, were all put to the sword; the just reward of their treason. The rest of the citizens were by the Turkes taken to mercie, and well vsed. The bishop and chiefe men of QVINOVA ECLASIA, a famous citie not far off on the other side of Dranus, hearing of the losse of WALPO, and terrified with the greatnesse of the Turkes armie, fled for feare, leauing none but the meaner sort of the people in the citie, who willingly yeelded the same vnto the Turks. The next towne of any strength was SOCRISIA, belonging also to Perennis, which for a while held out against the Turks, for that diuers gentlemen of the countrey which were fled into the citie, encouraged the citizens to stand vpon their defence. But after much harme done on both sides, when they were no longer able to hold out, they retired into the castle in hope to haue so saued their liues and libertie by yeelding: but Amurathes was so offended with them, that he would come to no reasonable composition, or promise them any thing more than that they should at their pleasure come forth: and so as they came out at the gate, slew them euerie mothers sonne, thereby to terrifie others from making like resistance.

Solyman vnderstanding all these things, gaue those townes which were taken, to Amurathes the Generall: and hauing put all things in readinesse, departed from BUDA with all his armie to besiege STRIGONIUM; which was then kept by Liscanus and Salamanca, two proudcouetous Spaniards, with a garrison of thirtene hundred souldiors, whereof some few were Spaniards and Italians, and the rest Germans. Paulus bishop of STRIGONIUM, got himselfe out of the citie betimes, despairing of all mercie if he should haue fallen into the power of Solyman, by whose intermission he had been once before reconciled to king John; and had againe reuolted from him to king Ferdinand. The castle of STRIGONIUM was scituate vpon a high hill, ouerlooking Danubius running vnderneath it, the wals were built euen without any flankers; after the old manner of building before the inuention of guns: For which cause, Vitellius and Tennellus, two expert capitaines (the yeare before sent from the king to view the place, and the manner of the fortification) were of opinion, that the citie could hardly be defended, if it were besieged by any strong enemy: being subject also vnto a hill not far from the gates of the citie, against which inconueniences, the old garrison souldiors which wintered in STRIGONIUM, cast vp new bulwarks and fortifications, and after the manner of windie headed men, making great boast before the danger, what they would do, seemed to with for the coming of Solyman. But after that the barbarous enemy had with his tents couered the fields and mountains round about the citie, and withall brought a gallant fleet vp the riuer, all those brags were laid in the dust; & every man began to grow doubtfull of his owne safetie: for that they being but few (although men of good worth) were to withstand the infinit number of such enemies; as oftentimes vied most desperately to expose their liues to all manner of dangers. This their feare was also increased by the coming of certaine messengers from Solyman, who vnderstanding of what the garrison consisted, sent vnto the citie three of his owne guard, one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all renegade Christians; that euerie one of them might without an interpreter, speake vnto their countrey men in their owne language: These men admitted into the citie, offered great rewards and large entertainment in the name of Solyman, to such as would in time yeeld; denouncing all torture and extremities vnto them which should endure the summons of the cannon. Whereunto it was answered by the capitaines, That those faithfull and valiant sould-ors, who had reposed their last hope in their armes, were neither to be wooen by gifts, nor terrified with threats. With which answer the messenger returned, and the same day the Turkes great ordinance was planted vpon the hill before the gate of the citie, and the weakest parts of the wals round about the citie, so well pickt out by the Turks to be assaulted; as that they could not more skilfully or commodiously haue been chosen out of them which had within most diligently viewed euerie thing: so that it is to be thought, that the Christians wanted not onely fortune against the Turks, but also faith amongst themselves. Salamanca, distrusting the fortifications of the suburbs, retired into the citie, contrary to that he had before vainly boasted. Achomates Generall of the European horsemen, laid siege to that part of the wall which was next to the bishops gardens: Vlamas the Persian besieged the towne neere vnto the gate towards BUDA: The Alapi or common souldiors were by their capitaines brought on to dig trenches and cast vp mounts, as was thought most conuenient. It is incredible to be spoken with what furie the great ordinance was discharged, without ceasing; in somuch that the towne with a great part of the wall neere vnto it, shaken with continuall batterie, fell downe with such violence, as if all had been shaken with a most terrible earthquake: neither was any man able to stand vpon the wals, but that the Janizaries with their harquebusiers out of their trenches and from their mounts, would most certainly fetch him off: and many which stood within farther off, were with the Turkes arrowes falling from high, as if it had bene out of the ayre, grievously wounded. But that which most troubled the defendants, and did them greatest harme, was the stones, which beaten in sunder with the great shot, and not to be auoided, did with their peeces kill or maim the souldiors neere hand: With which dangers they were enforced to forsake the vttermost wall, and to cast vp new fortifications within, that they might with lesse danger defend the place. Neither in the enemy wanted courage to assaile the breach: thise they desperately attempted to haue entered, and were alwaies with losse repulsed. In which assaults amongst others, Bul-tacer Sanzacke of SELYMBRIA, a man of great account among the Turkes, was lost. Whilest the defendants were thus busied, many of the souldiors and mariners which came vp the riuer, with all things necessarie for the armie from BUDA, went on shoare and lay in the suburbs of the citie, in such securitie, as if there had been no enemy nigh: which thing they in the citie perceiving, suddenly sallied out vpon them fearing no such matter, and slew many of them, before they could arme themselves, and draue the rest to their fleet: so that betwixt fighting, and flying there was about two hundred of them slaine. Zymar a Persian, Admirall of the fleet, in rescuing of them which to saue their liues fled vnto the riuer, was shot thorow with a small shot, and slaine. Whilest these things were in doing, and the Turkes hauing in many places sore shaken the wall, did with greater force daily assaile the citie, and the defendants with their continuall losses and out of hope of all reliefe were more and more discouraged: an old Calabrian engineer, which had long time serued king Ferdinand, fled out of the citie to the Turkes, who being courteously entertained by Solyman, and examined by the Bassaes of many things concerning the strength and state of the citie, satisfied them in all that they desired; and farther, directed them in planting their batteries in places most conuenient for the speedie taking of the towne. In the meane time, whilest the Turkes were with restless labour battering the wals, and working in their mines, it fortuned that a gilt brassen croffe which stood vpon the top of the steeple of the Cathedral church, was by the continuall shooting of the Turkes thereat, at length beaten downe: at the sight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the superstitious manner of that nation, taking the chance as a token of his good lucke, cried out presently, STRIGONIUM is woon.

Liscanus and Salamanca fearefully consulting of the euent of the siege, and secretly conferring together, resolved to saue themselves, and to giue vp the towne. Liscanus was no great souldior, and yet by continuall spoile growne exceeding rich, and therefore thought it but follic to buy the name of a resolute capitaine at too deare a price, with the losse of his life and wealth. The like feeling was also in Salamanca, who preferred the safetie of himselfe and of that which he had got in long seruice, before all credit and honour, were it neuer so great. This their purpose was not kept so secret, but that it was noised abroad amongst the common souldiours, of whom almost the third part was now either slaine, or with wounds or sicknesse growne weake: yet were they all of opinion generally, That they were still strong ynough to defend the towne. But the vnder capitaines and auncients vsing to flatter their Generals, liked well of the motion, to yeeld vnto Solyman vpon reasonable conditions, rather than to expose themselves to most certaine death, which should nothing better king Ferdinands cause. Not long after, an Aunient was by night let downe ouer the wall: and hauing by an interpreter received the Turks faith, called forth Salamanca, that he might vpon better conditions goe thorow with them for the yeelding vp of the towne. Who without further delay comming out, went to Achomates; commaunding before he went them which defended the water tower next vnto the riuer side, a place of great danger, for safegard of their liues to get themselves into the cite: who terrified with that newes, and hastily retiring, were by the vigilant Turks which lay at the siege thereof, perceiued, who suddenly breaking in, slew such as were not yet gone, & possessed the castle. But Salamanca being brought before the great Bassas, when he had stood vpon many nice tearmes, and required many things to haue bene graunted him, obtained no more, but that they should without delay yeeld vp the cite, and put themselves wholly to the mercie of Solyman. So the Spaniard being there stayed, himselfe writ to Liscanus, how he had sped; willing him forthwith, if he loued his owne salerie, to yeeld the cite, without standing vpon further tearmes. Liscanus vpon receipt of these letters coming forth to the souldiours, declared vnto them the necessitie of yeelding vp of the towne, and what hope there was to escape with life and libertie. But whilest the souldiours filled with indignation, stood as men in doubt what to doe, Halis commander of the Ianzaries came vnto the gate, and with cheerefull rather than sterne countenance required to haue it opened vnto him according to the agreement made by Salamanca in the campe; which was forthwith opened by Liscanus, and the keyes deliuered vnto him: the Ianzaries entring peaceably into the cite, possessed themselves of the wals and fortresses round about, commaunding the Christian souldiours to giue place, out of whom they chose all the beardless youths, and commaunded the rest to cast downe their harquebusers and other weapons in a place appointed, which they all for feare did, expecting nothing but some cruell execution to be done vpon them by the barbarous enimie. Which their feare was the more encreased by a strange accident, then vnlookily chancing: For whilest the souldiours did as they were commaunded, with their harquebusers cast their flasks full of powder also, one of them suddenly tooke fire of a match, which was by chance cast in amongst them with fire in it, which firing the rest, blew abroad all that heape of weapons amongst the Turks, which so filled them with anger and feare of some sudden trecherie, that they fell vpon the Christians, & slew diuers of them: vntill such time as Halis perswaded that it was a thing happened rather by chance than mallice, commaunded his Ianzaries to stay their furie. This tumult appeased, Halis caused proclamation to be made, That all such Christian souldiours as would serue Solyman in his warres, should haue such place in his armie as their qualitie required, with bountifull entertainment: yet of all the Christian souldiours were found onely fewentie, which carefull of their liues, accepted the offer; fearing that the Turkes would vpon such as refused exercise their wonted crueltie. Halis entertaining them courteously, sent them away with the other youths whom he had before culled out, downe the riuer to Bvda: the other souldiours he tooke into his protection, and vsed their labour to helpe the Turks to make cleane the castle. But Liscanus, who to saue his gold, had made shipwrack of his honour and reputation, was glad to giue vnto Halis the faire chaine of gold, which he had most couetously and insolently before taken from Perennis; when as Halis, who would otherwise haue taken it from him by force, by way of militarie courtesie, now craued it of him, as a strange kind of ornament amongst the Turks: with which gift he was in hope to haue saued the rest of his coine. But fortune fauoured not so much the couetous coward: For when he was about to depart away with his horses of seruice, which he kept very good, and had cunningly stuffed the saddles full of gold, thinking so slyly to haue coueyed it; the Turke laughing at him, tooke from him his horses furnished as they were, saying, That he which was to goe by water, needed no horses. So was the couetous wretch at once quit of the great wealth which he had in long time euill gotten. The captaines, with the rest of the souldiours dispoiled of their armes, were conueyed ouer the riuer of Danubius, and so travelled on foot to Possonium: where the countie Salme by the commaundement of the king apprehended Liscanus, Salamanca, and some other of the captaines for suspicion of treason, and committed them to safe custodie, there to answere for their cowardly yeelding vp of the cite.

Solyman entred into STRIGONIUM the tenth of August in the yeare 1543, and there conuerting the Christian churches into temples for the Mahometane superstition, first sacrificed for his victorie, as he had before done in Bvda: and after with all speed so strongly fortified the cite, as if he would thereby for euer haue taken from the Christians all hope of recouering the same againe; deriding the slouthfull negligence of the Germans, who possessed of it foureteeen years, had neglected all that time to fortifie it. Not long after, Solyman leauing Osfainus a valiant capitaine gouernour of STRIGONIUM, and sending his Tartarian horsemen to spoile the countrey on the left hand, as farre as ALBA REGALIS; went himselfe to besiege the castle of TATTA, called in auntient time THEODATA. The garrison souldiours terrified with the losse of STRIGONIUM, and the sight of the Turkes armie, vpon the first summons yeelded the castle without resistance, and were so suffered quietly to depart. That castle after the manner of the Turkish discipline (who with few and those very strong holds keepe their prouinces in subjection) was by Solymans commaundement presently rased downe to the ground. Torniellus Generall of the Italians, caused Hanniball, capitaine of the castle, to haue his head stricke off for his cowardly yeelding vp of the peece he had taken charge of: thereby to admonish others, which had the charge of strong places, not to refuse an honourable death in defence of their countrey, for feare of an ignominious death attending their cowardise.

TATTA thus layd in the dust, Solyman marched with his armie towards ALBA, surnamed REGALIS, for that the kings of HUNGARIA by an auntient custome vsed to be there crowned, and also buried. BVDA, STRIGONIUM, and ALBA REGALIS, three principall cities of the kingdom of HUNGARIA stand in manner of a triangle, almost equally distant one from another, about a hundred miles in compasse. BVDA and STRIGONIUM are situate vpon the riuer of Danubius; but ALBA standeth more into the land, strongly seated in the midst of a great lake, but not so wholesomely, especially in the Summer time, the Winter waters then decreassing, and grosse vapours arising with the heat of the Sunne. From the cite thorow the marish or lake vnto the firme land, lie three broad and high causeyes (in manner of the strakes of a cart wheele) well built with faire houses and gardens on either side, and a broad way in the middle whereby men passe in and out of the cite. At the end of euery causey towards the land were cast vp strong bulwarkes, which the citisens vsed not to watch but in dangerous times of watre: so that by these bulwarkes, the houses of the suburbs standing vpon these causeys, were safe from the danger of the enimie, the lake filling vp all the spaces betwixt the causeys: which, what for the depth, what for mud, flaggs, and bulrushes growing in it, was not by horse or man to be passed thorow. And the cite it selfe standing in the midst of the lake, compassed round about with a strong wall, and a deepe ditch alwayes full of water, was hardly to be besieged: for which causes a great number of the countrey people vpon the coming of Solyman, fled into it with their cartell, as vnto a most sure hold. In the cite lay in garrison two companies of Germans, and two hundred horsemen, vnto whom were joyned five hundred Hungarian horsemen, such as in time of peace liued by robbing, and are by an infamous name called Vsarous: vnto these, the Italian countie Torniellus, who with his Italians was come as farre as IAVARINUM, or RAB, sent foure captaines with their companies, such as were most forward in that seruice: after whom followed Barocius, capitaine of the kings guard, with a companie of horsemen, appointed by the king for Generall. Who was no sooner come into the cite, but news was brought of Solymans approach. Whereupon he in hast called together the other captaines; with Birrous then maior of the cite, and other the cheefe citisens, to consult with them, What was best to be done for the defence of the cite, but especially, Whether the suburbs of the cite, standing vpon those three broad causeys, were to be destroyed or not: that so the cite standing in the midst of the great marish, might both with lesse labour and danger be defended. This question was seriously debated, and great reasons alleaged on both sides: at last the citisens cried out with one voice against the matter, and said, That they would neuer suffer those goodly suburbs, wherein were so many churches and faire buildings as might compare with the cite it selfe, to be so shamefully destroyed, to the vtter vndoing of so many rich citisens: for what could be (said they) more dishonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous enimie, to shew such a token of extreame feare; and with their owne hands to burne and destroy those stately buildings, which might by strong hand be well enough defended against the enimie, if they did not play the shamefull cowards. Of which opinion with the citisens was also Osfainus Seroactus an Italian capitaine, al- leading that both the cite and the suburbs might both with like danger be defended: forasmuch as they were equally fortified with the benefit of the marish; and if the worst should happen, the defendants might yet safely enough retire into the cite. At last standing vp as one thrust forward,

A cowardly capitaine worthily rewarded.

Solyman goeth to Alba Regalis.

The description of Alba Regalis.

The citisens of Alba will not suffer the cite to be destroyed.

Generall of the Germans for his soldiours. Solyman the eunuch Bassa, offered vnto Rufus honorable entertainment, if he would haue serued Solyman: which when he refused as bound to king Ferdinand by oath, in honour of his valour he gaue him a rich cloake wrought with flowers of gold. The embassadours returning into the citie, and telling how they had sped, deliuered the citizens of a great feare. Shortly after the citie being yeelded, Achomates by open proclamation in the market place, commaunded the Italians and Germans to make themselves readie against the next day to depart, and to take good heed that no Hungarian went with them: hee also straightly charged the citizens to keepe their houses, vntill the strange souldiours were departed. At the time appointed, the Italians and Germans set forward, conducted by Homares with a companie of the Turks horsemen, who faithfully defended them against the Tartares, running vp and downe the countrey after spoile: neither was any thing taken from them but their dages, which the German horsemen after a new fashion carried at their saddle bowes; these the Turks greatly desired, delighted with the noueltie of the inuention, to see them shot off with a firelocke without a match. But after the departure of Homares, they were in their trauell set vpon by the Hungarians, with whom they had many hoat skirmishes, and had hardly escaped vnspoiled, had they not been rescued by the kings souldiours lying in garrison in the castles as they passed alongst the countrey. The few which remained, after many troubles came at last to VIANNA, more like ghaosts than men.

Solyman entring quietly into the citie, first visited the sepulchers of the Hungarian kings, and gaue out proclamation, That the Hungarians should feare of him no harme; for that he was not come to conquer them, but to deliuer them from the bondage of the Germans, and so to restore againe that entire kingdome vnto Stephen the right heire of king John. But within three or foure daies after, he called out the chiefe citizens into a field not farre off; wherein the bodies of condemned men were woont to be buried, as if he would haue there taken an oath of them for their fidelitie: whither, after they were all assembled in the best manner they could, as to some solema feast, the cruell tyrant (without regard of his faith or promise) caused them all to be slaine: Howbeit some report, that he caused them onely to be put to death which bare office in the citie, at such time as they reuolted from the obedience of the queene and the infant king, vnto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German souldiours; and that he sent the rest into exile to BUDA and BELGRADE. So Solyman leauing Balibei gouernour of ALBA REGALIS; and Mahomet sometime gouernour of BELGRADE, his lieutenant generall for the whole gouernment of that kingdom, returned againe toward CONSTANTINOPLE; Winter now beginning to approach: after he had that Sommer wooon STIGONIVM and ALBA REGALIS, two of the chiefe cities of HUNGARIE. All this while king Ferdinand had raised no power worth the speaking of, to withstand so mightie an enemy; onely at VIANNA lay seauen thousand Germans and foure thousand Italians, at such time as Solyman departed from ALBA REGALIS, which were shortly after discharged.

Whilest Solyman thus lay at the siege of ALBA REGALIS, he sent his Tartarian horsemen which serued him to small purpose in the siege, to spoile the countrey round about: these cruage people doing much harme, were in diuers places circumtented by the Hungarians; and about three thousand of them slaine: one of them being taken prisoner, had found in his knapsacke halfe a child, of about two yeares old, the loathsome remainder of his barbarous feeding; Barbarussa all this while lying with his fleet (as we haue before said) at MARSUS, fretted exceedingly; that he had to his dishonour vnderaken to long a voyage by sea, to please him which was not able (as he said) to direct his owne desires to any certain resolution; but shamefully suffered the best time of the yeare for service, negligently to passe away without any thing doing; the blame whereof would (as he said) be imputed to him at CONSTANTINOPLE: and that Solyman, who desired to aid the king his friend and confederat, and by all means to annoy his enemies, would take in euill part to haue reported, that he had with so great charge set out to great a fleet, and so far off, to helpe his friend hardly beset with his enemies, and yet had done nothing: besides that, he tooke on like a Turke; that he who in time of service, would negligently let slip the least opportunitie, should now blenish his former credit and estimation, by lying still all that Sommer in the harbour of MARSUS, where his souldiours grew idle with doing nothing. Wherefore Polinius going to the king, told him of the proud Turkes great discontentment for lacke of imployment; and returning to Barbarussa, brought word from the king, that he should lay siege to NICA a citie of PROVINCIA, then holden by the Duke of SAVOY. This citie standing vpon the sea, was by one of the French kings for a great sum of money pawned vnto the duke: which money king Francis had many times offered to haue repaid, but could neuer get the citie out of the dukes hands. Vnto which seruice, the French king sent also his fleet of two and twentie gallies and eigheteene ships, wherein were embarked eight thousand footmen, and victuall for many daies. This fleet departing from MARSUS, keeping close by the shoare, came to the port called MONOC; whither two daies after came Barbarussa also with an hundred and fiftie gallies. From thence Polinius by commandement from the king, writ vnto the State of GENVA, That they should not feare of that great fleet any hostilitie, which was not to hurt any but them of NICA, and not them neither if they would yeeld themselves. For more assurance whereof, he obtained of the Turks diuers GENVA captiues, which had long time been chained in their gallies, and courteously set them at libertie, and sent them home without ransom. After that, he friendly exhorted the citizens of NICA to yeeld themselves againe vnto their ancient and lawfull prince, renowned for his bountie and power; rather than to aduenture their state to all extremitie for that poore and distressed duke, who betwene the emperor and the French king, despoiled of the greatest part of his dominions, saw no other end of his miseries, but to leaue that little which yet remained, as a prey to the one or the other that should first lay hand thereon. Whereunto the magistrates of the towne answered, That they knew no other prince or soueraigne, but Charles their duke: wherefore he should desire farther to sollicit them by letters or messengers, whom they would make no other account of, but as of their enemies. Wherefore the Frenchmen and Turks landing their forces, laid siege to the towne in three places. The citizens had but a little before newly fortified their wals, by the direction of Paulus Simeon, capitaine of the castle, and one of the knights of the RODAS, a man of great experience; who long before taken at sea by pirats, had sometime serued Barbarussa, and therefore perswaded the citizens as resolute men to withstand the Turks. Which, that they should more constantly performe, he tooke their wiues and children, and weaker sort of the people into the castle; and from thence furnished the citizens with all things necessarie for their defence. The citie was at once in diuers places battered by the Turks and French, both by sea and land: so that at last the Turks had beaten downe one of the new built bulwarks, and made so faire a breach, that with their ensignes displayed, they attempted to haue entred: whose forwardnes Leo Strozza (then seruing the French king with a band of Italians) imitating, sought to haue entred also; but the citizens standing valiantly vpon their defence, manfully repulsed both the Turkes and Italians, and caused them with losse to retire. In this assault were slaine about an hundred Turkes; and of Strozza his souldiours two and twentie. Presently after, Barbarussa with all his force began afresh batterie, in such terrible manner, that the citizens seeing their wals in diuers places opened, and the few souldiours they had, sore wounded, and no hope to be in conuenient time relieved; began to parley with the French Generall from the wall, concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; vpon condition, that they might in all respects liue vnder the French king as they had done vnder the duke: for performance whereof, the Generall gaue them his faith. But Polinius fearing least the Turks should violate this composition, and for greefe of the losse of their fellows, or for hope of the spoile breake into the citie, entreated Barbarussa to recall his souldiours, and to cause them to goe about his gallies. For which cause not long after, the Ianizaries, as men deceived of their hoped prey, were about to haue slaine both Polinius and Strozza, as they came from talking with Barbarussa.

The citie thus yeelded, they began to consult for the taking of the castle; the performance whereof consisted first in the assailing of the castle it selfe, and then in defending of the citie from the sudden sallies of them in the castle; and likewise in defending of them which besieged the castle, so that no enemy should come to raise the siege: of which two things, Barbarussa put the French to choice which they would take, shewing himselfe readie either to besiege the castle, or to keepe the field. The French standing in doubt of which to make choice, the proud old Turke scorned their slow resolution, and them also, as men vnfit for the readie accomplishment of any martiall exploit; caused seuen pieces of batterie, whereof two were of wonderfull greatnesse, to be placed in a trice in place most conuenient, and the same quickly entrenched and fortified, to the great admiration of the French: with which pieces he had quickly beaten downe the battlements of the wals, and centenell houses, so that no man was able to shew himselfe vpon the wals.

Nica in Provinces besieged by the French and the Turkes.

The citizens came parley, and after yeeld the citie.

The castle besieged.

The Frenchmen likewise on the other side did with their great ordinance continually batter the castle: but with long shooting they came to such want of shot and powder, that Polinus was glad to request, that he might either borrow or buy some of Barbarussa: whereat the Turke fretted and fumed exceedingly. That they should in their owne country stand in need of his provision, who at Marsilles had better fraughted their ships with wine, than with necessities for the warres. For the rough and seuer old Turke could not forbear to taint them, and oftentimes complained, that he was deluded with the hope of great matters which Polinus had promised at Constantinople; and that in such a rage, that he would threaten to lay hands vpon Polinus, who had brought him from Constantinople thither, whereas he must either lose his honour, or hauing spent his shot and powder, expose himselfe and his fleet to all dangers. Wherefore being exceeding angry with the French, he suddenly called a counsell of his capitaines & other cheefe officers, giuing it out, That he would presently return toward Constantinople, seeing that among these cowardly and vnskilfull men (as it pleased him to reame them) he found nothing readie or according to promise. Yet for all that, when he had chased his fill, by the faire entreatance and large promises of the French Generall and Polinus together, the wayward old man was perswaded to change his mind, and to continue the siege. But he was yet scarcely well pacified, and his mind set againe vpon the siege, but letters were intercepted from the great capitaine Alphon sus Vastius, to Paulus capitaine of the castle, wherein he requested him to hold out a while against the enimie, vntill that he, who had already sent before his light horsemen, might come also himselfe with his men at armes, who were vpon the way along the Alps by the sea side, and would in two dayes with the slaughter of the Turkes put him and his castle out of all feare and danger. Which thing once bruted in the campe, such a great and sudden feare came vpon the Turks and Frenchmen, the night following (the more to terrifie them) proceeding by chance very rainie and tempestuous; that they all forooke their trenches and great ordinance, and laying downe their weapons, by narrow pathes climbing ouer the top of the high mountaine, came downe headlong to the sea side to the fleet. But the day appearing, and no enimie to be seene, they were ashamed of that they had done, and came againe to the siege. Not long after, when as the castle in all mens judgement was hardly to be battered, and standing vpon a firme rocke, was not but in long time with hard labour and doubtfull successe to be vndermined, it was generally thought good to raise the siege. The Turkes vpon their departure brake into the citie, and when they had taken the spoile thereof, set it on fire.

Barbarussa retiring with his fleet to Antipolis, came to anker at the Island Lerina, called of the marriners Margarita; at which time Vastius and the duke of Savoy, with Auria his fleet arrived at Villa Franca: in the entrance of which haven, the galley wherein Vastius went, was like to haue bene lost. Foure other galleys by force of sudden tempest were driuen vpon the rockes, and so suddenly beaten in peeces with the surge of the sea, that the galleys had not leisure to strike off their yrons, but were there all drowned, and all the ordinance lost. Polinus vnderstanding this distresse of the enimie, sent one Petrus Angelus to Barbarussa, to shew him the occasion offered, and to perswade him with all speed to hast thither with his fleet, as to a most assured victorie. Barbarussa seemed to like well of the motion, and promised to goe, yet he moued not, letted as it was thought with the contrarie wind, which then blew hard at East, and with the roughesse of the sea. But the wind being fallen, and the sea become calme, and he contrarie to his wonted manner making no hast, set slowly forward, and being a little on his way, came againe to an anker, and went no further; the Sanzackes and other capitaines first matuellling, and afterward laughing thereat, scoffingly said, That Barbarussa did but reason to deale kindly with Auria as his brother and friend of his owne profession, for that he had some yeares before receiued the like friendship at his hands, in letting himselfe escape at Hippona, which he now honestly paid him againe. Whereunto Barbarussa both then and afterwards at Constantinople answered no otherwise, but, That he being an old commander, and halfe blind, saw more in the matter than all those greene capitaines with their sharpe sight. Not long after, he returned againe towards Marsilles, and put into the haven of Tolon, called in ancient M time Tarenta. Vastius and the duke comming to Nice, commended the capitaine of the castle, and wondering at the cunning manner of the Turkes fortifications, preferred them in that point before the Christians. Barbarussa lying with his fleet at Tolon, and by the kings officers entertained with all possible courtesie, deliuered siue and twentie galleys to Salac the famous py-rat, and Assanes his nigh kinsman, who passing the bay of Narbon, rifled certaine townes in Spain, standing vpon the sea coast, and about the promontorie of Venus, called of the marriners Crem, tooke great prize, and in the haven of Palamos tooke one marchant ship and a galley: with which prey they passed ouer to Alouers, as they were commaunded, there to winter, and with the first of the Spring to returne againe to Barbarussa in Province. That Winter Barbarussa repairing his fleet, was furnished with many necessities by the Genowayes, and especially by Auria himselfe, who vnder the colour of redeeming of prisoners, willingly furnished the Turke with such things as he wanted: for although he professed himselfe one of the emperours capitaines, yet would he not shew an enemies mind by the vnseasonable deniall of a little sea furniture, least in so doing he should haue hurt his native country of Genoa; which he saw then subject to the iniurie of so great a fleet so nigh at hand. But leaue we now Barbarussa to Winter in Province, and with the course of time turne a little out of the way, to see in Mulass king of Tunes the small assurance the greatest haue in highest place of worldly honour.

This Mahometane king once before thrust out of his kingdome by Barbarussa, and restored againe by Charles the emperour (as is before declared) hearing of his comming with this great fleet, and imagining nothing lesse than that he should come to the aid of the most Christian king, doubted (not without cause) least it was prepared against himselfe. Besides that, diuers great cities of his kingdome, namely Constantina, Mahemedia, and Mahometa (called in ancient time Cyrtha) Leptis, and Adruventum, were then holden by the Turkes; Barbarussa his fauourits: wherefore fearing the worst, about the same time that Barbarussa was sayling alongst the coast of Italy, he passed ouer into Sicily, to haue met the emperour at Genoa, and to haue obtained of him greater aid against the Turkes. At his departure out of Affricke, hee committed the tuition of his kingdome to such valiant men as hee supposed would haue bene vnto him most faithfull: First he appointed Mahometes, then Maniphart, to gouerne the citie; and Corsus otherwise called Fares, his old seruant, to keepe the castle; leaving Mahometes his brother and Fares his sonne, with Touarres a Spaniard (captaine of the castle of Gyletta) as pledges, the one of his brothers, the other of his fathers faith: but vnto Amida (his sonne) he committed the leading of his men of war for the defence of his kingdome against the Turkes and Numidians. As hee was passing out of Sicily to haue met the emperour at Genoa, he was by contrarie winds driuen first to Cateta, and afterwards to Naples, where he was by the viceroy honourably entertained, and a house appointed for him richly furnished. The Neapolitanes wondering at the strange attire of the people, with the manner of their feeding, and curious plentie of all manner of sweet perfumes: for into euery dish they put in odors of exceeding price; so that it was well knowne, that a peacocke and two seifants, dressed after the manner of the kings kitchin, cost aboue an hundred ducats: so that not onely the dining chamber, when they were carued vp, but all the house was so filled with the strange and fragrant smell, that all they that dwelt neere thereabouts, were partakers of the pleasure of that vnusall and delicate perfume. From Naples he was about to haue trauelled by land to the emperour, being then in conference with the Pope at Buxetum (fearing to aduenture the sea, possessed by his enemies fleet) had not the emperour by his letters willed him to stay still where hee was. But whilest he made his abode at Naples, and carefully attended what course Barbarussa would take, who furnished with so great a fleet was departed from Nice, disappointed of his purpose; he was by certaine messengers aduertised out of Affricke, That Amida his sonne was risen vp against him, and possessing himselfe of the kingdome, had slaine his capitaines, polluted his viues, and taken the castle of Tunes. With which newes he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to passe ouer into Affricke, and though late, yet as he might, to remedie his domestical troubles, in hope to oppresse that rebellion in the beginning; and his sonne also, before he could gather any strength to rest vpon. Wherefore he with all the hast hee could opened his cofers, and entertained souldiours, the viceroy giuing leaue to all such banished men as would to come and giue their names, to passe ouer as souldiours into Affricke: vpon report whereof, such a number of malefactors & condemned persons came flocking to Naples, that it was thought a sufficient armie might haue bene made of such kind of men; euery one of them chusing rather to enter into pay, and blot out the infamie of banishment, and proue the fortune of warres, than to liue wandering vp and downe in the woods, and in danger euery houre to be hanged. Of these infamous men, one Ioannes Baptista Loffedius (a man well borne, but of a fiere and couetous disposition) vnderooke the leading: he couenanted with Muleasses to haue three moneths pay before hand, leuied eightene hundred men, which he presently shipped; and keeping the greatest part of their pay to himselfe, passed ouer with the king into AFRICK, and landed at GVLETTA. But how Amida rise vp against his father, and what was the end of that bloudie rebellion, shall not be amisse briefly to rehearse. There were certaine noble men of great authoritie about Amida when Muleasses departed, which at their pleasure ruled the young prince, who easily harkened vnto their counsell, and followed the same: the chiefe of these was one Mahometes, sonne of Bohamer, who in the raigne of Mahometes, Muleasses his father, was Manipher, whom Muleasses (possessed of the kingdome) put shamefully to death by cutting off his priuities, because he had by hastie marriage deceiued him of Rhamana, a maiden of incomparable beautie, the daughter of Abderomen captaine of the castle, whom he most passionately loued: for which cruell fact, Mahometes his sonne had of long time conceived a deadly hatred against Muleasses, which he had many yeares dissembled, that he might as occasion serued be the more cruelly reuenged. Next vnto him was another Mahometes turnamed Adulzes, whom Muleasses was wont commonly to call his worst seruant. These two with a few others conspiring together, gaue it out, that Muleasses was dead at NAPLES, and before his death had most irreligiously (as they accounted it) reuolted to the Christian religion. With which report they perceiuing Amida moued, came vnto him and perswaded him quickly to enter into his fathers seat, least Mahometes his younger brother then lying in hostage with the Christians at GVLETTA, should by the fauour and helpe of Touarres, whose garrison was euer readie, be preferred before him. For Mahometes was eightene yeares old, resembling his grandfather in name, fauour, and disposition, and therefore of the citizens of TVNES best beloved: wherefore Amida came in post hast out of the campe to TVNES, to lay first hand vpon his fathers kingdome. The people which as yet had heard nothing of the kings death, receiued him with doubtfull countenance: and as many stood maruelling that he was so rashly come into the citie without his fathers commandement, Mahometes (appointed by Muleasses to gouerne the citie) came out and sharply reproued him as guiltie of high treason, perswading him to returne againe vnto the campe: and seeing him stay, by force of the multitude thrust him out of the citie. Amida deceiued of his expectation, got him out of the way into the pleasant country of MARTIA, betweene VICA and the ruins of old CARTHAGE. But Mahometes Gouernour of the citie, after he had repulsed Amida, got him with all speed by water to Touarres at GVLETTA, to know of him more assuredly, if any such euill newes were brought from SICILIE of the death of the king; and to complaine of the rashnesse and intollerable presumption of Amida. Where straying somewhat long in discoursing with the captaine, and afterwards returning to the citie, he was suspected to haue practised with the captaine, to make Mahometes (the pledge in GVLETTA) king in his fathers stead; for so the common voice went. The Moores are by nature a faithlesse people, vnconstant, hastie, suspicious, desirous of newes, which true or false, they for the time interpret as serueth best their factions, whereunto they are exceedingly giuen: So at the first there rise in the citie a doubtfull rumour of the making of a new king; the suspicion whereof more and more encreasing, set all the citie on an vprore. By occasion whereof, certaine of the citizens to whom the verie name of Muleasses was odious, speedily certified Amida (then in the gardens of MARTIA, sighing and grieuing at his hard fortune) how all stood, and that now was the time to doe himselfe good. He reuiued with that vnexpected newes, and encouraged by the perswasion of Bohamer and Adulzes, and other his followers; resolved to take hold vpon that good offer of fortune which would not alwaies frowne, and to follow his good hap. So in hast returning to TVNES, and entring in at the gate which he then found open, ran presently to the gouernours house; and finding him not at home, cruelly slew all his household, and with his bloudie companie went presently to the castle: where Fares the captaine seeking to haue kept him out, and boldly laying hands vpon his horses bridle to haue thrust him backe, was by a desperat Ethiopian, one of Amida his followers, thrust thorow with a sword and slaine: ouer whose bodie yet sprawling, Amida forcing his horse, brake into the castle with his friends; and finding Mahometes gouernour of the citie, presently slew him also. And so by this meanes Amida in the space of an houre (a little before, a man in despaire) obtained the citie, the castle, and the kingdome together. After that, he murdered his younger brethren; and embred with bloud, without shame polluted his fathers concubines. Muleasses landed (as we haue before said) at GVLETTA, Amida thrust out of Tunes.

Amida returneth, and possesseth the kingdome.

GVLETTA, with such forces as he had brought with him out of ITALIE; was aduised by Touarres the Spaniard, not to adventure with such a handfull of men to go to TVNES, before he were well assured of the good disposition of the citizens towards him: And was the more earnest with Lofredius not to go, because the Viceroy had expressly written, that he should in no case go any further than GVLETTA, except the king according to his promise, had a good strength of Numidians to ioyne with him. But certaine of the noble men amongst the Moores, which vnder the colour of friendship were fled out of the citie, and had after the solempne manner of their nation put their swords vnto their throats, and sworne to be faithfull vnto him, wonderfully pricke forward both the king and Lofredius, two hastie of themselves, to their owne destinie, bearing them in hand, That Amida vpon the first sight of his father, would forsake the citie, and betake himselfe to flight: so without more staying, Muleasses with ensigne displayed set forward towards TVNES, Lofredius cheerfully following him, Touarres requesting them in vaine to be ware of the Moores treacherie. Muleasses marching still forward, was come so nigh the citie, that they might from the walls descrie him: when suddenly a strong troupe of Moores sallied out of the gate with a terrible crie, and fiercely assailed him, whom the kings horsemen valiantly receiued: many falling on both sides. Muleasses in this hoat skirmish, fighting courageously against his enemies, was wounded in the face and bled exceedingly; which discouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their backs and fled: when presently a wonderfull number of horse and foot, suddenly issuing out of the oliue gardens, had beset Lofredius and his souldiours round: vpon whom the Italians discharged certaine field pieces, but after they had once discharged them, they had no leisure to charge againe: for the barbarous enemy came on so thicke and so fast, that the Italians seeing themselves too weake, and compassed in round, let fall their weapons as men discouraged, and cast themselves into the lake, so by swimming and taking hold of the little boats to saue themselves from the enemies sword: which boats stood those distressed men in great stead, for being furnished with small pieces, they did beat backe the Moores, who eagerly pursued them euen into the lake with their horses. Lofredius as a man amazed with the sudden comming of the enemy, tooke the lake with his horse, and was there vnhorset by the enemy and slaine, as were diuers with him. Some few there were that fought courageously, chusing rather honourably to die in the midst of their enemies, than shamefully to be strangled in the stinking lake. Muleasses soiled with his owne blood and with the dust, flying amongst the rest, was knowne and taken: nothing more bewraying him than his odorous perfumes. In this conflict thirteene hundred Italians were lost: the rest which escaped Touarres relieued, and shortly after shipped them ouer into SICILIE, from whence they travelled home to NAPLES, but so poore, as well shewed the miserie of their fortune. Amida hauing thus obtained the victorie, was more carefull of nothing than to make his father vnfit for gouernment, which he did by cutting the sight of both his eyes with a hoat penknife: the like crueltie he vsed vpon Nahsar and Abdallas his brethren, then taken with his father. After that, he certified Touarres captaine of GVLETTA, That he had taken a few youths prisoners, which he would deliuer vnto him; and that he had bereft his father of his sight, who had deserved a worse punishment, as he that had long before done the like to his brethren; but had yet left him his life, as an example to other tyrants, and to shew that he dealt not altogether vnmercifully with so perfidious a father: Last of all, he confirmed (vpon certaine conditions) the same league which his father had with him: which he well saw was to great purpose, especially in that newnesse of his kingdome. Neither did Touarres refuse the same, as standing with his present profit: for vpon this agreement, Amida was to giue him certaine money to pay his souldiours, and to deliuer him the prisoners he had taken, with the ensignes and bodie of Lofredius: For more assurance whereof, he gaue Schites his sonne, then nine yeares old in hostage; yet vpon condition, that if an assured peace could not be agreed vpon, but that they must needs enter into warre, then Touarres should forthwith restore him his sonne Schites in safetie. These capitulations, although they seemed not vnreasonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether agreeing with the honour of the emperour, that he should enjoy the kingdome who by most horrible treason and detestable villanie had thrust himselfe thereinto without the emperours leaue. Wherefore he entred into a new deuise, to call in the rightfull heire, who might at the emperours pleasure (offended with the iniurie done by Amida) raigne in TVNES.

There was in exile amongst the Numidians one Abdamelech, euer since the time that Rosses Amida put out his fathers and brethrens eyes.

Touarres sent for Amida his elder brother.

Amida fled to Barbarussa. Him, because he was Muleasses naturall brother, Touarres sent for, putting him in hope of the kingdome, supported by Anemfcha, a great prince amongst the Numidians, who had all that long time courteously entertained him. Neither was Abdamelech slow to accept the occasion presented, especially encouraged thereunto by the Numidian prince his good friend, and the predictions of the Astrologers, who had foretold him, That he should die king of Tynas. Which vaine kind of diuination hauing in it no manner of assurance, yet causeth great minds oftentimes to vnderake great attempts beyond reason, which falling out with more hap than they were with reason foretold, giueth some credit to that vanitie, and causeth those cold prophets to be of some accounted as great wisards. And to worke this feat, such a time was offered, as a better could not be wished: for Amida hauing set all things in order as he pleased in the cite, and casting no perill, was gone to Biseria, to take order for his customes, which was there great: vpon fishing. Wherefore, Touarres to keepe his promise, sent backe Sebites, Amida his sonne, in a boat to Tynas, and receiued Abdamelech: who trauielling most part by night, was secretly come to Gvletta, and there resting himselfe and his horses a few houres; to prevent the fame of his comming, posted in haste with a troupe of his Numidian followers to Tynas, and passing thorow the cite, went directly to the castle, which he entered without resistance of the warders, supposing him to haue bene Amida come from Biseria: for Abdamelech had after the manner of the Moores couered his face with a scarfe, as if it had bene to haue kept him from the Sunne and the dust, and by that happie sleight got into the castle, before it was knowne who he was. The warders perceiuing their error, began as men amased now too late to betake themselves to their weapons, for in making resistance, they were quickly slaine by the Numidians which came in with Abdamelech: who thus possessed of the castle (the cheefe strength of that kingdome) let in his friends, which were many in the cite, by whom he was presently saluted king, the rest of the citifens either well liking of the matter, or at least not daring for feare to stirre. But as in these worldly things, for which men so vainely toyle, is no assurance: so this new king shortly after fell sicke and died, when he had reigned but six and thirtie dayes, and was afterwards royally enterred. After whose death, his mightie friends, with the cheefe of the citifens (persuaded and encouraged by Touarres the Spaniard) chose Mahometes his son, a child scarce twelue yeares old, to reigne in his fathers place: appointing Abdalages Maniphas (brother to him whom Amida slew) Abdelchirinus Mesuar, Schyrius (a great man in their Mahometane superstition) & Perellus a Christian knight, to be his directors and gouernours: which foure sway- ed all at their pleasure. But Abdelchirinus tendering the welfare of his country, and deuiling out of season how to set vp one of the royall blood, that were of himselfe able to gouerne the kingdome, saying, That it was not for the common good to be ruled by a child: was for his labor by his other three fellows suddenly slaine, with all his kindred and knowne friends. After whose death the other three erected a manner of Triumvirat gouernment, euery one of them laying hand vpon one part of the state or other, as liked him best. Amida thus shut out of Tynas, and hauing lost his kingdome, wandered vp and downe to Leptis, Cyrapolis, and many other places, crauing aid of euery man to recover his kingdome, miserably rent in sunder (as he said) by most wicked men, who insolently triumphed ouer the boy king. Which they of Tynas knew well to be true, and daily complained of the death of Abdelchirinus, whom they called the faithfull counsellor and father of his country. Whilist Amida is thus trudging vp and down, crauing helpe of this and that prince, proouing his friends, and sounding his subjects affection towards him; Muleasses growne miserable with long imprisonment and the calamitie of his disaster fortune, obtained of the young king his nephew so much fauour, as that hee might sometime goe out of the castle to the church: vnder colour whereof hee tooke sanctuarie, a place in Tynas holden in such reuerence amongst the Moores, as that it was a most inuiolate refuge to all such as fled thereunto. Not long after, at such time as Bernardinus Mendoza, the Admirall of Spain, came to Gvletta with the Spanish fleet, Muleasses at the request of Touarres was conueyed out of the Sanctuarie to the lake, and so by water to Gvletta, there to be present at the consultation there holden for the vtter subuersion of Amida, and the driving out of the Turks out of such cities as they yet held alongst the sea coast in Affrica. Muleasses had hardly before escaped the hands of certaine of his enemies in Tynas, who fought after his life, preferred by an old woman, who moued with pitie, hid him from their furie vnder a great heape of garlike: and had he not now in good time escaped to Gvletta, he had againe fallen into the hands of his mer- ci-

Muleasses at the request of Touarres is sent to Gvletta.

A mercilesse sonne Amida, who shortly after recouered againe his kingdome, and would not as he said himselfe haue spared him for the reuerence of any sanctuarie. For the citifens of Tynas, wearie of the euill gouernment of such as were in authoritie about the yong king, and not a little offended with the king himselfe, for espousing Melucca his cousin, one of Muleasses his daughters, secretly encouraged Amida by letters to repaire to the cite, promising to aid him in recouering his kingdome. Whereupon he came in such haste, that the yong king had scarce time to get out of the cite: and Amida entring without resistance, and holpen by his friends, easily obtained againe the kingdome, and exercised most exquisite crueltie vpon his enemies: of whom he caused some to be torne in peeces, and deuoured of fierce multitudes, kept hungrie for that purpose. Perellus he caused, to be tortured, his secrets to be cut off, and himselfe afterwards burnt to ashes in the market place.

Amida recouers the kingdome of Tynas, and taketh sharp revenge vpon his enemies.

But Muleasses stayed not long at Gvletta, offended with the couetousnesse of Touarres, who (as he said) had not faithfully restored such things as he had before put him in trust withall, but had auariciously in his miserie deceiued him of part of his rich household stuffe, with certaine notable pretious stones, & some of his treasure: whereof the blind king so greuously complained to Charles the emperour, that for deciding the matter, they were both commaunded to repaire vnto him into GERMANIE: where in conclusion to end the strife, Touarres was discharged of his gouernment, and Muleasses sent into SICILIE there to be kept of the common charge of that rich island. Muleasses by the way comming to ROMA, was honourably feasted by Cardinal Fernesus: at which time he shewed himselfe both in his apparrell and behauiour not forgetfull of his better fortune: and being brought vnto the presence of Paulus the great bishop, would doe him no greater honour but to kisse his knee, accounting it too great an indignitie to haue kisse his foot. He was of stature tall, and of a princely disposition, vnworthie of so hard a fortune, had he not in like manner before vnmmercifully dealt with his owne brethren.

Muleasses disdaineth to kisse the Popes foot.

Barbarussa wearie of his long lying to so small purpose in PROVINCE, requested the French king either thorowly to employ him, or els to giue him leaue to depart: offering if he so pleased, to spoile all alongst the coast of SPAIN, from the mountain Pyrenies to CADIZ. But he not ignorant what hard speeches ran of him already in all parts of Christendome, for bringing in the Turkes, was loth to leaue vnto the memorie of all posteritie the foule remembrance of so wofull a slaughter: besides that, he was aduised to disburden his country of such troublesome guests, who roving about, did much harme in the prouince where they lay, and as it was reported, now and then snatcht vp one countrey peisan or other, and chained them for slaves in their galleies. Wherefore in supplie of the Turkes that were dead, tickling gaue vnto Barbarussa all the Mahometane slaues in his galleies, to the number of about foure hundred, and furnishing him with all kind of prouision, and bestowing great gifts vpon him and his captaines, sent him away: and with him Seraza with certaine galleies, his embassadour to Solyman. So the Turkes departing out of PROVINCE, kept alongst the coast, vntill they came neere vnto SAVONA, whither the Germanes sent diuers presents and fresh victuals to Barbarussa, which he tooke so thankfully, that he protested not to hurt any of their territorie. From thence he kept a right course to the island of ELBA, belonging to the duke of FLORANCE, oueragainst POPLONA; where vnderstanding that one of the sonnes of Sinan his old friend was there kept prisoner, he writ vnto Appianus gouernour of the island for his deliuerance to this effect:

1544

I know, that a young man a Turke serueth thee, the sonne of Sinan surnamed the Jew, a famous captaine, taken of late at Tynas: him I would haue thee friendly to restore: which gift I will make thee vnderstand to be vnto me most acceptable: for this our great fleet in passing by you, shall faithfully forbear to use any hostilitie. But if thou shalt in this so small a matter refuse to gratifie me, expect vpon the coast of thy countrey all the harmes which an angrie enemy can doe.

Barbarussa his letters to Appianus, Gouernour of Elba.

Whereunto Appianus shewing his men vpon the wals, in token that he was not afraid, answered, That the young man was become a Christian, and therefore might not in any case be deliuered to the Turkes: but that he would in any other thing gratifie him in what he could, and for his sake vse the young man as his sonne. And to mollifie the vnkindnesse of his answer, he sent him fresh victuall with other presents. But Barbarussa offended with the answer, landed his men round about the island, and commanded them to make what spoile they could: which they performed performed accordingly, hunting the island people vp and downe the rockes and mountains like Hares, vntill that Appianus not without cause doubting the viter spoile of the island, redeemed his peace by deliuering the young man to Salec the pyrat, who brought him to Barbarussa gallantly apparrelled after the Italian manner, of whom he was joyfully receiued, as the sonne of a most valiant captaine, his old friend: and thereupon Barbarussa stayed his souldiors from doing any further harme vpon the island, and gaue Appianus great thanks for him. This young man Barbarussa honoured with the commaund of seuen gallies, and afterwards sent him to his father then lying at Svetia, a port of the red sea, Admirall for Solyman against the Portingals, who greatly troubled those seas. But the old Jew, ouerjoyed with the sudden and vnexpected returne of his sonne, whom he had for many yeares before giuen as lost, in embracing of him fainted, and so presently for joy died.

This man for valour was accounted little inferiour to Barbarussa, but for discretion and iust dealing farre beyond him, nothing of so furious and wayward a disposition as was he. Barbarussa departing from Elea, came into the bay of Tilamon in Tuscany, and in short time took the citie, which he spoiled and burnt, but especially the house of Bartholomew Telamonius; whose dead bodie but a little before buried, he caused to be pluckt out of the graue, & his bones to be scattered abroad, because he being Admirall of the bishop of Rome his gallies, had in the island of Lesbos wasted Barbarussa his fathers poore possession: and marching by night eight miles further into the land, surprised Montenym, and carried almost all the inhabitants away with him into captiuitie. The like mischeefe he did at the port called Portus Herculis, but purposing to haue taken Orhateello, and there to haue fortified, he was by Luna and Pitellus (two valiant captaines before sent thither, the one by the State of Siena, and the other by the duke of Florence) repulsed. So though disappointed of his purpose, yet hauing done great harme, and put the whole countrey of Tuscany in exceeding feare, he departed thence and landed againe at Igilum, now called Gigio, an island about twelue miles distant from Portus Herculis, where he quickly battered the towne, and caried a wonderfull number of all sorts into miserable captiuitie: keeping on his course, he passing the cape Linar, & comming oueragainst Cantymelle, had burnt that citie for the same reason he did Tilamon, had he not been otherwise perswaded by Strozza the French embassadour, fearing to draw the French king into further oblique. From thence he came with a direct course to the island of Ischia; where landing in the night, he intercepted most part of the inhabitants of the island, as they were flying into the mountains: and in reuenge of the hatred he had conceived against Vastius at the siege of Nice, he burnt Forino, Pansa, and Varranym, three cheefe townes of that island: but Pithacusa, the dwelling place of Vastius, standing vpon a broken rocke, somewhat distant from the sea, he durst not aduenture vpon. Then scraping along the island Prochita with lesse hurt, because most part of the inhabitants were before fled to Pithacusa, he put into the bay of Ptoli, and sent Salec the pyrat with part of his fleet to make proofe if the citie of Ptoli, might from sea be battered. Salec drawing neere the citie, shot into it with his great ordinance, and by chance slew one Saiuedra, a valiant Spaniard, vpon the wals, and put the citizens in a great feare least the whole fleet should haue landed, they themselues as then vnprouided: but the viceroy came presently with a power both of horse and foot from Naples, which Barbarussa discouering from sea as they came downe the mountaines, called backe Salec: and leauing the Island of Capri, and passing by the promontorie Athenym, was about to haue seized vpon Salernum, when a tempest suddenly arising, dispersed his fleet, and driue him beyond the promontorie Palinurus vpon the coast of Calabria, where he did exceeding much harme, especially at Carrato. From thence he departed to the island of Lipari, betwixt Italy and Sicily, which island he miserably spoyled, and with fortie great pieces so battered the citie, that the citizens were constrained for feare to yeeld, whom he carried away all prisoners about the number of seuen thousand, of one sort of people and other, and burnt the citie. So loaded with the rich spoile of Italy and the islands vpon the coast, he returned towards Constantinople with such a multitude of poore Christian captiues, shut vp so close vnder hatches amongst the excrements of Nature, that all the way as he went almost euery houre some of them were cast dead ouer boord: euery man detesting the endlesse hatred betwixt the emperour and the French king, the very ground of all this and many thousand other most wofull and vnderferued calamities of their poore subjects. With this rich prey and an in-

A finite number of captiues, Barbarussa arriued at Constantinople in the beginning of Autumne, in the yeare 1544: where he was honourably receiued of Solyman, and highly commended for his good seruice both by sea and land.

Solyman triumphing at Constantinople of the good successe he had in Hungarie, in the midst of all his glorie, was aduertised of the death of Mahomet his eldest sonne, whom of all his children he held dearest: whose dead bodie was shortly after brought from Maconesia, and with wonderfull solemnitie, and no lesse mourning, buried at Constantinople. How entirely Solyman loued this his sonne, well appeared by the great sorrow he conceiued of his death; and not contented to haue built him a stately tombe, erected also in memoriall of him a Mahometane church, called the church of Mahomet the lesser: for the difference of Mahomet the great, who woon Constantinople. Whereunto he also annexed a monasterie and a colledge, with many things mo after the grosse manner of their superstition, for the health of his soule, as he vainly supposed. After that, Solyman according to his wonted manner, which was but euery second or third yeare to take in hand some notable expedition, ceased from warres by the space of two yeares: in which time many of the great princes and worthie men of that age died; amongst whom was Francis the French king. Hariadenus Barbarussa that famous Turke of whom we haue so often spoken, who being of great yeares and no lesse fame, left this life in the yeare 1547, and was buried at a house of his owne called Besiktas, neere vnto Bosphorus Thracius on Eyrops side, not farre from the mouth of Euxinum, about foure miles from Pera, where he had but few yeares before at one time sold about sixteene thousand Christian captiues, taken out of Corcyra: and to make famous that place appointed for his buriall, he of his owne cost built there a Mahometane temple, there yet with his sepulchre to be seene: that place was in auncient time called Iasonium. About which time also, died of conceit that famous captaine Alphonsus Daulus Vastius, taken away by vntimely death when he had liued but fortie five yeares. At which time, Charles the emperour by his embassadour Gerardus Veltunich, concluded a peace with Solyman for five yeares, wherein king Ferdinand was also included: which peace was afterwards before the expiration thereof, by Solyman (at the request of Henrie the French king) broken.

Solyman had now almost three yeares taken his rest, when it fortuned that Ercazes Imirza king of Sirvan, moued with the often injuries of Tamas his brother the great Persian king, fled to Solyman at Constantinople, to craue aid of him against his brother. Solyman glad of such an occasion to worke vpon, entertained him with all courtesie, and promised to take vpon him his quarrell, and to protect him against his vnnatural brother. And when he had made all things readie for so great an expedition, passed ouer into Asia: and after long and painefull trauell entred at last with a puissant armie into Armenia, and there in the borders of the Persian kingdom, first besieged the citie of Van, which after ten daies siege was yeilded vnto him, vpon condition, that the Persian souldiors there in garrison, might with life and libertie depart with their armes as souldiors: which was at the first by Solyman granted, and so the citie surrendered. From thence Solyman sent his chiefe commanders with a great part of his armie, to burne and spoile the enemies countrey, which they for a time cheertfully performed; and running farre into the countrey, strue as it were amongst themselues who should doe most harme: where Imirza amongst the rest, for whose sake Solyman had vndertaken this warre; was as forward as the best to waite and spoile his brothers kingdom, sparing nothing that came to hand; the best and richest things he got, he presented to Solyman, to draw him on still in that warre. But that serued not his turne to recouer againe his kingdom of Sirvan: for Tamas, without shewing any power to withstand the Turks, had after his wonted manner, caused his people to withdraw themselues far into the mountaine country, leauing nothing behind them in that wast countrey to relieue them, but the bare ground: so that the farther the Turks went, the more they wanted, in without hope of better successe than such as they had before to their losse made proofe of, in their former expeditions into that great kingdom. The conceit whereof so much pierced nor the common souldiors onely, but euen the captaines themselues; that to make an end of that long and vnprofitable warre, taken in hand for another mans good, they consulted amongst themselues, either to kill Imirza, or else to disgrace him with Solyman: VVhich they so cunningly wrought; some suggesting false suspicions of his treacherous dealing in the proceeding of that warre; and others with like craft, vnder colour of friendship giuing him warning in secret of the danger danger he was in: the one filling Solyman's head with distrust, and the other Imirzas with feare. G briefly to shut the matter vp in their owne tearmes, They persuaded the hare to flee, and the bounds to follow. Imirza doubting some sudden mischief, fled for succour to an old acquaintance of his, one of the princes of CHALDEA, who most treacherously sent him in bonds to Tamas his brother, his most cruell enemy, who glad to haue the author of all his troubles with the Turks, deliuered into his hands, cast him in prison: and that Solyman nor any other should in his behalfe further prosecute the warre, or by his meanes hope for victorie, caused him to be in prison murdered. In this expedition against the Persian king, Solyman was occupied a yeare and nine moneths; all which time the Turks endured great troubles, and were oftentimes hardly distressed by the Persians: vntill at last Solyman himselfe wearie of that tedious warre, wherein he had got neither honour nor profit, thought it best so to make an end; and thereupon returned againe to H CONSTANTINOPLE in the yeare 1549.

Dragut a famous pirate of the Turks, possessed certain cities in Africke.

In the meane time it fortuned, that one Dragut Raïses a notable pirat of the Turks, had craftily surprisid the cite of AFRICA in the kingdome of TUNES (called in auncient time APHRODISIUM) and also LEPTIS PARVA (and now of the Moores called MAHAMEDIA) and there settling himselfe, as in a place both commodious and of good assurance, exceedingly troubled the Christians both by sea and land, especially such as traded in the Mediterranean. So that the emperour, moued as well with the manifold injuries done by that arch-pirat vpon the frontiers of his dominions, as by the daily complaint of his poore subjects, commaunded the Viceroy of SICILIE, and Auria his Admirall, to leaue a sufficient power in time to repress that pirat, before he grew to farther strength. Whereupon, they with a strong fleet well manned and thoroughly appointed for that purpose, and aided by the knights of MALTA, passed ouer into AFRICKA; and landing their forces, by the space of three moneths besieged the cite before possessed by the pirat, which with continuall batterie they had at length made faultable. And hearing that Dragut was coming with a new supply to relieue it, they with all sceleritie assailed it both by sea and land, and in the space of a few houres tooke it by force the tenth day of September in the yeare 1550: in which assault many of the enemies were slaine, and the rest taken. Auria hauing thus dispossessed the pirat, and aduisedly considering that the cite was not without an infinit charge to be holden by the Christians, among so many of the infidels, rased it downe to the ground, carrying away with him seauen thousand captiues and all the spoile of the cite. And not so contented, did all the harme he could with fire and sword all alongst that coast of AFRICA, to the intent that the Turks should there find no reliefe; and tooke 12 prisoners out of MONASTERIUM, a towne not far from the cite of AFRICA: and so hauing done that he came for, returned againe into SICILIE. Dragut thus at once thrust out of all he had, with a few of his friends fled to Solyman at CONSTANTINOPLE, and so incensed him with the grievous complaint of the wrong done vnto him by the Christians; that in reuenge thereof, he resolved to make warre both vpon the emperour and king Ferdinand, notwithstanding that the five yeares league he had before taken with him at his going into PERSIA, was not yet expired. So with cheerful words and courteous entertainment comforting vp the desperat pirat, the Spring following (which was in the yeare 1551) he furnished him with a great fleet in most warlike manner appointed, to reuenge the iniurie done to him by Auria in AFRICKA. With this fleet in number one hundred and fortie saile, Sinan one of the Turks great Basses, accompanied with Dragut the pirat, by the appointment of Solyman, departed from CONSTANTINOPLE; and cutting thorow the seas, arrived at length in SICILIE, where they suddenly surprisid the roying and castle of AVOUSTA, which they presently sacked. Departing thence, they came to the island of MALTA, and there landed their men in the port of MARZA, otherwise called MOXA, not neere vnto the castle, which they battered with certaine pieces of great ordinance, but so as was to no great purpose. At which time diuers companies of the Turks, running farther into the island, made hauocke of whatoeuer came in their way. After they had thus few daies in vaine battered the castle, and saw themselves both there valiantly repulsed, and in other places by ambushes and such like meanes cut off by the souldiours and inhabitants of the island, they remoued thence to the road of S. Paul, where they landed their ordinance, with purpose to haue besieged the cite; but perceiving by a little, what small hope there was to preuaile, and seeing diuers of their men dying thorow the extremitie of the heat, they forsooke the island and went to GAYLES, now called GOZA, a little island about thirtie miles in compass, five miles distant from MALTA.

Malta attempted by the Turks.

A Westward, subject vnto the knights of the religion, and there landing their men, miserably spoiled the island, and whatoeuer they light vpon, and carried away with them of one sort or people and other six thousand and three hundred captiues into most wofull bondage. With which bootie they put againe to sea, and sailed directly to TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE, called of old LEPTIS MAIOR, which cite Charles the emperour had before given to the knights of MALTA, and was at that time by them kept. This cite was the marke whereat the Bassa and the pirat shot; for taking whereof they landed their forces, and by long and winding treaches approached as neere the same as they could: which they did not without great losse of their people; for they of the castle hauing good store of great ordinance, and most expert canoniours did with continuall shot annoy the Turks, that they were oftentimes enforced to retire; yet with much troublesome labour and no lesse perill they came at last within eight hundred paces of the wals: where the Bassa caused his gabions made of thicke plankes, to be placed in the night, and his batterie planted. And the next day (which was the eighth of August) the cannon began to play, which was againe answered from the castle with like, and etierie houre some of the Turks slaine, the great shot still flying into their trenches, so as that day fouite of the best canoniours in the armie were slaine, with certaine other men of good account also: and the cleark general of the armie, a man of great estimation and welbeloued of the Bassa, had his hand shot off; and many other of the Ianizaries and common souldiours either slaine or hurt: moreover they brake one of their best pieces, and dismounted fouite others, which for that day made them to leaue the batterie. The next night the Turkes approached yet neerer vnto the castle, vpon whom the Christians in the breake of the day sallied out euen vnto their verie trenches, and afterwards retired. With the rising of the sunne (which the Turkes hatte in great reuerence) they renewed their batterie with greater force than before; yet with such euill successe, that the Bassa was almost mad for anger: for about the etening the fire by mischance got into their powder, wherewith thirtie of the Turkes were burnt, many hurt, and one piece broken. At length the Turkes were come so neere, that they had planted their batterie within an hundred and fiftie paces of the wall, which they continued with such furie, that they had made a faire breach euen with the ditch: but what was beaten downe in the day time, the defendants repaired againe by night, in such sort, as that it was not to be assaulted. Yet in conclusion, a traitorous souldior of PROVINCIA, before corrupted by the Turkes, found meanes to flee out of the castle into the campe, where he declared D vnto the Bassa the weakest places of the castle, by which it might be most conueniently battered and soonest taken: and especially one place aboue the rest which was against the gouernours lodging, which standing towards the ditch, and hauing vnderneath it sellars to retire the munition into, could not if it were once battered well be repaired againe or fortified. Which the Bassa vnderstanding, caused the batterie there to be planted, laying the pieces so low, that they did easily beat the sellars and vaults in such sort, that in short time the wals were so shaken, that the rampiers aboue thorow the continuall batterie, began greatly to sinke: which so amased the souldiours, seeing no conuenient meanes to reparaire the same, that setting all honour aside, they requested the Gouernour, That sithence the matter began now to grow desperat, and that the place was not longer to be holden, he would in time take some good order with the enemy for their E safetie, before the wals were farther endamaged. With which motion, Valler the Gouernour (an ancient knight of DAUPHINIE, and one of the order) was exceedingly troubled: which Peisieu another of the knights perceiving, he as a man of great courage, and of all others there present most ancient, in the name of the other knights declared vnto them, That the breach was neither so great nor so profitable for the enemy, but that it was defensible enough, if they would as men of courage reparaire the same; saying, That it was more honourable for worthe knights and lustie souldiours, to die valiantly with their weapons in their hands, fighting against the infidels for the maintenance of their law and Christian religion, than so cowardly to yeld themselves to the mercie of those, at whose hands nothing was to be looked for but most miserable seruitude, with all kind of crueltie: and therefore persuaded the Gouernour to hold it out to the F last. For all that, he ouercome with the importunitie of such as would needs yeld, who with all vehemencie vrged the imminent danger wherewith they were all like to be overwhelmed, and finding himselfe bereft both of heart and fortune, and forsaken of his souldiours; without farther consideration, consented that a white ensigne should be displaid vpon the wals, in token that they desired parley: when a Turke presenting himselfe, they requested him to vnderstand of the

the Bassa, if he could be contented that some of them might come to intrate with him of some good order to be taken for the yeelding vp. of the castle. VV hereunto the Bassa willingly consenting, two of the knights were forthwith sent out, to offer vnto him the castle with the artillerie and munition; so as he would furnish them with ships to bring them with bag and baggage safely to M A L T A. VV herunto the Bassa briefly answered, That (forasmuch as they had as yet deserved no grace, presuming to keepe so small a place against the army of the greatest prince on earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the armie, he would condescend to their request; or if they would not thereunto consent, that for recompence all they within the castle should continue his slaues and prisoners: notwithstanding if they incontinently and without delay did surrender the place, he would exempt out of them two hundred. VV hereupon the messengers returning in dispaire, were staied by Dragut and Salla Rais, with flattering words and faire promises, That they would so much as lay in them, persuaide the Bassa to condescend to a more gracious composition: fearing indeed that the besieged through dispaire would resolue (as their extreme refuge) to defend the place euen to the last man. VV herfore they went presently to the Bassa, to declare vnto him his oversight in refusing them who voluntarily would haue put themselves into his hands, whom reason would he should with all courtesie haue receiued: for that after he had the castle and the men in his power, he might dispose of them as he should think good. The Bassa liking well of his counsell, caused the messengers to be called againe, and with fained and dissembling words told them, That at the instance of Dragut and Salla Rais there present, he did discharge them of all the costs and charges of the armie, swearing vnto them (the better to deceiue them) by the head of his lord and his owne, inuolably to obserue all that he had promised vnto them: which they (too easily) beleued, and forthwith went to declare the same vnto the Gouernour and others within the castle. The Bassa, the better to come to the effect of his desire, after these messengers sent a craftie Turke, whom he charged expressly to persuaide the Gouernour to come with him into the campe, for the full conclusion of the giuing vp of the castle, and for the appointing of such vessels as should be needfull for their safe conduct to M A L T A; and that if he made any doubt to come, he should make shew as if he would there remain in hostage for him: but about all things, to consider of the strength and assurance of the besieged, and of the disposition of all things there. VVhich the subtil Turke so finely handled, that the Gouernour by the counsell of those who had persuaided him to yeeld, notwithstanding the reasons of warres and dutie of his office forbad him in such manner to abandon the place of his charge, resolu'd vpon so small an assurance of the Bassa, and gaue eare to the miserable end of his fortune. So taking with him a knight of his household (to send backe vnto those of the castle, to declare vnto them how he sped in the campe) vnder the conduct of the Turke that was come to fetch him, he went straight to the tent of the Bassa: who by the Turke that went first in, was aduertised of the small courage of the defendants, which he assured him to be no better, but that if he thought it good, he might bring them to such order and agreement as he would himselfe. Vpon whose persuation calling in the Gouernour Vallier, after he had rigorously reprobued his rashnesse, said vnto him, That forasmuch as he had once giuen his word, if he would pay the charges of the armie, he was content to let them go with bag and baggage, otherwise he would discharge but two hundred. VVherat the Gouernour greatly moued, answered, That that was not according to his last promise vnto the knights before sent. But when he saw it would be no better, he requested him that he might againe returne to the castle to know the minds of the rest: which the false Bassa would by no means grant, but only permitted him to send backe the knight that he had brought with him, to make report of these hard newes to the besieged: as for the Gouernour, he was sent to the gallies with yrons on his heeles. VVhen they of the castle vnderstood what had passed betwixt the Bassa and the Gouernour, they began exceedingly to feare the mischief then at hand: yet tooke no other resolution, but to returne the said knight to the Bassa, to know whether they should expect from him no better answer. VVho as soone as he was come before him, the capitaine of the castle was brought in, of whom the Bassa asked, VVhich of the two he would chuse, either to pay the expences of the armie, or else both he and all the rest to remaine his prisoners? VVherunto the Gouernour answered, That a slaue had no other authoritie than that which by his master was giuen him; and that hauing lost (besides his libertie) the power to command, if any thing were yet reserved in him, could not counsell him to command others to agree vnto any thing, but that which was concluded with them which were before sent.

A sent. Which thing the Bassa hearing, for feare that such a resolute answer should come to the knowledge of the besieged, and cause them to become desperat; hauing taken counsell with his other capitaines, hee tooke the Gouernour by the hand, and with a smiling and dissembling countenance told him, That he would without any doubt let them depart as he had promised; and that therefore without fearing any thing, hee should cause them all to come out of the castle. But the Gouernour, because he had bene before deceiued, would not trust to his word, but said vnto him, That he might command him that was come from the castle, for that he knew they would now doe neuer a whit the more for him. So the Bassa turning towards the other knight, commaunded him forthwith to goe vnto them in the castle, and to cause them to come forth, swearing againe as before, by the head of his great lord, and his owne, That they should all be deliuered and set at libertie, according to the conuentions first agreed vpon. VVhich the knight beleueing, went to report to them this good newes: which they receiued with such joy, that without further care or consideration of their mishap to neere, they ran in preale with their wiues children and best moueables, striding who should first get out. But they were no sooner issued, but they were by the enemies spoyled of all they had, and taken prisoners: part of the knights were sent to the gallies, and the rest to the Bassa. Who being by the Gouernour put in remembrance of his faith twice giuen, answered, That there was no faith to be kept with dogs, and that they had first violated their oath with his great lord, vnto whom at the giuing ouer of the R H O D E S, they had (as he said) sworne neuer more to beare armes against the Turkes. The castle was forthwith taken and spoiled, and about two hundred Moores of that country that had serued the knights, cut in peeces, and thereupon a great peale of ordinance discharged, with great cries and shouts in signe of their victorie. Thus the strong castle and auncient citie of T R I P O L I S in B A R B A R I E was deliuered to the Turkes the fifteenth day of August, in the yeare 1551. VVhilst the Bassa lay at this siege, the lord of A R R A M O N T, who had many yeares lien embassadour from Francis the French king at C O N S T A N T I N O P L E, and was now sent againe by Henrie the second, came to the Turkes campe, being requested so to doe by the Great Master of the R H O D E S, to haue dissuaded the Bassa from that siege: wherein he nothing preuailed. Yet now greued to see how the faithlesse Turke, contrarie to his oath, most villanously entreated the Gouernour and the other knights, lying at his feet as men halfe desperat, was so bold as to put him in mind of his promise, confirmed by his oath; D which if he would not keepe, that yet at the least according to his own voluntarie offer, he would release two hundred of them: but he excused himselfe as before, saying, That no faith was to be kept with dogs, which had first broken their owne faith. Yet afterwards he condescended, that two hundred of the eldest and such as were most vnfit for seruice (amongst whom was comprehended the Gouernour and certaine other old knights) should be set at libertie, who were forthwith sent aboard the French embassadours gallies, and by him transported to M A L T A: where they were but hardly welcome, for that they had so cowardly surrendered a place, which they might much longer haue defended. The next day after the castle was deliuered, which was the 16 of August, the proud Bassa for joy of this victorie made a solemne dinner, wherunto he inuited the French embassadour, and Vallier the late Gouernour: which they refused not to come E vnto, in hope to recouer some more prisoners. This great feast for the more magnificence was kept in the castle ditch against the breach, where were set vp two stately pavillions, the one for the Bassa, and the other for the embassadour and his companie, where he was honourably feasted with wonderfull plentie both of flesh and fish and good wines, which they had found in the castle; which seruice was done with musike of diuers sorts, and officers in number about a hundred, apparelled for most part in long gowns of fine cloth of gold, stuffed or fringed; and the other of veluer or damaske. The Bassa was no sooner set downe, but all the ordinance of the fleet was discharged with such a noise and thundering, that it seemed the heauens and skies did shake. The table being taken vp, the embassadour and the late Gouernour Vallier, entred into the pavillion of the Bassa, and beside the two hundred men which he had promised, obtained twentie more, F vpon the embassadours promise, That he should for them cause to be released thirtie Turkes taken at M A L T A, at the landing of the armie there. The Turkes hauing in their hands an ancient gunner of the castle, called Iohn de Chabas borne in D A V P H I N E (to the end that this triumphant feast should not be vnfrustrated of some cruell sacrifice of the Christian blood) for that he had in the time of the siege shot off the hand of the darke generall of the armie, brought him into the towne, towne, and when they had cut off his hands and his nose, put him quicke into the ground to the wall, and there for their pleasure shot at him with their arrowes, and afterward to make an end of him cut his throat. The Bassa shortly after departing out of BARBARIE, left Dragus the pyra Gouvernour of TRIPOLIS, honouring him with the title of the Sanzacke of that place: from whence he many yeares after grievously molested the Moores neete vnto him by land, and the Christians by sea. The same yeare 1551, Solyman notwithstanding the fite yeares peace before taken with king Ferdinand at his going into PERSIA, sent Achomates his lieutenant in EVROPE with a great power into HUNGARIE, who with Haly the Bassa of BYDA invaded the vpper part of HUNGARIE, and first tooke the citie of TEMESVARE, and contrarie to their faith given, slew the garrison souldiours: after that they tooke also the castle of ZOLNOK, forsaken by the Christians, and certaine other small castles. But laying siege to ERSAM, they were partly by the valiantnesse of the defendants, and partly by the coming on of Winter enforced to forsake the siege, and to get themselves into their wintering places.

Queene Isabell, king John his widdow, seeing the Turkes dayly encroching vpon that little they had left her, and that she was not able by any meanes to defend TRANSILVANIA against them; by the aduise of George bishop of VERADIVM her old counsellor, agreed with king Ferdinand to deliuer vnto him the government of the countrey, with all the royall dignitie of HUNGARIE, for which she was to haue of him CASSOVIA, and a yearely pension of an hundred thousand ducats. Which agreement made and thorowly concluded by Baptista Castallius (an Italian, whom Charles the emperour had but a little before sent to aid king Ferdinand) the queen returned into POLONIA, her native countrey: and so king Ferdinand by that meanes obtained almost all the prouince of TRANSILVANIA, and what els the queene had in HUNGARIE. But the bishop, a little before made a cardinall, being suspected by Baptista the Italian, that he favoured the Turkes faction more than king Ferdinand, and by that meanes sought to get the government to himselfe, was by the Italians deuice suddenly murdered in his owne house at VERADIVM: an end good ynough for so trouble some a prelat.

Haly the Bassa of BYDA proud of the good successe he had the yeare before, vnderstanding that diuers of the cheefe Hungarians had withdrawne themselves into the castle of AGRIA, purposed in himselfe with all his power to besiege it, and there to take them. So aided by Achomates, Chasan, and other of the Turkes Sanzackes and captaines by Solymans appointment ready at his call, he came with an armie of fure and thirtie thousand Turkes, and the 10 of September in the yeare 1552, encamped round about the castle: where after he had placed his artillerie, he began a most furious batterie. But doubting to preuaile that way, he attempted also to vndermine the castle, omitting nothing that could be deuised for the taking thereof: but all in vaine, for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobus their captaine, courageously endured the siege, and very manfully repulled the enemy. At length, the nine and twentieth of September the enemy with eight and twentie ensignes of select souldiours gaue a fresh assault to the castle, and were by the defendants enforced shamefully to retire: at which time foure and twentie barrels of gunpowder by mischance caught fire, and besides that it blew vp diuers captaines and souldiours, did much harme in the castle, to the great dismay of the defendants. After that, the Turkes with incredible pertinacie the twelfth of October fiercely assaulted the castle from morning vntill night, and for desire of reuenge and hope of spoile left nothing vnattempted for the gaining of the place; but were by the greater valour of the Hungarians beaten backe, and with great losse enforced at last to giue ouer the assault. Thus the Bassa nothing preuailing by force, attempted by great promises and large offers to haue bought them out: which he vnderstanding to be nothing regarded, and his letters scornefully burnt, brought on his souldiours again, and gaue vnto them in the castle a most furious assault, but with no better successe than before: for hauing lost many of his best souldiours, he was enforced to retire. So after he had in vaine six weekes besieged the castle, he was glad to raise his siege, and to retire to PISTVM. After whose departure there was found twelue thousand great shot, wherewith he had battered the wall. In this siege six thousand Turkes were slaine, and of the Hungarians but three hundred. King Ferdinand glad of this victorie, made Stephanus the worthy captaine, Vayuo of TRANSILVANIA, and bountifully rewarded the other captaines and souldiours as they had well deserved.

Henrie the French king, who together with his kingdome had as it seemed receiued the hereditarie quarrels of Francis his father against Charles the emperour, had by his embassadour the lord

A lord of ARAMONT so wrought the matter with Solyman, that the more to trouble the emperour, he sent a great fleet into the Tyrrhenum or Tuscan sea, which in the yeare 1553 and the yeare following, did great harme vpon the coasts of CALABRIA, SICILIA, SARDINIA, as also in the islands of ELBA, CORSICA, GERBE, and MAIORCA, and such like places on the frontiers of the emperours dominions: yet were the Turkes in most places notably againe repulled by the people of those countreies. The same yeare Solyman seduced by Roxolana (sometime his faire concubine, but then his imperious wife) and Rustan Bassa his sonne in law, most vnaturally murdered his eldest sonne Mustapha, the mirror of the Othoman familie: Which tragicall fact, the like whereof both for the trecherous contriuing and inhuman execution hath seldome times bene heard of, I haue thought good here in due time to set downe, in such sort as it is by most credible writers of that time reported.

Solyman after the manner of the Othoman kings, who to auoid the participation of their soueraignetic, vfe not oftentimes to marrie (but otherwise to satisfie their pleasure with such beautiful concubines as it pleaseth them to make choise of, out of the fairest captiues of all nations; most daintily brought vp for that purpose in the court) had by a Circassian bondwoman a sonne called Mustapha; who for his wonderfull towardnesse and rare perfection was amongst the Turkes had in such expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted themselves more happy, than in the hope laid vp in him: whose noble carriage was such, as that thereby he so possessed the minds of all men in generall, but especially of the men of warre, that he was reputed the glorie of the court, the floure of chiuallrie, the hope of the souldiours, and joy of the people. Whilest he thus grew, encreasing both in yeares and fauour: it fortuned with Solyman as it doth with men delighting in change, that he became amorous of Roxolana, of some called Rosa (but more truly Harathya) by condition a captiue, but so graced with beautie and courtly behauiour, that in short time she became mistresse of his thoughts, and commaundresse of him that all commaunded: And that which more established her in possession of his loue, she had in time made him father of foure faire sonnes, Mahomet, Selymus, Baiazet, and Tahanger, and one daughter called Chameria married to Rustan or Rustemes the great Bassa. In this height of worldly blisse nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of Mustapha, Solymans eldest sonne by the Circassian woman; who honoured of the greatest, and beloued of the rest, stood onely in her light, embarrassing her and hers (as she thought) of the hope of the empire, which shee now D about all things sought to bring to one of her owne sonnes: which the better to compass, she vnder the colour of great good will and loue, procured that Mustapha the young prince and his mother should as it were for their greater honour and state with a princely allowance be sent into CARAMANIA to gouerne that great country, far from the court. Which was no great matter for her to bring to passe: for that the Turkish emperours vsually send their sonnes after they come to any yeares of discretion vnto such prouinces as are farre from the court, attended vpon with one great Bassa and some graue doctour of their law, so to acquaint them with the manner of government; the Bassa instructing them in matters of ciuile policie, and the doctour in matters concerning their superstition: and yet by sending them a farre off, to keepe them from aspiring to the empire by the fauour of the court (a thing by the Turkish emperours not vnworthely feared, euen in their own and beloued children.) Roxolana hauing at once thus cunningly rid the court of the great competitor both of her loue and of the empire (things of all others enduring no parteners) rested not so, but began straightway to plot in her malicious head the vtter destruction of him, to whom all others wished all happinesse. This she saw was not to be brought to passe without some complices: wherefore after she had in her secret conceit discarded many, of whom at first she had reasonable good liking; at last she made choise of Rustan Bassa her sonne in law, vpon whom she would set vp her rest. This Rustan was a man basely borne in EPYRVS, altogether composed of dissimulation and flatterie, euer seruing his owne turne, were it neuer so much to the hurt or greauance of others; by which meanes he, although none of the best souldiours, was yet by many degrees growne vp to be the greatest man in the court, and Solymans sonne in law: F him she probably thought to wish the succession of the empire to one of her owne sonnes, his wiues full brethren, rather than to Mustapha her halfe brother. Beside that, she was not ignorant how that Rustan as one carefull of the emperours profit, the readiest way to preferment, had abridged the pensions and fees of the officers and seruitors in court: which he perceiving to please the emperour, proceeded so farre therein, that he attempted to haue cut off, if it had bene possi-

Hereupon the brake with Russian vpon the matter, whom she found readie yonought of himselfe, to doe what in him lay to further her mischievous desire.

To begin this intended tragedie, she vpon the sudden became very deuout, and being by the fauour of Solyman growne exceeding rich, pretended as if it had beene vpon a deuout zeale, for the health of her soule, after the manner of the Turkish superstition to build an Abbey with an Hospitall and a Church: which so godly a purpose she imparted to the Muphti or cheefe Mahometane priest, demanding of him, If such workes of charitie were not acceptable vnto God, and auailable for her soules health. Whereunto the Muphti answered, That those workes were no doubt gracious in the sight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her soules health, being a bondwoman; yet very profitable for the soule of the great emperor Solyman, vnto whom as vnto her lord both she and all she had appertained. With which answer of the great priest she seemed to be exceedingly troubled, and thereupon became wonderfull pensif and melancholie, her cheerefull countenance was replete with sadnesse, and her faire eyes flowed with teares; her mirth was mourning, and her joy heauinesse. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, and fortie to see his loue vpon conceit so to languish, sent her word to be of good cheere, and to comfort her selfe, promising in short time to take such a course as should ease her of all her griefes: which he forthwith did, solemnly manumising her from her bond estate. So great a fauour obtained; Roxolana with great cheerefulness began those meritorious workes by her before intended; as if she had thought of nothing but heauen, whereas indeed her thoughts were in the depth of hell. When she had thus a good while busied her selfe in paving the way to heauen, as was supposed, Solyman not able longer to forbear the companie of her, in whom his soule liued, after his wonted manner sent for her by one of his eunuchs, who should haue brought her to his bed chamber: to whom she with her eyes cast vp to heauen, demurely answered, That her life and whatsoever els she had, was at her dread souveraignes commaund, but againe to yeeld her bodie vnto his appetite, she might not in any case do, without the great offence of the high God, and manifest breach of his sacred lawes, which permitted her not now voluntarily to yeeld him that, being free, which he before without offence might commaund of his bondwoman: and because she would not seeme to vse this as an excuse, she referred her selfe in all things to the graue judgement of the learned and reuerend Muphti, with whom she had before at full conferred. This she did, presuming of the souverainetie she had ouer that great Monarch, whom she right well knew she had so fast bound in the pleasing fetters of his affection towards her, as that she was sure ynough of him without a keeper. Solyman raiued with her loue, and well the more for her deniall, sent for the Muphti, requiring his judgement in the matter; who before instructed in all points, agreed with that Roxolana had said, agrauating the heinousnesse of the fact, if he should proceed to enforce her as his slaue, whom being now free, he might not without great offence touch vnmarrried. Whereupon Solyman more and more burning in his desires, became a fresh suter to her for marriage, whom he had so often before commaunded: which his sute easily obtained (as the marke she had all this while aimed at) he with all speed to the great admiration of all men, and contrarie to the manner of the Mahometane emperors, solemnly married her; appointing for her yearly dowrie five thousand Sultanyms. But here before we proceed any farther, stay a while and take the view of that faire face whereon this great Monarch so much doted; as it is by the skilfull workemans hand most liuely expressed.

This woman of late a slaue, but now become the greatest emperesse of the East, flowing in all worldly felicitie, attended vpon with all the pleasures her heart could desire, wanted nothing she could wish; but how to find means that the Turkish empire might after the death of Solyman, be brought to some one of her owne sons. This was it that had (as we haue before said) long troubled her aspiring mind; and in the midst of all her blisse, suffered her yet to take no rest. Noble Mustapha, Solyman's eldest sonne, and here apparant of the empire, although Mustapha was yet still before her eyes present; his credit, his valour, his vertues, his person were all bar to her desires; he was the onely cloud that kept the sunne from shining on her; if any meanes might be taken away, then wanted nothing that she desired. Which to bring to G passe, the wicked woman laboured cunningly by little and little to breed in Solyman head no small suspicion of Mustapha. That he being a young man of a haucie spirit, desirous of foueraign tic, generally beloued, and swelling with the immoderat fauor of the men of warre, which were all at his deuotion, left nothing else to be expected of him, but when he should (as did his grandfather Selymus) lay hand vpon the empire, and worke his aged fathers destruction: This mischieuous plot by her deuised, was not a little furthered by Rustan the great Bassa, by whom passed all great matters: who nothing omitted, that could be slyly deuised for the disgrace or confusion of the young prince. For he, as a great secer, craftily told all them that were sent gouer-nours into SYRIA, that Mustapha was secretly suspected by his father of aspiring to the kingdome; and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to obserue all his actions, with the H manner of his life and gouernment, and by their letters diligently to aduertise him of whatsoever they should see or heare; bearing them in hand, that the more suspiciously or odiously they should write of him, the more gracious and acceptable it would be vnto the great Sultan. Wherefore he by these men, oftentimes certified of the princely disposition, courage, wisdom, valour, and bountie of Mustapha, whereby he had woon all mens hearts; saw plainly, that he would at length be vndoubtedly preferred to the empire: yet durst he not for all that, aduenture to temper with Solyman about that detestable conspiracie against the innocent prince, but still deliuering the letters to the malicious woman, left the rest by her vngracious head to be wrought. And she still as occasion best serued her purpose, ceased not with pleasing allurements and flatterie (wherein she was most excellent) to infect Solyman's mind, that whensoever he should chance to haue any I speech of Mustapha, she might take the fitter occasion to bring forth those letters. Neither was she in her drift deceived, but hauing found a fit opportunitie, with teares trickling downe her cheekes (which to serue their turns subtle women seldome want) she told the emperor in what danger he stood, recounting amongst other things, how Selymus his father had by such meanes deprived Baiazet his grandfather, both of his life and empire together: and therefore most instantly besought him, as if it had altogether proceeded of a carefull loue; by that example warned to looke to himselfe. But these light arguments of suspicion, seemed as they were indeed vnto Solyman scarce probable; so that she little preuailed thereby. Which thing she well perceiving, and inwardly grieved thereat, conuerted her cruell mind to other mischieuous deuises; and sought K by all meanes how to poyson the young prince: neither wanted there wicked men (as it were) vowed to all kind of mischiefe and villanie) readie to haue performed what she desired, had not Gods prouidence withstood so horrible a practise. For whereas certaine rich apparell was by her sent vnto him in his fathers name, he fearing the worst, would not touch it before he had caused it to be worne by one of his seruants; by which curious warinesse (as it was thought) he for that time preuented the treason of his wicked stepdame; and made her malicious practise manifest to the world. Yet rested she not so, but was still plotting new deuises tending all to one purpose: for being growen to that height of honour and power as neuer was woman in the Othoman court, and by the meanes of Trongilla a Jew (as it was thought) hauing bewitched the mind of the Turkish emperor, she still grew more and more in fauour, and obtained that her sonnes might by turnes be still present in the court: of purpose, that by their daily presence L and continuall flatterie, they should more and more procure their fathers loue; and if by chance Mustapha should come thither, she might haue the better meanes to dispatch him: if not, to expect some other fit time, when she might by some one or other meanes take him away. But Mu- stapha neuer coming (for why, the emperors sons life not without their fathers deale to go out of the prouinces assigned vnto them, but to come to CONSTANTINOPLE, but after the death of their father to receiue the empire, attended vpon with a number of souldiours) she easily deuised another practise: that her sonnes should wait vpon their father, not in the citie only, but in the prouinces also; so that Tribanger (whom she named Cronchbacke, alwaies followed his father in the campe. Certaine yeares thus spent, and she still hammering her mischieuous deuises at length fortune fauouring her wicked desire, got from the Bassa which had the gouernment of Musta- pha and the prouince of AMASIA (for as we haue said, euerie one of the kings sons hath with him one Bassa, which is as it were his lieutenant in administration of justice and martiall affaires) certaine suspicious letters; wherein was contained, that there was a speech of a marriage to be made betwixt Mustapha and the Persian kings daughter; which thing he thought good to keepe know-

A ledge of to the Counsell, that if any harme should ensue thereof, he might be out of all suspicion.
These letters being brought to Rustan, he thought he had now as good as halfe brought to end the long desired ruine of Mustapha: so making no stay, he opened the matter to Roxolana, and afterwards both together went to the court, and declared all the matter to the emperor; in doing whereof, they forced both their vngracious wits to fill his head, yet doubtfull with sus-pition, and to possesse his mind with the feare of his owne most dutifull sonne: saying, That he as a proud and ambitious young man, rauid with the desire of so glorious an empire, sought against the lawes both of God and nature, to take his father out of the way, that so he might with more speed satisfie his aspiring mind. And to giue the more credit to this their most false suggestion, they warned him of the alliance by him purposed with the Persian king, the ancient ene-mie of the Othoman emperours; wishing him to beware, least Mustapha supported by the strength of PERSIA, and the fauour of the Sanzacks and Ianizaries, whose loue he had by boun-tie purchased, should in short time when he feared least, together depriue him both of his life and empire. With these and such like accusations, they so preuailed with the aged man whom they neuer suffered to rest in quiet; that he at length resolved to worke his safetie (as he supposed) by the death of his owne sonne, in this sort.

Roxolana and Rustan together
poysoned Mustapha.

In the year 1552 he caused proclamation to be made almost in all the prouinces of his empire, That for as much as the Persians without resistance with a great armie inuaded SYRIA, burning and destroying the country before them, he to repress that their outrageous insolence, was enforced to send thither Rustan Bassa with an armie: which according to his appointment C was in short time raised. Now when all things were in readinesse, as if it had bene for such a warre as was pretended, he commaunded Rustan, with as much secrecie and as little tumult as was possible, to lay hands vpon Mustapha, and to bring him bound to CONSTANTINO- PLE: which if hee could not conueniently effect, then, by any other meanes to take him out of the way.

Solyman sendeth
Rustan Bassa with an armie to take Mustapha.

With this wicked and cruell charge Rustan with a strong armie marched towards SYRIA.
Mustapha vnderstanding of his coming, without delay with 7000 of the best horsemen in all Turkie made towards SYRIA also: whereof Rustan hearing, and perceiving that he could not (as he desired) conueniently execute the cruell commaund of the vnnaturall father, forthwith turned his backe, and treading the same steps he came, returned with his armie to CONSTANTINOPLE D with such speed, that he endured not to behold the very dust raised by Mustapha his horsemen, much lesse his presence: giuing it out, That he certainly vnderstood, that the prouince was in quiet (as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But vnto Solyman he told another tale in secret, which he maliciously had deuised: That he by most apparent signes and manifest pre-sumptions had perceiued the whole armie so enclined towards Mustapha, that if hee should haue attempted any thing against him by plaine force, hee should haue bene vtterly forsaken, and had therefore in so dangerous a case left the matter as it was to his graue further direction.
This tale suspiciously told, raised in the wicked and vnnaturall father (nothing degenerating from the naturall crueltie of his aunccestors) new and great suspicions, whereof to disburden his disquieted mind, he conceiued with himselfe a most horrible deuice. Wherefore the year following, which was the year 1553, he raised a great armie, giuing it out, That the Persians had E with greater power than before inuaded SYRIA, and that therefore he for the loue of his coun-treys and defence of his empire, was determined to goe thither with his armie, and in person himselfe to repress the attempts of his enemies. Wherefore the armie being assembled, and all things necessarie orderly provided, he commaunded to set forward, and in few dayes after followed himselfe: who coming at length into SYRIA, presently by trustie messengers commaunded Mustapha to come vnto him at ALBPO; for there he lay encamped. And yet for all these shaddowes, the matter was not so closely by Solyman conceiued (although he was exceeding carefull thereof) but that his mortall and deadly hatred against his sonne was perceiued by the Bassaes and other great men about him: insomuch, that Achmat Bassa by a secer and trustie messenger F gaue him warning thereof; that so he might in time the better provide for the safeguard of his life.
Neither could Mustapha himselfe but maruell, that his aged father without any apparent reason should come so far with so great an armie: yet trusting to his owne innocencie, though wonderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he resolved (although it were with the extreame danger of his life) to obey and yeeld to his fathers commaund: for he thought it more commendable and honourable to incur the danger of death, than living, to fall into the foule suspicion of dilloyaltie. In so great a perplexitie of mind, after he had with himselfe much discoursed too and fro what course hee were best to take, at length he boldly and resolutely asked the doctor whom (as we haue before said) he had alwaies with him in his court, Whether the empire of the world or a blessed life were of man more to be desired: to whom the doctor frankly answered, That the empire of the world, to him that would enter into the due consideration thereof, brought with it no felicitie, more than a vain shew and vter apparance of good, nothing being more fraile or vncertaine than worldly honour, bringing with it feare, vexation of mind, tribulation, suspiti-on, murder, wrong, wickednesse, spoile, ruine and captiuitie, with infinit mischeefes of like nature not to be desired of him that would attaine to true felicitie, by which meanes the blessed life was to be lost and not gained: But they vnto whom God had giuen the grace, rightly to consider and weigh the fragilitie and shortnesse of this our estate (which the common sort deemeth to be the onely life) and to strue against the vanities of this world, and to embrace and follow an vpright kind of life, had vndoubtedly a place assigned for them in heauen, and prepared by the great God where they should at length enjoy life and blisse eternall. This answer of the great doctor wonderfully satisfied the troubled mind of the young prince, foreseeing as it were the approach of his owne end: and so staying not any longer discourse, forthwith set forward towards his father, and making great hast, came at length to his fathers campe, and not farre off pitched his tents in the open field. But this his so hastie comming the more encreased the suspicion in the mind of his wicked father: for by a signe giuen he caused the Janizaries and cheefe men in the armie to goe as if it had bene for honours sake to meet Mustapha; which they all without delay presently did at his commaund, and so all together set forward. In the meane time, he the most craftie var-let with troubled countenance (for he could notably dissemble) as a man halfe dismayed came in halt into Solymans pavillion, and falsely told him, That the Janizaries and almost all the best souldiours of the armie were of themselves without leaue gone to meet Mustapha, and that he feared what would ensue thereof. VVhich newes so troubled the old tyrant, that he became pale for feare, and going out of his tent, and finding them gone, easily beleeued all to be true that the false Bassa had told him. Neither wanted Mustapha strange warning of his end so neere at hand, for the third day before his setting forwards towards his father, falling asleepe in the euening, he thought he saw his prophet Mahomet in bright apparrell to take him by the hand and lead him into a most pleasant place, beautified with most glorious and stately pallaces, and most delicate and pleasant gardens; and pointing to euery thing with his finger, to say thus vnto him, Here rest they for euer, which in this world haue led an vpright and godly life, following vertue and detesting vice: and after that turning his face to the other side, to haue shewed him two great and swift riuers, whereof the one boyled with water blacker than pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of men wallowing and tumbling some vp, some downe, crying horribly for mercie; And there (said he) are punished all such as in this fraile life haue been the malicious workers of iniquitie, the cheefe of whom (as he said) were emperours, kings, princes, and other great men of the world. Mustapha awaking, and troubled with this melancholic dreame, called vnto him his doctor: and hauing told him all the matter, asked him what the same might signifie: who standing a great while in a muse (for the Mahometanes are exceeding superstitious, attributing much vnto dreames) full of sorrow and greefe, at length answered, That this vision (for so it pleased him to tearme it) was vndoubtedly to be feared, as presaging vnto him the extreame perill of his life, and therefore requested him to haue great care both of his life and honour. But Mustapha as he was of a notable spirit and courage, regarding nothing that answer, stoutly replied: What shall I suffer my selfe to be terrified and overcome with childish and vaine feare? why rather hast I not courageously and resolutely to my father? and so much the more boldly, because I know assuredly I haue alwayes (as reason was) reuerenced his maiestie, that against his will I neuer turned mine eyes or foot against his most royall seat, much lesse affected his empire, except the most high God had called him to a better life, neither then without the generall good liking & choise of the whole armie, that so I might at length without murder, without blood, without tyrannie, well and iustly reigne, and in loue and peace inuioleat liue with my brethren: for I haue set down with my selfe, and chosen, if it be my fathers pleasure so, rather to die in his obedience, than reigning many yeares, to be reputed of all men, especially my competitor, a rebell or traitor.

Hauing

A Having thus said, he came vnto his fathers campe, and pitching his tents (as we haue before said) suted himselfe all in white, in token of his innocencie, and writing certaine letters (which the Turkes when they are about to go to any place of danger, vse to write, and alwaies to carrie with them, for they are wonderfull foolish in their superstition) and putting them in his bosome, attended vpon with a few of his most trustie followers, came with great reuerence towards the tent of his father, fully resoluving to haue kissed his hand, as their vsuall manner is. But when he was come to the entrance of the tent, remembering that he had yet his dagger girt to him, hee entered not vntill he had put it off; because he would not come into his fathers sight with any weapon, if happily so hee might cleere himselfe of his fathers needlesse suspicion. So when he was come into the more inward roomes of the tent, he was with such honour as belonged to his state cheerfully received by his fathers eunuchs. But seeing nothing else prouided but one seat whereon to sit himselfe alone, he perplexed in mind stood still a while musing, at length asked where the emperour his father was? VVhereunto they answered, That he should by and by see him: and with that casting his eye aside, he saw seauen Muts (these are strong men, bereft of their speech, whom the Turkish tyrants haue alwaies in readinesse, the more lecretly to execute their bloudie butcherie) comming from the other side of the tent towards him: at whose sight stricken with a sudden terrour, said no more, but Lo my death; and with that, arising, was about to haue fled: but in vaine, for he was caught hold on by the eunuch and Muts, and by force drawne to the place appointed for his death: where without further stay the Muts cast a bow string about his necke, he poore wretch still struiuing, and requesting that he might speake but two words to his father before he died. All which the murtherer (for no addition is sufficient significantly to expresse his vnnaturall villanie) both heard and saw by a trauers from the other side of the tent: but was so farre from being moued with compassion, that thinking it long till he were dispatched, with a most terrible and cruell voice he rated the villaines enured to bloud, saying, Will you neuer dispatch that I bid you? will you neuer make an end of this traitor, for whom I haue not rested one night these ten yeares in quiet? VVhich horrible commaunding (speeches yet thundering in their eares, those butcherly Muts threw the poore innocent prince vpon the ground, and with the helpe of the eunuchs forcibly drawing the knotted bow string both waies, by the commaundement of a most wicked father strangled him. With like barbarous crueltie, he shortly after caused Mahomet his nephew (Mustapha his sonne) to bee strangled also.

This vnnaturall and strange murther committed, he presently commaunded the Bassa of AMASIA Mustaphaes lieutenant to be apprehended, and his head in his owne presence to bee strucke off. VVhich done, he sent for Tzihanger the crooked, yet ignorant of all that was happened; and in sporting wise, as if he had done a thing worth commendations, bid him go meet his brother Mustapha: which thing Tzihanger with a merrie and cheerfull countenance hastened to doe, as one glad of his brothers comming. But as soone as he came vnto the place where he saw his brother lying dead vpon the ground strangled, it is not to be spoken how he was in mind tormented. He was scarcely come to the place where this detestable murther was committed, when his father sent vnto him certaine of his seruants to offer vnto him all Mustaphaes treasure, E when his father sent vnto him certaine of his seruants to offer vnto him all Mustaphaes treasure, Tzihanger filled with extreame heauinesse for the vnmerefull death of his welbeloued brother, spake vnto them in this sort. *A wicked and vngodly Cain, traitor (I may not say father) take thou now the treasures, the horses, the seruants, the iewels and the prouince of Mustapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruell and sawge breast, so vngrationally and contrarie to all humanitie;
I will not say the reuerence of thine owne bloud, to kill thy worthie, warlike and noble sonne, the mirror of courtesie, and prince of greatest hope, the like of whom, the Othoman family neuer yet had, nor neuer shall? I will therefore my selfe provide that thou, nor none for thee shall euer hereafter in such sort shamefully triumph ouer a poore crooked wretch.* And hauing thus much said, stabd himselfe with his owne dagger into the bodie, whereof he in short time died: which so soone F as it came to the old Tygers eares, it is hard to say how much he grieved. His dead bodie was by his fathers commaundement carried from ALEPPO in SYRIA to CONSTANTINO-PLE, and afterwards honourably buried on the other side of the hauen at PERA. For all this bloudie tragicke, his couetous mind was not so troubled but that he could forthwith command all Mustaphaes treasures and riches to be brought to his tent: which his souldiours in hope to haue the same given them for a prey, willingly hasted to performe. In the meane time, the souldiors which were in Mustaphaes campe, not knowing what was become of their master, seeing such a multitude of souldiors thrusting into their campe without all order; to repecte their tumultuous insolencie, stept out in their armour, and notably repulst them, not without much bloudshed.

At length, the noise of this stirre was heard by the rest of the kings souldiors, who seeing the tumult to increase more and more, ran in to helpe their fellowes; so that in short time there began a hoat skirmish and cruell fight on both sides, insomuch that two thousand were slaine and mo wounded: neither had the broile so ended, had not Achomat bassa a graue captaine, and for his long experience of no small authoritie amongst the souldiors, kept backe the lanizaries and staied their furie; and turning likewise to Mustaphaes souldiors, by gentle and mild words and courteous persuations, in this manner appealed their rage. What my brethren (said he) *will you now (degenerating from your auntient loyaltie for which you haue bin for so many ages commended) impugne the command of the great Sultan our dread soueraigne? Truly I cannot sufficiently maruell what thing should moue you, whom I haue hitherto proued to haue been most worthy and valiant souldiors, in this ciuile conflict to draw those weapons against your fellowes and brethren, which you haue most fortunately used against the enemies of the Othoman kings: except you meane thereby to make your selues a ioyfull spectacle vnto your enemies, who grieuing to see themselves ouercome by your victorious weapons, may yet reioice among themselves to see you turne the same one vpon another. Wherefore my sonnes, for your auntient honours sake, be carefull that you doe not by this your insolencie lose the reputation of your wisdoms loyaltie and valour, for which you haue hitherto been above all others commended: reserue these your weapons which you haue now too too much used amongst your fellowes, against your enemies, of whom you may get more praise and honour. This speech of the old Bassa, so mollified the stout souldiors, that they freely permitted all that was in Mustaphaes tents to be carried to Solymans: but as soone as the death of Mustapha was blowne into the eares of the Ianizaries and the rest of the armie in Solymans campe, another tumult rose among them worse than the first. They were quickly all vp in armes againe, and with a great noise confused with teares and lamentation, as they were in rage and furie, brake violently into Solymans pauillion with their drawne swords: which strucke the tyrant into such a feare, that destitute of all counsell in himselfe, he was about with the extreame perill of his life to haue fled: but being holden of his friends, and making a vertue of necessitie, vpon the sudden aduertured to doe that which at better leasure he would scarcely haue thought vpon: for going forth out of his tent, but with a pale and wan countenance he spake vnto the enraged souldiors thus. *What broile is this? what stirre? what so great insolencie? what meane your inflamed, fierce and angrie lookes? know you not your soueraigne? and him that hath power, to commaund you? Haue you so resolved to staine the auntient and inuincible honour of your selues and your ancestors, with the blood of your lord and emperour? VVhilest he was yet thus speaking, the souldiors boldly answered, That they denied not, but that he was the man whom they many yeares before had chosen for their emperour: but in that they had by their owne valour got for him a large and mightie empire, and in like manner preferued it; that was therefore of them done, that he should for the same gouerne them vertuously and iustly, and not to lay his bloudie hands without discretion vpon euerie iust man, and most wickedly embrue himselfe with innocent blood: and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they said) moued with iust cause, to reuenge the vnworthie death of guiltlesse Mustapha; and that for that matter, he had no iust cause to be angrie with them. VVherefore they required, that they might publickly cleere themselves of the treason whereof they were accused by Mustaphaes enemies, and that the accuser might be brought forth to iustifie his accusation: protesting, that they would neuer lay downe their weapons, vntill the accuser made his appearance in iudgement, and commenced his accusation judicially, vpon paine to endure the like punishment if he failed in prooffe. VVhilest these things were in doing, the hauntnesse of the late committed fact caused euerie man to shed teares, so that Solyman himselfe seemed to be forie for the murther so lately by himselfe committed: wherefore he promised vnto the souldiors whatsoeuer they required, and did what he could to appease their angrie minds. For all that, they in the meane time, least he should craftily slip away and deceiue them of that he had promised, and of the expectation of such things as they had required, with a manuellous care and diligence all kept watch and ward.

Solyman yeeldeth vnto the Ianizaries.

Solyman to appeale this furie of the Ianizaries, depriued Rustan Bassa of all his honours, and tooke from him his seale whereof he had the keeping, and deliuered it to Achomates bassa. But Rustan worthily stricken with feare and horrore, seeing himselfe now in no safetie in his owne tents, fled secretly to Achomates, asking his counsell what were best for him to doe; and what course to take in so doubtfull and dangerous a case? To whom the Bassa answered, That it were best for him to vnto the great emperours aduise, and to doe what he commaunded. VVhich answer well satisfied Rustan: and so he which of late gaue other men access vnto the emperour at his pleasure, was now glad by his old acquaintance and friends to prester this poore sute, To know his pleasure what he would haue him to doe. From whom he received this answer, That he should incontinently without farther delay get him out of his sight, and out of the campe: which the Bassa said he could not conueniently doe, being by his displeasure and the souldiors rage disurnished of all things necessarie for his departure. VVhereunto Solyman sent him answer againe, That he could giue him neither longer time nor delay; and that it were best for him without more adoe to be gone for feare of farther harme. VVhereupon Rustan, guiltie in conscience of most horrible villanie & treacherie, accompanied but with eight of his most faithful friends in steed of his late world of followers; posted in hast to Constantinople, and there (not without danger of his head) with Roxolana and other the complices and contriuers of the treason against Mustapha, in great feare expected the euent of his fortune.

This young prince Mustapha thus shamefully murdered by his owne father, was for his rare vertues generally beloued of the Turkes; but of the souldiors most for his martiall disposition, and readinesse for the effusion of Christian blood. The opinion they had conceiued of him was such, and their loue so great, that they neuer thought there was any in the Othoman family, of whom they expected so much for the enlarging of their empire: insomuch, that euer since, when in their priuat or publicke actions they faile of any great hope, they vse this prouerb euen at this day taken fro him, Gietti Sultan Mustapha; Sultan Mustapha is dead: as who should say, our hope is all lost. Achomates bassa the great champion of the Turkes, a man of exceeding courage, not ignorant of the small assurance of the great honors of that state, at such time as he received the seale from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then frankly bestow it vpon him, so he would at one time or other, to his no lesse disgrace take it from him: to whom Solyman solemnly promised with an oath not to displace him so long as he liued. For all that, he had not long enjoyed that honour, but that Solyman falling in dislike with him, and willing againe to promote Rustan bassa to that great honour, greater than which there is none in the Turkes court, which by reason of his oath he could not doe so long as Achomates liued: To saue his oath, and to prester his sonne in law (whom he had indeede displaced onely to please the tumultuous Ianizaries) resolved to haue Achomates put to death. Of which his purpose Achomates altogether ignorant, and one morning after his wonted manner comming into the Diuane in all his honour, vpon the sudden received word from Solyman, that he must presently die, and forthwith was the hangman readie to haue strangled him, as was giuen him in charge: whom the stout Bassa thrust from him with his hand, with countenance and cheere, in shew no more troubled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about him, espied at last an honest man whom he had before many times pleased, whom he most earnestly requested for all the kinnesse shewed vnto him, to doe him that last fauour as to strangle him with his own hand, which should be vnto him the greatest good turne that he could possibly deuise, detesting nothing more than to die with the hand of the executioner. VVhich thing when he after much intreatie had vnderaken to performe, Achomates willed him, that he should not at one twitch strangle him outright, but letting the bow string flake againe, giue him leaue once to breath, and then to dispatch him: which his request was by his friend accordingly performed; and he in that sort strangled: wherein it seemeth that he was desirous, first to tast of death, and not to die all at once. Immediately after whose death, Rustan bassa was againe restored to his place of chiefe Visier, and had the great seale deliuered vnto him: which honour he enjoyed about six yeares after; and so at last died of the drop sicke. This was the end of these two great Bassas Achomates and Rustan, who in that time swaied that great empire vnder Solyman, and of whom we haue so much spoken: It is reported, that Solyman hauing appointed Achomates to die, should say, It is better for his great heart once to die, than to die a thousand times, in seeing his honour taken from him and bestowed vpon another.

The

1554 The Turkes gallies by the sollicitation of the French before brought down into the Tuscan G sea, did much harme vpon the coasts of CALABRIA and SICILIA in this yeare 1554, as they had the yeare before, and so did diuers yeares after. At which time also Pandulphus Contarenu the Venetian Admirall scouring alonght the seas, carefully looking to the frontiers of the Venetian citate, chanced to meet with the Basia of CALIPOLIS (who the yeare before had rifled certaine Venetian marchants) in reuenge of which injurie he set vpon him, and after a great spoyle made both of the Turkes and their gallies, he rancked DIRRACHIVM, then one of the Turks port townes in DALMATIA.

555 The next yeare 1555 the same Bassa recovered his strength, but not daring to be too busie with the Venetians, surpris'd the Islands of P L Y M B I S and E L B A, subject to the duke of F L O R E N C E, and withall sent letters to Solyman, to perswade him to take vp armes against the Venetians, as they which had broken the league.

At the same time Haly the Bassa of BUDA by POLOI departed the King came to BABOZA in HUNGARIE: and was in good hope by the like finessne to haue taken the towne and castle of ZIGETH, a place of great importance: but failing of his purpose, he came the next yeare 1556 with a great armie, and the 13 day of Iune encamped before the towne, wherein was Gouernour Marcus Horwath a valiant capitaine, with a garrison of notable souldiors. Shortly after he began a most terrible batterie: during which time the Christians sallying diuers times out, slew many of his men, who for all that vsed such diligence, that the twentieth of Iune they woon the vttermost wall, and after fise hot assaults were in hope at the sixt to haue woon the castle also: but the Christians perceiving the danger, resolutely sallied out, and hauing slaine eight hundred of them, draue the rest againe from the wall: yet the Turkes gaue it not so ouer, but with a great number of carts laboured to haue filled vp the marish and ditches about the towne: which their attempt was by the industrie of the defendants also defeated. The Bassa perceiving how hardly the towne would be woon by force, attempted to haue persuaded them to haue yelded it vp by composition: but sayling therein of his purpose, began againe the twelfth of Iulie to assault the citie, which assault he maintained fise dayes together without intermission, still sending in fresh men in stead of them that were wearied or slaine: yet was the citie for all that by the valour of the Christians notably defended. So when he had in vaine proued the vttermost of his forces, he raised his siege the one and twentieth day of Iuly, and departed: but within fix dayes after he returned againe from the citie QVINGVBECLISTE, and assaulted the citie afresh, but was at length glad to giue ouer the siege and be gone, when he had lost of his best souldiors about two thousand, and of the defendants slaine but a hundred and twentie. After his departure there was ten thousand great shot found, wherewith he had battered the towne and the castle, which was for this time thus worthly defended. The Turks in the meane time after their wonted manner ceased not to doe what harme they could in the Tuscane sea, and had againe miserably spoiled the Island of CORSIKA: for withstanding of whom, the bishop of ROME exacted of his people a great subsidie, and finely stript the Iewes of their money, and seized vpon their rich merchants goods in his territorie: at whose earnest sute Solyman in their behalfe writ vnto the bishop as followeth.

Haly Bassa greeted with the late repulse he had received at Z I O T H, came again the next year,

A yeare, and besieged it, at which time king Ferdinand sent Nicholaus Polwiler and the countie Serinus with a power raised in Svevia and Avstria, to recouer Babozza, a castle betwixt Zigeth and Stiria, before surpris'd by the Turks: of whose comming the Bassa hauing intelligence, rise with his armie and departed from Zigeth, which he had for certaine moneths hardlie besieged, and not farr from Babozza met with Polwiler and Serinus; who joining battell with him, after a hard and sharpe fight ouerthrew him and put him to flight. This victorie with the comming downe of yong Ferdinand, king Ferdinands sonne, Archduke of Avstria with new supplies, so terrified the Turkes in that part of Hungarie alongst the riuer Dranus, that they for feare forsooke Babozza, Sammartin, San-Laurence, and diuers other small castles which they had before taken, and fled to Quinque Ecclesia.

The Gouernour of ZIGETH encouraged herewith, falling out with his garrison, slew many of the Turkes in their flight towards QVINQVE ECLESIAE; and meeting by chance with a troupe of horsemen which were bringing the Turkes pay, ouerthrew them, tooke the mony, and so with an exceeding rich prey returned to his castle. At which time also Adam the Gouernour of RAB, otherwise called FAVRINVM, hauing burnt the suburbs of ALBA REGALIS, and driven away many thousands of cattell, at a towne called STAN ouerthrew five hundred Turkes, and as many fugitive Christians, and so with a great prey and little or no losse at all of his men returned.

Henrie the French king at the same time in warres with Philip king of SPAIN, and troubled with the losse of his armie ouerthrowne not farre from S. QVINTAINS (at which time the Duke Montmorencie constable of FRANCE and Generall of the armie with his sonne and diuers other of the nobilitie of FRANCE were taken prisoners) by his embassadour Michaell Condignar solicited Solyman to haue by sea inuaded NAPLES and SICILIA, so to haue withdrawne the Spanish forces out of FRANCE, to defend their owne frontiers. VVhich thing Solyman, offended with the insolencie of the embassadour, refused to doe: yet neuerthelesse commaunded his aduenturers all alongst the coast of AFFRICK, to infest those seas, and to doe what harme they could vpon the coast of ITALIE and SICILIA; which they so diligently performed, that the viceroy of SICILIA was faine for defence of those countries to lie in readinesse with his gallics in the ports of CAIETA and NAPLES.

D In the meane time the Guife, lord Grand Prior of the knights of S. Johns in FRANCE (and brother of Francis the duke of Guife, Generall of the French kings armie in ITALIE, who vpon the ouerthrow receiued at S. QVINTINS, called out of ITALIE, shortly after tooke CALLIS) Admirall of the gallies of MALTA, went out toward the East with foure gallies well appointed to lie in wait for the Turkes, and by fortune met with two great ships laded with the Turkes marchandise, which he tooke; and by and by after light vpon foure of the Turkes gallies, with whom he had a great fight: yet at length hauing sunke one of them and burnt another, he tooke the other two. After which victorie returning towards MALTA to haue repaired his gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with foure other great gallies of the Turkes: who desirous to reuenge the losse of their fellowes, set vpon him, and he seeing now no remedie, that hee must needs fight courageously, encountered them. But for as much as he had in the two fights before lost some of his men, and 72 of the knights in the gallies lay sore wounded, hee by the counsell of the captaines retired towards MALTA: but by the way one of his gallies was taken by the Turkes, with 52 knights of the Order: yet with the rest and the prizes before taken, he recovered the island of MALTA, where he stayed that Winter, and the next Spring layd iudged FRANCE to be partaker of those troubles, which beginning shortly after, haue but of late taken end.

The immoderate fortune of the great Sultan Solyman, was not in any thing more contrarie to his desire, than in the proofe of those his children, of whom the world held the greatest expectation. Mustapha his eldest sonne, the mirrour of courtisie and true hope of the whole Turkish nation, the suspitious tyrant had most unnaturally caused to be murdered in his owne presence, to the griefe of all his subjects in generall, as is before declared; a poore Turkhangen was dead for sorrow; and Mahometes his eldest sonne by his best beloved the faire Roxolana, was departed this life also. So that now remained ynto him onely Selymus, the youngest heire of so great an empire, and Baiaxet his yonger brother, the lively image of his father; both men grown, and the sonnes of the same Roxolana; but so farre differing the one from the other both in feature of bodie and disposition of mind, as if they had not bene of the same kindred and line. Selymus the elder brother most like vnto his mother, was in the secret determination of the aged emperour his father appointed heire of that most mightie empire. Baiazet much resembling his father, was on the other side strongly supported by the care and entire loue of his mother: which whether it proceeded of a secret commiseration of his Ineuitable destinie, or that he had by loyaltie or other meanes so wooon her fauour, is not knowne; but euery man saw, that if it had lien in her power, she would vndoubtedly haue preferred him before his elder brother Selymus, and haue placed him in the empire: but the must needs giue way to her old husbands will, firmly and irremouably set downe, that the destinies so permitting, none should raigne after him but his eldest sonne Selymus. Of which his purpose and resolution Baiazet being not ignorant, began most circumspectly to looke about him, if he could by any meanes frustrate that forcible necessitie, and exchange his certaine destruction with an empire: in which his deepe and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the fauour and loue of Roxolana his mother, and of Rustan the great Bassa his brother in law, who together had in any other matter been able to haue overruled the aged emperour. Whereupon he resolutely set downe himselfe, rather to end his dayes by making proofe of his good or bad fortune, than vpon the death of his father (which by course of nature could not now be farre off) to be as a sacrifice basely butchered by some vile hangman of his brothers. Baiazet so resolved, and now already fallen out with his brother Selymus, tooke occasion vpon the generall discontentment of the people and others, for the vnworthie death of Mustapha their late joy to begin those stirres which he had before with himselfe plotted, and so to make a head, whereunto he might afterward joyne the bodie also: for why that worthe Mustapha had left behind him so great a desire of himselfe, that now it wearied many to liue after him, they had so placed all the hope of their good fortune in him; vnto whom nothing was more desired than to reuenge the wrong done vnto him, or els to run the same hard fortune with him: Other some guiltie of the immoderat affection they had borne vnto him yet liuing, and fearing to be called to giue an account thereof, thought any state better & more assured than that wherein they presently stood, and therefore sought all occasions of new stirres, and how to set all on a hurly burly: onely a captaine was wanting, Mustapha could not be againe reuiued, yet might he be strongly suppoed to liue. This deuice pleased Baiazet, as best fitting his purpose, being not ignorant of this disposition of the people. Wherefore by certaine of his most faithfull and trustie followers he found out a certaine obscure fellow of a notable audacitie which should take vpon him the name and person of Mustapha, whose stature also and countenance and proportion of bodie differed not much from Mustapha himselfe: He, as if he had by chance escaped, first began to shew himselfe in that part of THRACIA which is about CONSTANTINOPLE, and lieth toward Danubius, not farre from the countries of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA, and was for that cause both fittest for rebellion, and also best stored with horsemen, who of all others most honoured Mustapha. Hither he comes as if it had bene from a long journey, slenderly accompanied, and as if he had bene desirous at the first not to haue bene knowne: his followers being demanded (as it chanced) who he was, did rather fearfully giue them that asked occasion to ghesse, than plainly to tell them, that it was Mustapha: neither did he himselfe much deny it: whereby the people became more and more desirous to know him. Whiche beginning thus layd, he afterward began to reioice of his fortunate comming thither, and to giue God thanks for his safe arriual there amongst his friends: he tels them, That at such time as hee was sent for by his father, he durst not come into his sight, or commit himselfe vnto him in his furie, but by the counsell of his friends to haue with great promises persuaded one that was marvellous like vnto himselfe, to goe in his stead; by whose danger hee might make proofe of his fathers mind towards him: who before he was admitted to the speech of his father, was without hearing miserably strangled, and so cast out before his pauillion: at which time there was many (as he said) which perceived the deceit, but the greater part remained in error, deceived with the lineaments and countenance of the miserable dead man, who was much altered with the terrible paines of death, and supposing it to haue bene him indeed that was slaine. Which thing as soone as he vnderstood, he thought it not good longer to stay, but presently to flie and to provide for his owne safetie: and so flying with a few of his owne followers, thereby the more secretly and safely to escape; and hauing passed about PONTVS by the people of BOSPHORVS, was now come thither, where as he was in good hope to find much helpe and comfort

A fort in the fidelitie of his friends, whom he requested not now to forsake him, or to make lesse account of him disgraced by the malice of his stepmother, than they had before in time of his prosperitie. For that he was amind to reuenge the iniurie done vnto him, and by force of armes to defend himselfe: for what else had he now left? being by no other meanes preferred but by the death of another man: that he had sufficiently proued how his father stood affected towards him, and that he now liued by his mistaking, not by his kindnesse. The cause of all which his troubles was his stepdame, who (as he said) with her mischanciments led the silly old man (now almost doating for age and mad for loue) whither she would at her pleasure, and by her agent Rustan bassa forced him forward headlong into all kind of mischief: but that God be thanked he wanted not his friends, by whose help he would find a way out of these miseries, and take reuenge of his enemies: for why, he had as yet courageous hearts, and the Ianizaries, with the greater part of his fathers family on his side, & that great multitudes of people would flock vnto him vpon the brute of his name: so that they which did now mourne for him as dead (in number many) would by heapes run to help him being aliue: so that they there present would only courteously receiue him as a guest, and protect him now distressed, vntill such time as his well-willers & friends might repaire vnto him. And this at last he gaue out, not in secret, but openly vnto all men wherfoeuer he came. The same things did they also report, whom he made the people to beleue to haue been the companions of his flight: which was also confirmed by diuers of good account and authoritie, whom Baiazet had before delt withall to that purpose. So a great number of men altogether vnkowne to Baiazet, were by that meanes seduced: for this matter was so cunningly wrought, that many euen of them that had knowne Mustapha aliue, and seene him laid dead before his fathers pauillion; yet list not greatly to beleue that which they knew, but easily suffered themselves to be persuaded, that this was the true Mustapha. But the companions and followers of Mustapha, in whose minds the liuely countenance and remembrance of him was thoroughly engrauen, nothing could deceiue: yet blinded partly with feare, partly with griefe and desire of reuenge, and wishing rather to aduerture any thing, than longer to liue without Mustapha, were the first men that came to offer their seruice to this counterfeite Mustapha: and would not suffer other men to doubt but that this was the verie Mustapha, which it was falsely reported to haue been slaine. As for the deceiuer himselfe, he either kept with him, or entertained them that came, some with faire promises, some with courteous speeches, and many also with money and rewards, which he made them to beleue he had refered of the reliques of his better fortune: for Baiazet had before notably provided, that nothing should in this behalfe be wanting vnto him for the countenancing of his credit. So within the space of a few daies, such a multitude of men was resorted vnto him, as might almost haue made a whole armie. When Solyman vpon the sudden was aduertised by the fearfull messengers and letters of the Sanzacks thereabouts, what a danger was like to ensue by the concourse of so great a multitude of people vnto this counterfeite Mustapha: he presently suspecting (as the truth was) that this was not done without the priuie of one of his sonnes, thought it not a thing to be neglected: and therefore by his letters reproved the Sanzacks there by, that they had suffered the matter to run so farre, and had not in the beginning as their duetie was suppressed the same; gileuously threatening them, if they did not with all speed send vnto him in bonds that counterfeite companion with the rest of his complices. Whiche that it might be the easier by them performed, he promised to send one of the chiefe Bassaes, namely Partau Bassa (who had married the widow of Mahomet the eldest sonne of Roxolana of whom we haue before remembred) and with him a strong power of the soldiours of the court: but if they would haue themselves excused, that they should of themselves dispatch the matter before the comming of that aid. This Partau lead after him certaine squadrons of soldiours, not so many in number as notable for their fidelitie: for Solyman had caused the most faithfull of his colonels, captaines, and corporals to be called out; wisely doubting least his soldiours, either led with affection, or corrupted with reward, might take part with him against whom they were sent. For the common sort of the Ianizaries, standing in suspence at the fame of Mustapha, and the expectation of some great noueltie, fauoured that broile, and wished all on a hurly burly: neither was the matter in deed without danger. The Sanzacks after they had receiued this straight charge from Solyman, considering how much it stood them vpon to make a speedie dispatch, began now now to encourage one another to bestirre themselves, to make all the speed possible, and with all their power on euery side to oppose themselves against the attempts of this new found Mustapha: labouring to stay such as were coming vnto him, and to disperse such as were ready to come by shewing vnto them the greatnesse of the danger, and threatening them with all extremities. In the meane time Partau Bassa came on with his armie, and was not now far off: when (as in like case it oftentimes falleth out in things not yet sufficiently confirmed, and by celeritie pretended) the souldiours of the counterfeit Mustapha seeing themselves better on euerie side, began to feare, and at first some few to slip away; but afterwards, all, without regard of shame or of their promise to forsake their captaine, and flie euerie man whither he thought best. The captaine seeking likewise to haue made shift for himselfe, was with the chiefe of his countsellors and followers taken by the Sanzacks and deliuered to the Bassa, who with a strong guard sent them all in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE: where Solyman by most exquisite torments drew from them all the secret deuises of his young sonne Baiazet, and that he had purposed after such a head made by this supposed Mustapha as he thought conuenient, to haue vpon the sudden joynd himselfe with a great power, and so as should best serue for his purpose, to haue gone directly to CONSTANTINOPLE, or els against his brother Selymus. But whilest hee goeth somewhat too slowly about his businesse, his vnrripe counsels were by his fathers celeritie oppressed. Of all which matter Solyman now thorowly assured, caused the supposed Mustapha and his companions at midnight to be drowned in the sea; thinking it not good to haue these things commonly knowne, and to haue his domestically wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his neighbour princes. Neuerthelesse being mightily offended with Baiazet for so great an offence, he ceased not to cast in his mind how to be reuenged vpon him; which his wife Roxolana a woman of great wisdom was not ignorant of. Who after a few daies, at such time as the old mans furie was ouerpast, falling of purpose into talke with him about the matter, she laid together in her sons behalfe, and alleadged the vndiscreetnesse of youth, the necessitie of the fact, and the example of his auncestors in like case, that it was so provided for by nature, that euerie man should be carefull of himselfe and his, and that all men did indifferently shun death, that young men were by euill counsell easily seduced and made to forget their dutie. That it were reason he should forgiue him this first fault; which if he amended, then was it a great gaine for the father to haue saued his sonne: but if he should againe fall into relapse, there would not want time to punish him sufficiently for both faults. And that if so be he would not pardon him for his owne sake: yet he would vouchsafe to pardon him for hers, entreating now for him for whom she had before groaned, and not to be cruell vpon him one of the pledges of their loue, in whom rested the blood of them both: for in what wofull case should she be, if of those two sons (all that God had left her) the fathers seueritie should bereaue her of the one? Wherefore she requested him to moderat his anger, and to preferre his clemencie before his just indignation: forasmuch as God himselfe of all power and might, did not alwaies deale with sinners in seueritie, but for most part in mercie; whereas otherwise all mankind would not suffice his wrath. And would mercie in any place be more fitting, than in the father towards his child? She promised further, that Baiazet should from thenceforth remaine in most dutifull obedience towards his maiestie; and vpon his so great clemencie, to conuert the feare wherein he now liued into a world of dutie and deuotion. Honourable minds (she said) were retained with nothing more than with kindnesse and courtesie, that the remembrance of that his fatherly forgiuenesse, should be a stay vnto him for euer doing the like againe: at last that she would promise for him, and take vpon her, that he should euer afterwards satisfie his fatherly expectation in all kind of dutie and loyaltie. Which words mingled with teares and other womanly gestures, so wrought with Solyman, being otherwise too much in her power, that he resolved to forgiue the fault; yet so, that he should come and submit himselfe, and receiue from him his charge. This carefull mother foresew no time, but by letters secretly aduertised Baiazet, not to feare to come vnto his father at such time as he should be sent for: assuring him that there was no danger, for that his father was by her meanes appeased, and he againe brought into his father. With which good newes Baiazet well comforted, resolved to go at such time as he was sent for: yet full of feare, and oftentimes looking backe vnto his brother Mustapha, whose dreadfull example sufficiently warned him what a danger he aduentured himselfe vnto. Yet he came to the place appointed for the parley, which was in a common Inne at a place called CARISTRAN, a few miles from CONSTANTINOPLE: for such is the suspitious manner of the Turkish tyrants of these times, not to suffer any of their sonnes that be men growne, to set their foot within the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE.

A NOBLE, as dangerous for soliciting the souldiours of the court, and so consequently for the altering of the state. Baiazet was no sooner lighted from his horse, but his fathers guard were presently ready to receiue him, commaunding him to lay aside his sword and dagger; which thing although it be an vnuall matter in others that are admitted to the presence of the Turkish emperour, yet might it then in the mind of his guiltie soune raise a great feare. But his kind mother (who had before foreseene in what feare and perplexitie he would come) had conuayed her selfe into a chamber, fast by the entrie of the same house as Baiazet was to passe, where out at a little casement covered with a thin linnen cloth, she called vnto him in pasing by in these few words: Corcama oglan Corcama (which is as much as to say) feare not my sonne, feare not: with which short speech Baiazet was not a little both comforted and encouraged. But as soone as he was come into his fathers presence and had done his dutie, Solyman commaunded him to sit downe by him: then began the grim fire grievously to reprove him of rashnesse, and want of discretion in taking vp armes, which he could not otherwise conceiue of, but as taken vp against himselfe. And admit they were as he would haue it, and the best that he could make of it, taken vp against his elder brother: yet was it neuerthelesse a great presumption and most wicked fact. Neither was there any want in him, but that the whole state of the Mahometane religion (which at this day resteth vpon the Orhoman family) had by his domestically discord bene sore shaken, and brought in perill of vtter ruine, to the great injurie, reproach and contempt of his maiestie, a most deftable and horrible crime, which could not with condigne punishment be reuenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, and to shew himselfe rather a kind father than a seuerie judge; so that he would from thenceforth leaue the care of future things to God: forasmuch as none of these things are done by our appointment, but that kingdomes and monarchies are bestowed as pleaseeth him; So that if it were his destinie to enjoy the empire after his death, he should be most sure thereof as of a thing that would of it selfe come vnto him, and was not by any mans power to be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him: but if it were otherwise appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labour in vaine to strue against the will of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherefore he should now as one well warned, cease to rage and storme, and not to molest his quiet brother, or trouble him his aged father: for that if he should againe fall, and raise new stirs, it would assuredly fall vpon his owne head, neither would any place of mercie be found for his second offence, and that hee should then find him not as now his gentle father, but a most seuerie and reuenging judge. Which when he had said, and Baiazet had thereunto briefly answered as the time would permit, rather craving pardon for his trespass than excusing that was not to be excused, and promising from thenceforth to liue most loyally at his commaund; Solyman according to the manner of that nation called for drinke, which he commaunded to be giuen to Baiazet, who not daring to refuse it although he had rather haue so done, dranke thereof what he thought good, doubting least that should haue bene his last: of which feare his father forthwith deliuered him by drinking a good draught of the same cup. So Baiazet though guiltie, hauing with better successe spoken with his father than had his brother Mustapha, returned againe to the former place of his charge.

E This happened in the yeare 1555, from which time Baiazet so long as Roxolana his mother liued, behaued himselfe with all dutifull and brotherly kindnesse both towards his father and his brother; and that rather for to keepe her fauour, and not to cut off the hope which he had only in her affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his fathers kindnesse, or for any loue he bare to his brother; the regard of her being the onely thing that kept his fierce nature in quiet. But she dead about two yeares after, he as a man bereft of all hope of long life, and discharged of all bonds of dutie, fell to his former course, and began more grievously than before to reuiue the old grudges betwixt him and his brother, sometime seeking by secret practises to haue him made away, and other some times by open force entering into his prouince which was not farre off, there euill entreated such of his brothers followers as he light vpon, for their masters sake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the disgrace of him whom of all other he wished dead. He had also certaine of his fauourites at CONSTANTINOPLE, by whom he cunningly wrought by all meanes to gaine the loue of the souldiours of the court, and doubted not as occasion serued to passe ouer thither himselfe; and there to lutke in secret with such as were of his faction, and priuie to his designements. Of all which things Solyman had knowledge, but especially especially by letters from Selymus, wherein he was also aduised to haue care of his owne safetie; for that he was farre deceiued, if he perceiued not, that these preambles of Baiazet his wicked intentions, would at last turne vpon his head, who regarded neither God nor man, so that he might alone raigne vnto whose vntuly desires his fathers welfare was no lesse a barre than was his brothers, and that therefore through his sides was his life shot at: which treason had (as he said) bene of long time plotted, and now occasion sought to haue the same performed: wherefore he should take heed that he were not by such trecherie ouerwhelmed before he were aware thereof: That for himselfe he could easily beare with the injuries of his brother Baiazet; yet could not chuse but be moued with the greatnesse of his fathers dangers. By which meanes Solyman hated against Baiazet was still more and more encreased. Wherefore he by letters put him in remembrance of his dutie, how courteously he had vsed him, and againe what he had on his part promised; that there would not alwayes be place for forgiveness; that he should therefore cease to wrong his brother and trouble his father; that he had but a short time to liue; and that after his death God would assigne vnto each of them their fortunes. But all this was to no purpose with Baiazet, fully set downe to hazard whatsoeuer, rather than as a beast to haue his throat cut by his brother: which thing he as plainly saw would betide him in the raigne of Selymus; as if it had bene euen then in execution. Yet he answered to his fathers commands not impertinently, but his deeds agreed nor with his sayings, neither did he alter any thing of his intended purpose. Which thing as soone as Solyman perceiued, he thought it best to take another course, and to remoue his sonnes both further from himselfe, and also further the one from the other. Wherefore he gaue them to vnderstand, That it was his pleasure, that both of them within a certaine prefixed time should depart out of their gouernments (Baiazet being then Gouernour of Cy-tai, and Selymus of Magnesia) and that now Baiazet should remoue to Amasia, and Selymus to Iconium. Selymus was without imputation and altogether in fauour with his father: yet because no occasion should be giuen Baiazet to fall into extremities, if he should haue bene remoued alone, Solyman to seeme indifferent, commaunded them both to remoue: vnto which commaund it was adioyned, that the farther they were off, one from another, they should be so much the neerer in mind and brotherly loue: for as much as neerenesse of dwelling of the Great, did many times hinder their good agreement, whilest by frowardnesse of officers and seruants many things are on both sides done to the grieuing of their masters: and that they should in any case doe as they were commaunded, and that he which stayed longest, should not be free from the suspicion of contempt. Selymus made no long stay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be done for his sake: but Baiazet hung backe, and being gone a little on his way, stayed, complaining the vnluckie prouince of Amasia, stained with the blood of his late brother the noble Mustapha, to be assigned vnto him as ominous, and that he could be better contented with any prouince whatsoeuer than that, where the deadly remembrance of the miserable end of the neereft to him in blood, should be euer before his eyes, to the wounding of his heart: Wherefore he requested, that he might at least winter in those places, or els there from whence his brother was now departed: but Solyman would in no wise hearken vnto him. Now Selymus gone before certaine dayes journeys with such troupes as his father had sent him beside his owne, for feare of Baiazet, who yet stayed loitering and trifling on the time, suddenly returning and fetching a compasse about, shewed himselfe at his brothers backe, marching towards Prusa in Bithynia, the auncient seat of the Turkish kings; which he did not without the prinitie of his father, who liked not of the lingering of Baiazet: for what if he hauing gained the good will of the lanizaries, should haue gone either to Prusa, or directly to Constantinople? what a danger might haue growne thereby to Selymus, yea vnto the whole state in generall? In this common feare Solyman thought it best for Selymus there to stay, from whence they might most conveniently helpe one another, if Baiazet should (as was feared) turn himselfe vpon either of them. Yet was not Selymus so strong as to aduventure to joyne battell with his brother, whom he knew Selymus behind him, and that he had got nothing by his long delay, but that his brother should be the vndoubted heire of the empire, if his father should die, which was then by reason of his sickly constitution of bodie daily more and more feared: he writ vnto his father, accusing his brother that he could not more manifestly in any thing declare how maliciously he was affected towards him, than by taking that indirect course, to no other purpose but to aspire vnto the empire, and to

A haue a short cut ouer to Constantinople, if he should haue any newes of his fathers death, which he still gaped after: which his longing, if his fathers longer life should delay, then by the secret ministers of his treason to dispatch him, and by the murdering of him to possesse himselfe of the empire: and yet neuertheless, this man as a most dutifull and obedient sonne, to be of him much made of, and as it were put in his bosome: Whereas he on the contrarie part meaning well, into whose conceit neuer any such thought came; but was euer at commaund, was not had in any regard, but cast off and contemned, whose greatest request was but to shun an vnfortunat ominous prouince. After that, he conuerted his stile to prayers, requesting againe of his father to gratifie him with some other prouince, if it were but that from which his brother was departed, or with any other whatsoeuer, so that it were more luckie than that of Amasia: for answer whereof he said he would stay where he was, to the end that finding fauour in his request, he should not haue need further to retire: but if he should not obtaine his request, that then he was ready to goe whether soeuer his father should commaund. It was not altogether for nought that Baiazet found fault with Amasia; being the manner of the Turks, of the smallest things of all to diuine vpon the greatest. But Solyman vnderstood the matter otherwise: who not ignorant of his sonnes teares, knew right well, that he in them sought for nothing els but a more commodious place for him to raise new stirres in, than was Amasia, so farre distant from Constantinople. So Baiazet by many delays did what he could to frustrate his fathers appointment, ceasing not in the meane time to augment his strength with new souldiours, to prouide armour, money, and whatsoeuer els, serving for defence of himselfe and the impugning of his brother.

C Which Solyman tooke in no other part, than as intended against his owne person: yet would he seeme as not to haue any such vnderstanding of the matter: for why the warie old fire would not by taking knowledge thereof, driue headlong his sonne, who was already running too fast of himselfe. Besides that, he was not ignorant that the eyes of all nations were bent vpon this discord of his two sonnes: and therefore he desired by all meanes, that these grudges might bee with as little stirre as was possible appeased. Wherefore he answered Baiazet courteously, That concerning his gouernment of Amasia, he could not alter it, as resolutely set downe as well for his brother as himselfe, and that therefore they should doe well to goe both to their appointed places, as he had before commaunded. As for the rest, they should be of good comfort, for that he would take such order, as that neither of them should haue just cause to complaine.

swords? was it not against the emperours sonne, and happily the heire of the empire? Wherefore this warre might (as they said) well ynough be let alone, as altogether vnneccessarie, and not they to be enforced to embroe their hands one in anothers bloud, and to pollute themselves with such impietie: as for that which Baiazet did, was to be holden excused, as proceeding from necessitie. Which speeches of the Ianizaries being brought to *Solyman*s cares, he forthwith declared them to the Muphti (whom in all matters of doubt they fle vnto, as vnto a most sacred Oracle) demanding of him, How he was to be entreated who of himselfe presumed whiles he yet liued, to leue souldiors, raise an armie, ransacke townes, and trouble the state of the whole empire? and what also he deemed of them that were his followers and tooke part with him; and last of all of them also that refused to beare armes against him, and said that he had in so doing nothing offended? Whereunto the Muphti answered, That both the man and his part-takers were all worthie of death; and that such as refused to take vp armes against him, were as prophane and irreligious men, to be accounted intestable. Which the great priests answer, was published vnto the people: and by the cheefe Chiaus sent to Baiazet, to see if he might be therewith moued. Within a few dayes after there came to CONSTANTINOPLE one of the Chiaus (whom Baiazet had intercepted, being sent from Solyman to Selymus) by whom Baiazet gaue his father to vnderstand, That he was in all dutie his, and that he had not taken vp armes against him, neither refused to be vnto him in all things obedient: but that he had onely to doe with his brother and with him to fight for his life, by whose sword he must needs die, or els he by his, for that a mischeefe was to be by one of them performed; which quarrell he was resolved to trie whiles he yet liued, and that therefore he should doe best not to meddle in their quarrell, or giue aid to either: But if so be he would needs (as the report was) passe ouer the sea to aid Selymus, he should not thinke easily to get him into his hands, for that he knew right well, if the worst came, how to escape and saue himselfe; and would (before he could get ouer into ASIA) make such spoile with fire and sword, as neuer had Tamerlane or other the cruellest enemy of the Turks that euer was. Which message did not a little trouble Solyman. And withall it was reported, that the towne of AXVAR, where one of Selymus his sonnes ruled as Sanzacke, was already taken by Baiazet, and shamefully sacked. But Selymus hearing that his brother was going toward AMASIA, and now on his way as farre as ANCYRA, being out of all suspicion of danger which he feared vpon the way, so long as his brother was yet lingering in those quarters, halted now towards ICONIUM, which was with a strong garrison kept for him, for amongst other cares wherewith Solyman was vexed, it was not the least, That Baiazet intercepting ICONIUM, should get into SYRIA, and from thence into EGIPT, an open countrey, and not yet thoroughly established vnder the Turkish gouernment, neither forgetfull of the old gouernment of the Mamalukes, and therefore desirous of change; from whence it would haue beene an hard matter to haue driuen Baiazet, especially the Arabians being alwayes readie and at hand at euery light stirre, where any hope of prey was: out of which prouince also in case of extremitie he might easily transport himselfe into any of the Christian kingdomes. Solyman therefore tooke great care, that this passage, which might seeme the last refuge of Baiazet his deuices, might be stopped: and concerning the same had giuen commandement vnto most of his commanders in ASIA to be alwayes in readinesse to aid Selymus whensoever he should call. With them Selymus lay encamped vnder the wals of ICONIUM, attending euerie stirring of Baiazet, resolved there to expect farther aid from his father, and not by vn timersly fight to commit his safetie to the hazard of one doubtfull battell. But Baiazet on the other side, not vn mindfull what a matter he had taken in hand, slept not thereupon, but first entertained a valiant sort of horsemen which the Turks call Chiuirs, and are supposed to be of that people, which were sometimes called Gordij, men for their knowne valour famous. He yet lay in the plaine and open fields by ANCYRA, of the commodities of which citie (which were indeed great) he made great vse: In the castle thereof he bestowed his concubines and children; of the rich marchants he tooke vp money, to be repaid with the vse vpon the good successe of the warre; and from thence he tooke whatsoever was needfull for the arming and furnishing of his men. Besides his owne familie, which was very great, and those Chiuirs which he spoke of, many repaired vnto him, which had beene in former time beholden to his mother, his sister, and Rustan the great Bassa; many also of the reliques of the valiant Mustapha, and Achomates the great Bassa, valiant men and expert souldiors, who desired to reuenge the vnworthie death of their lords and masters, euen with their owne. Neither was there wanting an exceeding Baiazet his message to his father requesting him not to intermeddle betwixt him and his brother.

Selymus departs toward Iconium.

Baiazet staies at Ancyra, and there vaileth his forces.

A rablement of such as wearie of the present state, desired some new inuouation and change. The commiseration also of the state of the vnfortunat Baiazet, easily drew many to take part with him, whose whole trust was in his valour: they fauoured the young prince, liuely resembling his father: when as in Selymus appeared no likenesse of himselfe, but the expresse lineaments of his mothers face and bodie, a woman whilest she liued generally hated of all the people: he went heavily as ouercharged with his greafe paunch, blub cheeked, and exceeding red faced; so that the souldiors in sport would say, he was fed with greene mault: he was altogether giuen to his ease, and spent his time in drunkenness and sleepe, neither was he courteous of speech, nor willing to deserue well of any man; for he would not (as he said) offend his father by being popular, so was he onely of his father beloued, and of all other men hated: of all kind of men, he most disliked of them that set all their hope in a bountifull and couragious prince. The same souldiors were also wont to call Baiazet, Softie (that is to say) a man giuen to quiennesse and studie; but after that they saw him take vp armes, and for the safegard of himselfe and his children readie to aduenture any thing, they began to admire him as a man of valour and courage: and to aske among themselves, Why his father should reject him of such worth, the expresse image of himselfe, and preferre before him that gorbellied sluggard in whom no sparke of his fathers valour was to be seene? That his entring into armes was no fault, being thereunto by necessitie enforced, for, had not Selymus their grandfather done the like? whereof no better example could be found; whom the force of necessitie constrained not only to take vp armes against his brother, but also to hasten the death of his father; and by so doing, purchased vnto himselfe and his posteritie the empire: which so gotten, if Solyman did not vnjustly possesse, why might not his son vie the same course? why should he so rigorously reuenge that in his sonne, that was so lawfull in the grandfather? Although there was (as they said) great difference betwene that Selymus and this Baiazet; for that this man intended no harme against his father, but wished him long to liue; neither yet against his brother, if he might by his leaue but liue, if he would but once cease to doe him wrong: that it was alwaies accounted lawfull to repell force by force, and to shun present death, if the destinies would so permit. By such affections and motiues, Baiazet his power increased daily: which being now growne almost to the greatness of a full armie, hee thought it not best to vse longer delay, but to march forthwith against his brother to fight with him one battell for his life, state, and empire: accounting it some commendation (although in vain) to haue attempted so great an enterprise. His purpose was (as Solyman feared) to get into SYRIA, which if he could bring to passe, he then doubted not of the rest. Selymus strengthened with his fathers power, lay waiting for his comming before ICONIUM, well appointed of all warlike prouision: his armie was exceeding strong, and in it many notable commanders, martiall men of great experience, whom his father had joyned vnto him; who all lay couered with their great ordinance planted in places most conuenient. But Baiazet nothing terrified therewith, as soone as he came within sight of his brothers armie, exhorted his souldiors in few words to play the men, for that now was come the time they wished for, and place for them to shew their valour in: wherefore they should shew themselves couragious and valiant, and he would make them all rich and fortunat: He told them, that their fortune was now in their owne hands, to frame itenerie man as he would himselfe; so that if any of them were wearie of their present state, there was the field wherein they might exchange it with better, and therein lay downe the miseries of their former liues: that of him they should if they ouercame, expect riches, promotions, honours, and whatsoever else, the rewards of valiant men: That with the victorie of one battell, all their desires should be satisfied, were they neuer so great: which victorie was by the valour which rested in them to be gotten, and his brothers armie, the heartlesse followers of a heartlesse captaine, ouerthrowne; for as for his fathers souldiors that were with his brother, they were in bodie present, but in mind altogether on his side: That it was onely Selymus that withstood his welfare and their felicitie, whom they should therefore valiantly seeke for in field as their common enemy; and not to be afraid of his multitude, forasmuch as victorie was still present, not with the most, but with the best: Besides that, he willed them to remember with what a chieff enemy they were to fight, who thirsted after nothing more than their bloud: And to conclude, he willed them all, not to looke vpon his words but his deeds; and said, If as you shall see me fighting for your profit, you shall likewise fight for mine honour, I dare then assure sure you of the victorie. Which said, he with great courage charged the enemy, and fighting G himselve long time amongst the foremost, and there performing all the parts of a valiant souldior and worthy captain, was for his notable valour no lesse commended of his enemies than of his owne souldiors. The battell was bloudie and terrible, and many fell on both sides. But after that they with wonderfull obstinacie had a great while fought with doubtfull victorie, so that for- tie thousand Turkes lay there dead vpon the ground; at length the victorie began to incline to that side whereon stood the greater strength, the juster cause, and better counsell. Many of the enemies being slaine, and many of his owne people also lost, Baiazet was enforced to retire; which he did so leifurely, and without shew of any feare, that it seemed to the beholders, he had well neere as well gained as lost the field: neither durst Selymus pursue him, but stood still fast in the same place, neuer more glad of any thing than to see his brothers backe. But Baiazet after H he had in contempt of his fathers commaund thus run his owne course, and satisfied his owne desire, though disappointed of his purpose, and not able to performe the journey by him inten- ded into SYRIA: turned now his course, and began in good earnest to go to AMASIA his ap- pointed prouince.

Solyman speedily aduertised of the euent of this battell, forthwith passed ouer into ASIA: for as the great Bassaes his counsellors thought it not conuenient for him to go ouer the strait before the victorie: so after it was certainly knowne, they thought it not good longer to stay, least the ouerthrow of Baiazet might giue occasion to such as secretly fauoured his quarrell to shew them- selues and so to raise greater troubles. Besides that, the fame of his passage ouer, would (as they said) much auaille both to the discouragement of Baiazet, and the terrifying of his friends: and therefore it was by them thought good, hastily to pursue him, now ouerthrowne, and not to suffer him to gather courage by the example of his grandfather Selymus, Solymans father; who had been more terribly vanquished then when he stood in his whole strength, and might seeme by that meanes to haue especially preuailed, for that he was at first vnfortunatly ouerthrowne. Neither were these things without reason foreseene: for it is almost incredible what admiration and loue, this battell (although vnfortunat) did get to Baiazet; men wondered that he durst with so small a power, and as it were but a handfull of men, encounter with his brother farre better appointed, and also supported by his fathers strength: not fearing either the disadvantage of the place, or the furie of the great artillerie; and to haue behaued himselve in the battell not like a young souldior, but like an old and expert commaunder. Selymus might at his pleasure boast K of himselve as they said (to his father) for the victorie: but Baiazet was the man that deserued to haue overcome: and that Selymus might to any thing ascribe the victorie, rather than to his owne valour.

These and such like speeches, as they made Baiazet gracious amongst the people generally; so doubled they his fathers cares, and encreased his hatred, to wish him the rather dead. For why, he was resolutely set downe, not to leaue any other heire of his empire than Selymus his eldest son, al- waies loyall and obedient vnto him: whereas the other he abhorred as stubborne and rebellious, gaping after the empire whilst he yet liued; of whom he was therefore so much the more to stand in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valour; and for the aid he had now so open- ly giuen to Selymus. For these causes he passed ouer the strait into ASIA, with purpose not to go L far from the sea coast, but as it were a far off with his fauourable aspect to countenance Selymus his proceedings: doubting by comming too neere with his armie, to endanger himselve by the sudden reuolt of the Ianizaries, which he aboue all things feared.

I my selfe (saith the author of this historie) saw him departing out of CONSTANTINOPL the first of Iune in the yeare 1559, when as within a few dayes after I my selfe was also sent for thither: for the Bassaes thought it not amisse to haue me in the campe, and to vse me courteously as their friend, for which cause I was assigned to lodge in an Inne in a village neere vnto the campe, where I lay very well. The Turkes lay in the fields round about: but lying there three moneths, I had good leisure and opportunitie to see the manner of their campe, and in part to know the order of their martiall discipline. So I attiring my selfe in such apparell as the Christi- M ans commonly vse in those places, went vp and downe with one or two companions at my plea- sure vnknowne. First I saw the souldiors of all sorts most orderly placed, and that, which he would scarce beleue that knoweth the manner of our warres, there was in every place great silence, and as a man may say, dumbe quietnesse, no brawling, no insolencie, no not so much as a word or laughter

A laughter passing in sport or drunkennesse. Besides that wonderfull cleaneinesse, no dunghills, no excrements that might offend either the eyes or nose, for all such things the Turkes doe either burie or carrie them farre out of sight. They themselues so often as they are enforced to discharge the burthen of nature, dig an hole with a spade and burie it, so is all their campe without filth. There was not to be seene any drinking or feasting, no dicing (the great shame of our wars) the losse of money or time at cards or dice, the Turkes know not. I met onely with a rough Hunga- rian and his companions, a souldior, who heauie himselve, to the Turke rather howled than sung: a dolefull dittie, containing the last words of a fellow of his, dying of his wounds vpon the greene banke of Danubius, wherein he requesteth the riuier, because it ran to the place where hee was borne; to carrie newes to his friends and countrymen, that he died an honourable death and not B vnreunited, for the encrease of his religion, and honour of his countrey: whereunto his fellows fighting bare a foot: O happie and thrice happie wight, would fortune with thee change wee might. For the Turkes are of opinion, That no mens soules goe more speedily to heauen, than of such valiant men as die in battell; for whose welfare their maidens dayly make prayers and vovves. I would also needs goe through their butcherie, where their beasts were killed, to see what flesh was to be sold; where I saw but foure, or at most fife weathers hanging readie dressed, and that was the butcherie for the Ianizaries, which I deemed to be in that campe not fewer than foure thousand. I marvelled that so little flesh should suffice so many men: but I was answered, That few of them did eat flesh; for that most part of them had their victuals transported from CONSTAN- C TINOPLE. Then I demanding what it was, they shewed me a Ianizarie sitting by, who in an earthen dish had killed a turnep, an onion, a head of garlike, a parsnep, and a cucumber, all fau- ced with salt and vineger, or more truly to say with hunger, whereon he fed as sauerly, as if they had bene feilants or partridges: his drinke was the common drinke of all liuing creatures, euen faire water. By which frugall kind of diet they prouide both for the health of their bodies, and the sparing of their purse: and that I marvelled the more at, it was the time that their great fast, or to speake after our fashion, their Lent was at hand: at which time with vs Christians, euen in well ordered cities, much more in camps, all rings with playing, dauncing, singing, crying, quaffing, carousing, and in breefe, with madding and phrensie. So that it is not vainly reported, That a D Turke sent about that time embassadour into GERMANIE, comming home, reported, That the Christians on certaine dayes did riot and became mad; vntill they, besprinkled with a certaine kind of ashes in the church, came to themselues againe, and so recovered; and that it was a won- derfull thing to see, how much they were changed by the efficacie of that remedie, that they seem- ed not to be the same men: meaning indeed the disordered manners of the Christians at Shrouetide, and the ceremonies vsed on Ashwednesday: which thing they to whom it was told, so much the more marvelled at, for that the Turkes haue many medicines which cause madnesse, but few or none which presently caseth the same. And they vpon those dayes that goe before their great fasts, change nothing of their wonted manner of life to the worse: but rather contra- riwise prepare themselues to abstinence, by taking somewhat from their vsuall fare, the better to endure the sudden change of their fast: which they so precisely obserue, that vpon their fasting dayes they will not so much as tast a cup of water, or wash their mouthes with water all the day E long, before the starres appeare in the skie: which maketh their fasts, especially in Summer when the dayes be long and hot, to be vnto them very tedious.

Whiles I thus lay in the campe, there came vnto me one Albertus a learned man with cer- taine presents from the emperour to Solyman, which were, certaine gilt plate; and a most curious clocke, which was carried vpon an Elephant like a castle; and some crownes to be dispersed a- mong the Bassaes: which Solyman would needs haue presented vnto him in the campe in the sight of the whole armie, to make it the better knowne what friendship was betwene him and the emperour, and that he needed not to feare any danger from the Christian princes.

But to returne againe to Baiazet, from whom we haue a while digressed: he after the battell at I CONIUM had retired himselve to AMASIA, the place of his gouernment, as though he would haue now there quietly liued, if his father would so giue him leaue. He had now satisfied his youthfull desires and greefe, and seemed willing from thenceforth to satisfie his fathers better expectation: and therefore ceased not by letters and fit men to proue his fathers mind. Neither did Solyman shew himselve strange from such a reconciliation: at first he easily gaue the messen- gers audience, read his sons letters, and courteously returned answers; so that it was commonly reported reported in the campe, that the father and the sonne would agree, and that the old man would pardon the youthfull pranke alreadye past; so that he would from thenceforth remaine dutifull. But all this was by the counsell of the Bassaes nothing but deepe dissimulation in the craftie old sire, vntill he had shut vp Baiazet, and so got him aliue into his hand: for it was feared, least he despairing of pardon, should with such a power breake into the borders of PERSIA (now the only place left for his refuge) as might preuent the watchfull diligence of his lieutenants vpon those frontiers: whom Solyman charged by continuall letters for to stop all the passages into PERSIA, as that there should not be any cranie for Baiazet to flee out by. In the meane time, if any came within his reach that were suspected to haue taken part with Baiazet, or fauored his proceedings, those he caused to be tortured and secretly made away, and amongst them some whom Baiazet had of purpose sent to excuse themselves. For Solyman fearing least Tamas the Persian king (more mindfull of his old quarrels than of the late enforced peace) should hardly with much doo suffer his sonne to be got out of his hands if he should flee thither, and so againe raise along and dangerous warre; did therefore what he possibly might to oppresse him before he should come thither. Which his purpose although it was couered with all secrecie, yet was it not hidden from some of Baiazet his friends, by whom he was oftentimes warned not to trust his father, but to beware of treason, and in any case speedily to provide for his owne safetie. But Solyman thinking he had now so provided as that he could by no means escape, and happily the more to deceiue his sonne, appointed to returne with his armie to CONSTANTINOPLE the day after their Easter day. But Baiazet vpon the very feast day hauing performed the solemnities thereof, commaunded all his things to be trusted vp at AMASIA, and so set forward vpon his vnfortunate journey towards PERSIA, knowing right well, that he went to the auntient enemy of the Othoman familie, but yet fully resolu'd to make prooffe of any mans mercie, rather than to fall into the hands of his angrie father. Now were they all set forward, except such weakelie soules as were not thought able to endure the labour of so long a journey, amongst whom was left Solyman, Baiazet his youngest sonne, but then newly borne: which guiltlesse babe, with his mother, Baiazet thought better to leaue vnto the mercie of his grandfather, than to take him with him; a poore companion of his wofull and miserable flight: whom Solyman as yet vn certaine of his fathers fortune, commaunded to be nursed at PERSIA. Baiazet so gone from AMASIA, vied such celeritie in his trauell, that almost in euery place he preuented the fame of his comming, and light vpon many that were appointed to haue stayed his passage, before they were readie or aware of his comming. The Bassa of SEBASTIA he thus deceiued: There was two wayes, whereof the one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his journey; and that the Bassa had alreadye taken: wherefore he sent certaine, as if they had bene fugitiues, to tell the Bassa that he was alreadye gone the other way. Which the Bassa beleeuing, left the place he had before taken, and rising with all his power to pursue him the other way; whereby it was told him he was gone, lest that way free and open for him to passe by.

Baiazet decei-

The Bassa of Erzurum deceiued by Baiazet.

The Bassa of ERZURUM he deceiued also by another not much vnlike shift: from whom when he was not farre distant, and knowing that in passing through his countrey, he was to endure great danger, he set vpon him with a wile, sending vnto him certaine of his followers with commendations: who afterwards lamentably complaining of the young princes calamitie, to moue the Bassa to pitie, at last requested that he would giue him leaue to shoo his horses in his territory, telling him, That he came vnprovided of all things, and therefore desirous in that fruitfull countrey to refresh his horses a day or two, and to new shoo them. Whereunto the Bassa courteously answered, That he would not let him to take whatsoever he needed. But whether it was for the compassion he had vpon the state of Baiazet, or for the secret loue he bare him, or that he thought by that meanes the easilier to entrap him, is doubtfull, and happily preuented by Baiazet his quicke speed, had not as yet sufficient time to draw together his souldiours. He sent also vnto Baiazet certaine small presents, seeming to be glad of his welfare and comming: who neuertheless kept on his way, resting no part of the day; and but a little of the night. The Bassa of ERZURUM vnderstanding that Baiazet came still on, made what hast he could also, and joynd his power to the rest of the Bassaes which followed after: for many Bassaes and Sanzacks hearing that Baiazet was fled from AMASIA, pursued fast after him, being charged by Solyman vpon paine of their heads to bring him backe either aliue or dead: but all in vaine, by reason of his speedie departure, and for that he made more hast to flee than they did to follow. Yet it cost no

A man deeter than this Bassa of ERZURUM, of whom we haue now spoken, whom Solyman for this cause displaced: and Selymus afterwards slew with two of his sonnes, young striplings whom hee had before in despite shamefully abused against nature. Yea Selymus himselfe and Mehmet the great Bassa, with the Berglerbeg of GRACIA, followed also after Baiazet, though it were a far off. This his departure grieved Solyman aboue measure, assuring himselfe (as the truth was) that he was fled into PERSIA: wherewith he was so much moued, that he could scarcely containe himselfe, but would needs haue gone with all his power in all hast against the Persian, to haue terrified him at hand from relieuing his rebellious sonne. But these his raging fits his graue counsellors moderated, by declaring vnto him what danger he should aduenture himselfe vnto, by reason of the doubtfull faith of his best souldiours: And what if Baiazet (as he was a desperate and sudden man) should in the meane time turne about about PONTUS and the fens of MACOTIS, and so fetching a compasse come to CONSTANTINOPLE, and proclaiming a general libertie in his absence, possesse himselfe of the empire. By which wholesome persuasion Solyman staid his so hastie a journey: but Baiazet all the way as he went writ vpon the gates and doores, That he would giue double pay to all such as should follow him: which caused Solymans captaines to haue their owne souldiours in distrust, and the more for that they might oftentimes heare amongst them, speeches of great good will and loue towards Baiazet.

Solyman much grieved with the flight of his son.

After long flying, he was at length come to the riuer Araxis, which separated the Turkes kingdome from the Persian; which hauing passed ouer, and yet not so in safetie, he left certaine of his followers vpon the banke of the riuer to keepe the Sanzacks, who still eagerly pursued him: from passing ouer: whom the Sanzacks easily repulsd, & so passing the riuer, entred a great way into the Persian kingdome, vntill such time as that they were met withall by certaine of the nobilitie of PERSIA with great troupes of horsemen; who demanding of them what they meant, and what they sought for in another mans kingdome, were answered by the Turkes, That they pursued their kings fugitiue sonne. To whom the Persians replied, That they did not well, contrary to the league with their lord and master, to come in armes beyond the bounds of their owne kingdome; and that there was a strong league betwene king Tamas and Solyman, which it behoued them to regard: as for Baiazet, their king would consider what was conuenient for him to doe, and not in that point forget himselfe: in the meane time they should doe well to get them out of that countrey wherein they had nothing to doe. Whereupon the Turkes forthwith left this pursuit and retired.

The anger prouoked by the Bas-sa and San-zacks.

But by and by came messengers from the Persian king to Baiazet to salute him, and to demand the cause of his comming, and also to see what strength he brought with him; which as some account was about twentie thousand. To whom Baiazet declared, That he by his brothers iniurie and fathers hard dealing driuen out of his countrey, was fled vnto the sacred maiestie of the Persian king, as his most assured refuge; who as he well hoped, in compassion of mans instabilitie, would not reject him so distressed, and otherwise destitute of all helpe. Whereunto the Persian replied, That he had done verie vnwisely to come vnto him that was in league and amitie with his father, whereof one condition was, That they should account the enemies of the one the enemies of the other; and the friends of the one the friends of the other. Which law to breake, he accounted a thing vtterly vnlawfull: neuertheless seeing the matter was so fallen out, he was welcome as vnto his friend, who in his behalfe would leaue nothing vnattempted, to reconcile him to his father, which he despaired not to bring to passe. So Baiazet meeteth with the Persian king, but in an euill houre, although at their first meeting there was great welcome, friendly countenance, cheerfull looks, mutuall kindnesse, often conference, and great feasting one of another; things whereby the secret thoughts of hollow hearts are best concealed: there was also a motion made of a straighter bond of alliance, and one of the Persian kings daughters promised to Orchanes one of Baiazet his sonnes; and he put in hope that the Persian king would neuer rest in quiet, vntill Solyman had made him Gouverneur either of MESOPOTAMIA, BABYLON, or ERZURUM (which governments were by the Persians greatly extolled) and that he might there liue without feare of his brother, faire from him and his father also; where if any thing should fall out otherwise than well, he might haue his brother the Persian king a sure refuge to retire vnto, and so safe from all danger. Which speeches were happily giuen out, of purpose to auert Baiazet his thought from the feeling of the present danger; who seemed vnto himselfe so assured of the loue and friendship of Tamas the Persian king, that at such time as he sent his embassadours to CONSTANTINOPLE, for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman G and him (as was commonly supposed) he willed the same embassadour to tell his father, that he had lost a father at CONSTANTINOPLE, and found another in PERSIA. But whether the Persian delt sincerely in this behalfe for Baiazet by his embassadours, which were many, may well be doubted. Like it is, that there was more faigned shew of double diligence, than of true meaning therein; and rather to feele the mind of Solyman, than to doe any good to the poore distressed prince: and the rather, for that in the meane time all things were seriously plotted, that might tend to his destruction. Which were no sooner growne to their full ripenesse, but there was of purpose a motion made, That such a multitude as followed this young prince lay too close together, that there was not in one place victuall sufficient for them, and that it was therefore more conuenient to haue them billeted in the countrey thereabouts; which would be more commodious, as well for the better victualing of them, as for diuers other purposes also. Truth was, that Tamas the Persian king, farre vnlike his noble father Ismaell, stood in doubt least hee brought vp a Serpent in his bosome: Yet there were many which thought, that it was not the Persians mind at first to haue destroyed Baiazet, but to haue becne thereunto enforced by the practise of some of his familiars and followers; who not regarding the courtesie of the Persian king, nor the lawes of hospitallity, perswaded Baiazet to thrust him out of his kingdome; whereof there was many euident tokens: And among other things it was told king Tamas, that one of Baiazets chiefe captaines should say, What meane we? why stay we to kill this hereticall king, and to possesse his kingdome? for we shall no doubt by his treacherie all come to destruction. And that vpon such occasion the king was constrained to condiscend to a deuise more necessary than honourable. Baiazet had no great power, but most of them were valiant men, and souldiours of great experience, readie to aduenture vpon any thing: of whom the Persian not without cause stood in some feare: He knew his kingdome to be neither auncient nor yet well assured, as gotten by his father by the counterfeite shew of a reformed religion: And who could assure him, but that amongst so many nations ouer whom he lorded, but that there were many wearie of the present state, and so desirous of nouelties: vnto whom nothing could chance more fitting, than the coming of Baiazet, a noble and valiant young gentleman; and that more was, desperately set: that as yet he himselfe might of right rather seeme in the power of his guest, than he in his: And that therefore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertaine him as his guest, but to coupe him vp as a most dangerous wild beast. Which to doe, the easiest way was K to disperse his power, and so to take him vnawares: for that he could not without much bloudshed be openly taken in the midst of his strength, especially by the dainie Persian of long time not vsed to warre, and as yet not come together; against Baiazets souldiours, men of great actiuitie and experience. So was the matter cunningly imparted vnto him for the dispersing of his forces, and all the commodities to ensue thereof allcadged: which Baiazet might not well gainsay, although many of his wife followers (men of great reach) did sturwily suspect the sequell. But what could he refuse, vpon whom necessity lay so heauie? where no other hope was left: where he liued as it pleased another man: and that againe to, where once to doubt of the fidelitie of his hoast, might be imputed to him for the greatest treacherie: So these most valiant souldiours, the poore princes faithfull followers, neuer againe to see one another, are dispersed into diuers countrey villages, and bestowed where the Persians thought good. Not many daies after, at a time pickt out for the purpose, they in number few, and dispersed in a strange countrey, were inclosed by many and slaine: their horses, armour, apparell, and whatsoeuer else, became a prey vnto the murtherers. At the same instant was Baiazet and his sonnes cast in bonds also; and that to his greater griefe as many report, taken as he was sitting merrily at dinner at the kings table. The Persian king seemed to haue foreseene much in this his hard dealing with Baiazet: as if that he, being a valiant and courageous young prince, and much better souldior than his brother, should haue succeeded his father in his empire, much trouble and perill might haue growen thereby; both to himselfe and his kingdome: And that it stood farre better with the sake of his estate, that Solyman (a man wholly giuen to voluptuousnesse and ease) should raigne ouer the Turks: M in whose time he might as it were promise vnto himselfe all peace and securitie: and therefore it was thought that he would neuer let Baiazet go aliue out of his hand; but rather make him away in prison, as if he had there died for melancholy and griefe. Well he was assured; that after he had slaine his followers, and imprisoned himselfe and his sonnes, hee would neuer be friends old princes, Solyman and Tamas. Amongst the rest, the Persian king sent a solemne embassadour vnto the Turke with presents, namely curious tents, costly carpets, an Alcoran containing the mysteries of their superstition, and certaine strange beasts. The cause of his coming was pretended to be, for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman and his sonne; which embassadour was honourably entertained and feasted by the great Bassaes. Now was poore Baiazet in small hope of life, his cruell father still craving to haue him deliuered into his hands to bee slaine: and the Persian yet denying to deliuer him, and seeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogether faithfully. Solyman left no meanes vnattempted to haue Baiazet him from B the Persian; sometimes he spake him faire, putting him in mind of his league, wherein it was agreed, That they should both haue the same friends and the same enemies; other while he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of warre, except he would deliuer him his sonne; he furnished with strong garisons all the frontiers of his dominion towards PERSIA: he filled all MESOPOTAMIA and the bankes of the riuer Euphrates with souldiours, especially with them of his owne guard, and such as he had before vsed in the battell against Baiazet; ouer whom commaunded Mehemet Bassa the third of the Visier Bassaes, and the Beglerbeg of CARAMAN (for Solyman was soone wearie of the field, and so betime returned home:) he also incited the Georgian people, to take vp armes against the Persians, who wisely answered, That they had not such confidence in their owne strength, as to prouoke king Tamas; but let Solyman himselfe come with C his armie, and when they saw him present in the field, then they knew what they had to doe, and that he should then well see, that they wanted neither discretion, nor valour. And because he would leaue nothing vnproued, he made shew as if he would in person himselfe haue gone to ALEPPO in SYRIA, and so haue on that side inuaded the Persian: neither was the Persian king altogether out of feare, hauing to his cost many times proued what Solyman was able to doe: But the vnwillingnesse of the souldiours, and their minds altogether estranged from that warre, easily staied the raging Turke: they detested that warre and forsooke their ensignes, a great number of whom (especially horsemen) without leaue of their captaines returned to CONSTANTINOPLE; and being commanded againe to the campe, went indeed, but with such countenance and cheere, as well declared how they were affected, and what they would doe if occasion serued for them to reuolt.

For which cause, after that Solyman perceiued that Baiazet could not aliue be got from the Persian (excusing himselfe by feare of reuenge by him whom he had so grievously offended, if he should by any meanes escape:) he thought it best to follow that which was next, and to haue him there slaine, which he was in good hope to compass; and the rather, for that the Persian had but lately written vnto him, That he could not but much maruell, to see him deale so slenderly in a matter of so great importances. That he on his part had sent him diuers embassadours, and that he on the other side had sent him nothing but common messengers with papers, which caused him to thinke that he made no great account of the matter: wherefore he should doe well, to send vnto him men of account and place, which whom he might confesse and conclude also according to the waightinesse and exigence of the cause: besides that (he was as he said) not a little in his debt, for that Baiazet and his followers had bene vnto him no small charge, before hee could get him into his power: all which it were good reason that he should haue consideration of. Whereby Solyman perceiued, that money was the thing the Persian king sought after; and therefore rather than he would in an vnsit time of his life entangle himselfe in a dangerous and vnecessary warre, he determined by the counsell of his Bassaes, rather with money than with the sword to fight with the Persian king. Heteupon was Hassan Aga (one of the chiefe gentlemen of his chamber) appointed embassadour into PERSIA, with whom was joyntly the Bassa of MARAS, a man both for his age and place, reuerend: who departing with a large company of almost the depth of Winter, with great speed and wonderfull toyle, by those long and difficult waies, arrived at last at CASHAN the seat of the Persian king, hauing by the way lost diuers of their seruants and followers: Being come to the court, the first thing they desired was to see Baiazet; whom they found shut vp in a close prison, pale and wan as a man forlorne, with his haire and beard so long and ouergrowne, as that he was not to be knowne before he was new trimmed; which done, then appeared the liuely resemblance of his wonted countenance and honour, X x x hour, so that Hassan verily knew it to be him: for he had been brought vp with him of a child in the court, and for that cause especially had Solyman sent him thither to be assured that it was he. At length after long discourse and conference betweene the king and the embassadours, it was agreed vpon, that the king should receiue from Solyman, full recompence of all the charges he had been at, and of the harmes by him sustained since the comming of Baiazet into PERSIA, with such farther reward as so great a good turne deserued: which things performed, that then it should be in Solymans power to haue Baiazet made away. With this newes Hassan posteth to his master at CONSTANTINOPLE, who forthwith caused the promised reward, together with such charges as the Persian king demanded, to be made readie, and with a safe conuoy to be sent vnto the borders of PERSIA, where they were of the Persians receiued. Presently after, returneth Hassan the appointed executioner of the vnfortunat Baiazet: for so Solyman had straightly charged him, to strangle him with his owne hands. Which thing this new made hangman accordingly performed, and with a bowstring strangled the vnfortunat prince; who is reported to haue requested of the executioner, but that he might see his children before he died, & take of them his last farewell: which poore request could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the wofull end of the vnluckie attempts of Baiazet, a prince of far more worth than was Selymus his brother, who in seeking to shun the death he feared, hastned the same before his time. Such as was the fathers end, was also the end of his four sonnes, Omer, Amurat, Selym, and Muhamet: of whom the three eldest were strangled at CASBIN with their father, whose dead bodies together with his, were solemnly brought to SEBASTIA and there buried. The youngest but new borne left at AMASTIA, and sent by his grandfather to PRUSA (as is before said) to be there nursed; was now vpon the death of his father, commaunded by his said grandfather to be strangled also. The eunuch sent by Solyman to haue done the deed, and loth to doe it himselfe, tooke with him one of the porters of the court, a desperat, and otherwise a hard hearted ruffian, a man thought fit to haue performed any villanie: he conning into the chamber where the child lay, and sitting the bowstring to the childs necke to haue strangled it, the innocent babe smiled vpon him, and lifting it selfe vp as well as it could, with open armes offered to haue embraced the villaine about the necke and kissed him. Which guiltlesse simplicitie so wounded the stonie hearted man, that he was not able to performe the intended butcherie of the poore and simple child, but fell downe in a swoone, and there lay for dead. The eunuch standing without the doore, maruelling at his long stay, goes in, and finding the ruffian lying along vpon the ground, with cruell hand performed that the other could not find in his heart to do; and so strangled the guiltlesse child as had been giuen him in charge. Whereby it euidently appeared, that it was not the mercie or compassion of Solyman, that so long caused the guiltlesse infant to be spared; but rather the opinion generally receiued amongst the Turks, who measuring all things by the good or bad successe, referre all things that fall out well vnto God as the author thereof, be they neuer so vngenerously begun: and therefore so long as it was yet vncertaine what successe the attempts of Baiazet would haue, Solyman spared the infant, least vpon his fathers good hap, he might seeme to haue striuen against the will of God. But now that his father was dead, and his quarrell by the euill successe thereof condemned: as it were by the sentence of the Almighty, he thought it not good longer to suffer him to liue; least of an euill bird might come an euill chicke. I had sometime (saith the reporter of this historie) great reasoning with my Chiaus about this matter: for falling into talke with him of Baiazet, he began bitterly to inuay against him for taking vp armes against his brother. Whereunto (saith this author) I replied; That in mine opinion he was worthe both to be pilled and pardoned, forasmuch as he was of necessitie enforced either to take vp armes, or else shortly after to yeeld himselfe to the slaughter. But he still exclaiming against him, I said vnto him, You blame poore Baiazet of great wickednesse, for bearing armes against his brother: but Selymus Solymans father you blame not, who vpon like occasion tooke vp armes both against his father and his brethren; yet he therein did nothing amisse, nor in your judgement blame worthe. And rightly, saith the Chiaus, for the euent of the matter sheweth sufficiently; that that which he did, was done by the appointment of God, and that he was from heauen predestinate thereunto: whereas in Baiazet the euent sheweth the cleane contrarie. So that which falleth out well, be it by neuer so wicked meanes compassed or brought to passe; they take it as done according to the will of God; but if it fall out otherwise, they judge it as a thing condemned by God himselfe: depending wholly vpon the good or bad euent

A euent of things, and thereby judging them to be well done or otherwise.

This yeare 1558 Charles the fifth that noble emperour (of whom we haue in the course of this historie so often spoken) who wearie of the world had two yeates before deliuered all his hereditarie kingdomes and principalities to his sonne Philip, did now the 24. of Februarie, on which day he was borne, by his embassadours solemnly sent for that purpose, resigne the empire with all the honors and titles thereof vnto his brother king Ferdinand, requesting the princes, electors, to confirme the same vnto him, which they did the 13. of March next following. Solituing as a priuat gentleman in that solitarie life wherunto he had to the wonder of the world certain yeares before retired himselfe from all worldly affaires, the 21. day of September following died of a feauer, when he had liued 58 yeates, and thereof reigned 39: a man no doubt to be worthily accounted amongst the greatest Christian emperours that liued before him. About which time also died his two sisters, Marie the queene of HUNGARY, and Eleanore the French queene, both ladies of great honour.

The knights of MALTA, who of long had been suzer to the great Bishop and the king of SPAIN for the recouerie of TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE, about nine yeares before taken from them by the Turks; at which time they also surpris'd the Island of ZARBI, vpon the coast of BARBARIE betwixt TRIPOLIS and TUNES, from whence they much troubled the Christians, traueilling by those seas: had now at length so much preuailed, that the king commaunded a great fleet to be now forthwith made readie in September in the yeare 1559: to meet together in SICILIA, and from thence to go directly against the enemy by MALTA: Vnto which fleet, the great bishop, the duke of FORRENCE, and the knights of MALTA, with many other valiant men out of diuers parts of Christendome, joynd their forces also; so that at length there was a hundred gallies and ships met together vnder the conduct of Andreas Gonzaga their Generall. But whilest this fleet from diuers places was long in comming thither, the duke of MEDINA COELI, came before with part of the fleet to MALTA, and in the haue of MARZA MOXATI expected the comming of the rest, who about the end of the yeare came thither. But whilest they there wintered, expecting the Spring, many of the souldiours fell sicke and died. At length the time of the yeare fit for their setting forward, being come, the captaines consulted among themselves, Whether they should first set vpon TRIPOLIS, or the Island of ZARBI, otherwise called MENING. The knights of MALTA being of opinion, That it were better first to besiege TRIPOLIS, and that with all speed, before Dragut should come thither to furnish it with souldiours and provision. Others thought it better first to inuade the Island of ZARBI, where the armie might be relieued with plentie of all things necessarie, and from whence they might at all times of danger in safetie retire: and from thence afterwards as time should serue to go to TRIPOLIS.

Which vnfortunat counsell was by the greater part agreed vpon. Wherefore in Februarie the yeare following they departed from MALTA, and sayled directly to ZARBI. In the meane time Dragut the most famous pyrat of that time amongst the Turks, and Gouernor of TRIPOLIS, was come thither with eight hundred of the Turks Ianizaries, and had notably strengthened the citie with men, victuall, and new fortifications; and presently sent messengers to Solyman at CONSTANTINOPLE, to certifie him of the arriual of the Christian fleet in AFRICK. But the Christians comming to the Island of ZARBI, were at their first landing encountered by the Moores, whom they repulsed, and so at pleasure landed. This Island is not farre from the maine, here and there full of boggs and marshes, other euier hath it norie, and in the midst is somewhat hillie. It was inhabited with about thirtie thousand men, which dwelt in low cottages, simply apparelled: yet is the island reasonable fertile, yeelding dates, oliues, barley, mill, and such like. When the Christians were there landed, they sent for Caranamus, a poore king amongst the Moores (from whom Dragut had before taken that Island) to vse his counsell for their better proceeding in that warre. In the meane time they agreed, with eight thousand men to besiege the strongest castle in the Island: in going whereunto the Spaniards went foremost, the Germans next, and last of all the Italians. By the way as they went they light vpon ten thousand Moores, which lay in ambush in a wood to haue vpon the sudden set vpon them vnawares; but being discouered, and seven hundred of them slaine in skirmish by the Spaniards, the rest fled. So comming to the castle, they planted their batterie, and laid hard siege vnto it. The captaine of the castle finding himselfe too weake long to hold out, fled secretly with his Turkes, leauing the castle for the Moores to defend; who vpon condition that they might in safetie depart, yeelded the castle to the Spaniards.

The Christian fleet arriueh at the Island of Zarbi.

The castle of Zarbi taken by the Christians.

Piail Bassa Solyman Admirall sent to remove the Christians out of Zerbi.

ards: for keeping whereof, Varona and Cerda, two Spanish capitaines, were thereloff with their companies. Whilste these things were in doing, Caruanus the Moore king came to the campe of the Christians and there talked with the Generall, in whose hoarie countenance rested a reverend majestie, his apparrell was after the Moores fashion of white linen, with him came also the king of TUNES his sonne. In talking with the Generall, his manner was to sit down upon the ground, and wisely discoursed how the Turkes were to be removed out of AFRICA. But in the middelt of these discourses, when such a thing was least feared, suddenly a pinnace brought newes from sea, That Piail Bassa the Turkes great Admirall was coming thither with a great fleet of 85 gallies, and that moe were daily repairing unto him on every side, which was indeed true. For Solyman understanding from Dragut the archpyrat, that Island to be by the Christians now possessed and fortified, thought it not (in his so great power and flourishing estate) to stand with his honour to suffer, but rather to give aid vnto the Moores of that Island, a people agreeing in religion with himselfe: and therefore commanded Piail Bassa his Admirall to take in hand that expedition. VVho thereupon rigged vp a great fleet well appointed and strongly manned, with a number of the Turkes best and most approued soldiers, as well Janizaries as others: yett all both doubtfull and fearefull of the long journey, as also of the fame of the enemies with whom they were to encounter: for why the Turkes had conceived a great opinion of the valour of the Spaniards, as knowing great warres both of auncient and later times to haue bene by that nation (to the immortal praise thereof) most happily performed: they remembered well Charles the fifth, and dayly heard much of king Philip, the heire both of his fathers vertues and kingdomes, which made them so careful, that many of them before their setting forth (as in time of greatest danger) made their wils, and so departed from CONSTANTINOPLE, taking their leaue of their friends; as if they should neuer haue thither returned againe. So that all the citie was in a confused feare: neither was there any man whether he went or stayed, that hung not in suspense with the doubtfull expectation of the euent of that warre. Howbeit, Piail with this great fleet with long sayling and a prosperous wind was at length come well neere as farre as MALTA, and knowledge thereof (as is aforesaid) given vnto the Christian fleet at ZERBI. VVith which vnexpected newes the Christians there were not a little troubled: neuerthelesse they fortified the castle with new fortifications and bulwarkes; and fell to agreement with the principall man amongst the Moores of the Island (who commanded the rest, and had before plucked downe the ensignes of Dragut, and set vp the king of SPAINES) That he should yearely pay vnto the king of SPAINES (as he had before vnto Dragut) six thousand crownes, one cammell, foure ostriches, foure sparrow hawkes, and foure blew faulcons: a tribute fit for such an Island.

But shortly after, viz. the ninth of May, the Great Master of MALTA by another pinnace gaue the Christians at ZERBI againe to vnderstand, That the Turkes fleet was euen now at hand, and already departed from the Island of Gozo, well appointed and strongly manned: and that therefore he aduised them with speed to hoise saile, and to get them to some place of more safetie, or els to come to him to MALTA, for feare of being by so great a power of the Turkes suddenly oppressed. Whereupon John Andreas Auria the Admirall sent vnto the Generall, requesting him presently to come aboard, that so they might before the coming of the Turkes fleet retire themselves to some place of more assurance. But he for all that stayed still at the castle, where the Christians had built foure strong bulwarkes: whereof they had named one Auriaes, another Gonzagues, the third the Viceroyes, and the fourth the Knights, not yett all perfectly finished: as for the castle it selfe, they called it Philip-Alcazer, by the name of the king. But whilste the Generall is thus busie, and vainly hopeth to keepe both the castle and his ships, he the next day decrying from farre the coming of the Turkes great fleet, hastned with the Admirall to be gone: and putting twice to sea, was both times by a contrary wind driven againe into the haven, so that he and the Admirall had much adoe in time to get themselves into the castle: for the wind was so fauourable for the Turkes, and brought them so fast on, that the Christians dismayed with their suddaine coming, knew not now well what to doe or which way to turne themselves. But by good hap the greater part of the ships and foureteene gallies were got out and gone the night before, and the Great Master had in Aprill called home his gallies, wherewith and ten others of his owne he afterwards defended the frontiers of his Island. As for the rest of the fleet that stayed for the Generall and the Admirall, some few gallies escaped by flight, othersome ran themselves aground, ten of which were presently taken by the Turkes, as were the rest also that were left, although they for a while did what they might to haue saued themselves. The night following the Viceroy and the Admirall secretly stole out of the castle, and so by good fortune in two small frigots fled to MALTA. Caruanus also the Moore king, with the prince of TUNES, got them away into the maine. Gonzaga the Viceroy departing from MALTA into SICILIA, provided as he might for the safetie of that countrey. Auria in the meane time gathered together the remainder of the disperfed fleet, hauing lost in this vnfortunat expedition seuentene gallies, with a great part of the ships.

Now in the castle was left as Generall Don Aluarius de Sandes, a valiant gentleman of great spirit and long experience, with five thousand footmen, some Germanes, some Italians, but for the most part Spaniards; besides a thousand other that were no souldiors. So that the Turkes beginning to besiege the same the seuenteenth of May, were by them many times notably encountered, and in their assaults repulsed. Vnto this siege at length came Dragut the pyrat, who with fifteen great pieces which he brought with him from TRIPOLIS, encreased the furie of the Turkes batterie. Neither were the Christians in the meane time wanting vnto themselves, hauing in the castle fortie great pieces of artillerie, wherewith they slew a number of the Turkes and Moores: and sometimes falling out, fought with them hand to hand; and hauing slaine and wounded many, retired againe into the castle. In this manner the siege continued three months with many an hot and desperat skirmish: during which time, nothing more troubled the defendants than thirst in that hot and drie climat and intemperat time of the yeare: for why in the castle there was but one great cesterne, which although it yielded some good store of water, yett was it not ynough to suffice so great a multitude, but was by measure still sparingly giuen out vnto the souldiors so farre as it would serue, no man hauing more allowed him than would suffice to keepe him alieue: the quantitie wherof some augmented by distilling of the sea water, and mingling it with their allowance, and so well eased their thirst, vntill such time as hauing spent all lying vpon the ground halfe dead, gaping and still crying out nothing but water, water; into whose drie mouths, if any man vpon compassion vouchsafed to poure a litle water, they as men reuiued therewith would presently sit vp, vntill that for thirst they fell downe againe, and so at length as men roasted gaue vp the ghost. Thus many died daily, beside them whom the chance of warre and other diseases without helpe consumed in so great a distresse. Don Aluarius the Gouverneur considering the great extremitie they were now brought vnto, attempted with Don Sanchez de Leyua Admirall of the Neapolitane gallies, Bellingerius de Requesens Admirall of the Sicilian gallies, and some others by night to haue escaped away into a gallic which lay vnder the castle, but in doing thereof were perceived by the Turkes, and so all taken. VVherupon such souldiors as sicknesse and the enemies sword had yett left alieue, pinched with extreame necessitie, forsaken of their best capitaines, and out of all hope of releefe also, couenancing their liues only with the enemye, yielded themselves into most miserable captiuitie. In this vnfortunat expedition perished about eightene thousand Christians, some with sicknesse, some drowned, but most slaine, beside the losse of a great part of the fleet also.

Of this victorie Piail sent newes by one of his gallies to CONSTANTINOPLE, which for the more manifesting thereof, dragged at the poupe thereof a great ensigne of the Christians, with the picture of Christ crucified therein. VVhich was no soone come into the haven, but that the rumour of the ouerthrow of the Christians was forthwith blowne through the whole citie, the Turkes exceedingly rejoycing one with another for the newes of so great a victorie: yea many of them not so contented, came by heapes to the gate of the house where the emperor Ferdinands embassadour lay, and there meeting with his seruants, by way of derision asked them, if they had any brethren, kinsmen, or friends in the Spanish fleet at ZERBI, for if you haue (said they) you shall shortly see them here. Besides that, they with many words most insolently bragged of their owne valour, and scorned the cowardise of the Christians, asking who were able to withstand them, now that the Spaniards was also ouercome. All which with much more the embassadours men with great griefe were enforced to heare; but there was no remedie, seeing God had so appointed it. Shortly after, in September, the victorious fleet returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, dragging with it the prisoners, spoiles, and gallies of the Christians, a sight no lesse pleasant vnto the Turkes, than heauie vnto the Christians: and that night it lay at anchor neere vnto the rocks in the face of the citie, with the greater pompe and glorie to come the next day into the haven. which time Solyman himselfe was come downe into a gallerie nere vnto the hauens mouth, ad-joyning vnto his garden, the better to see the comming in of the fleet, and the Christian captains set there to shew vpon the poupe of the Admirall gallic, namely, Don Aluarus de Sandes, Don Sanchius de Leyua, and Don Bellingerus de Requesenes, all of late great commaunders: as for the Christian gallies all disarmed and vntrigged, so to seeme the more contemptible in companie of the Turkes, they were towed at the taile of the Turkes gallies. They which then saw Solyman countenance, perceiued not in him any signe at all of any insolent joy. I my selfe (sayth Busbe- quius, then the emperour Ferdinands embassadour there) saw him two dayes after going to the church with the same countenance he had alwayes, with the same seueritie and grauitie, as if this victorie had nothing concerned him, nor any thing chanced strange or vnexpected: so capable was the great heart of that old sire of any fortune, were it neuer so great, and his mind so settled, as to receive so great applause and rejoycing without mouing. Within a few dayes after the Christian captiues (before almost starued with hunger) were brought to the Court: many of whom could scarce stand vpon their legs, some others for weakenesse fell downe and fainted, and other-some died outright: they were all scornfully led in triumph, with their Armes disordered & scornfully put vpon them: the Turkes in the meane time insulting round about them, promising vnto themselves the empire of the whole world: and vainely asking, What enemy they were to feare, now that the Spaniard was overcome. Aluarus Sandes, as cheefe of all the prisoners, being brought into the Diuano before the Visier Bassaes, and demanded by Rustan Bassa, What his master meant, being not able to defend his owne, to inuade other mens? answered, That it became not him to judge thereon; and himselfe to haue done but his dutie, with such faithfulness as was meet to put in execution what he was commaunded by his lord, although he had no good fortune therein. After that, he besought the Bassaes vpon his knee, to speak for him vnto Solyman, for that he had at home a poore wife, with certaine small children, for whom he requested him to spare him. Whereunto Rustan Bassa (contrarie to his manner) courteously answered, his Soue-raigne to be of a mild and gentle nature, and that he was in good hope his pardon might bee of him obtained: so was he commaunded away vnto Caradines his castle, towards the blacke sea.
But he was not gone farre, but that he was called backe againe; for that the Great Chamberlain, a man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet seene him: for which cause hee was sent for backe againe; wherewith he was not a little troubled, fearing least the Bassaes hauing changed their minds, would haue put him to death. The rest of the captiues of the better sort were committed to the castle of Pera, and amongst them Don Sanchius de Leyua, with his two base sons, and also Don Bellingerus Requesenes: which two great men, with Don Aluarus de Sandes, were neuerthelesse afterwards with much adoe and almost beyond all hope, at the request of the em-perour, and by the dexteritie of his embassadour, by Solyman set at libertie; although he had before denied them vnto Saluat the French kings embassadour, who had beene an earnest inter-cessour for them. Yet before they were deliuered out of prison, the Muphti or Turkes great priest was asked his opinion, Whether it were lawfull for a greater number of Turkes to exchange a few Christian captiues (for the embassadour beside the rewards he had promised vnto the Bassaes, to further the matter; had also vnderaken, that fortie common prisoners of the Turkes should be set at libertie for them) whereunto the Muphti answered; That the doctors of their law were of diuers opinions concerning that question, some saying that it was lawfull, and some not; howbeit as then it was by him resolved vpon vnto the more fauourable part, and the exchange allowed.

There were among the prisoners taken at Zembri, besides these noble men of whom we haue before spoken, two other noble gentlemen right honourably borne, Don John of Cardona Don Bellinger his sonne in law, and Don Gasto the duke of Medina his sonne, to whom yet but a youth his father neuerthelesse had giuen an honourable place in the armie. Of these two Don John had wisely taken order for a great summe of money to be left in the island of Chio; by the way as the Turkes fleet went to Constantinople, from whence he afterwards in safetie got into Spain. But Gasto was by Piall Bassa (vpon hope of a great raunsome) purposely hid out of the way, which had like to haue wrought his destruction: for Solyman hauing gotten an inkling thereof by the instigation of Rustan, laboured for nothing more than to haue Gasto found out, so to haue a more iust occasion for the putting of Piall to death, being taken tardie in so manifest a fault. But all that labour was spent in vaine, Gasto being by death taken away, but whether

ther by the plague (as some reported) or by Piall his meanes (as it was more like) least the truth should be found out, is vncertaine. But certaine it was, that being with great care sought for by the duke his fathers seruants, he could neuer be heard of more: So that it was thought Piall for the safegard of his owne life, not to haue spared Gasto his prisoners life. Who neuerthelesse for a long time liued in great feare, and not daring to come to Constantinople, took occasion with a few gallies to wander about amongst the islands of Egeum, as if he had there something to doe: but indeed so shunning the sight of his angrie lord, for feare he should haue been compelled in bonds to haue answered the matter. Vntill at length he appeared at the request of Su- leiman Bassa (the eunuch and Solymans great chamberlaine) and of Selymus, Solymans son, granted him his pardon in these words well worth the marking out of the mouth of an infidell prince: Well haue he from me pardon and forgiveness for so great an offence: but let God the most iust reuenger of villanies take of him due punishment after this life. So fully he seemed to be persuaded that no euill deed ought to remaine without punishment, either in this life or in the life to come.

There was in this expedition a Colonell of the Turkes well acquainted with Busbequius the emperours embassadour, then lying at Constantinople, whose hands (in that difcomfiture of the Christians) by chance was come the imperiall ensigne of the gallies of Na- ples; wherein within the compasse of an Eagle, were contained the armes of all the prouinces belonging to the kingdome of Spain. Which faire ensigne the embassadour vnderstanding him to purpose to giue for a present vnto Solyman, thought good to present the matter, and to get it from him: which he easily obtained, by sending him two suites of silke (such as the Turkes make reckoning of) for it: so providing that one of the imperiall enignes of Charles the fifth, should not to the eternall remembrance of that overthrow, remaine still with the enemies of the Christian religion. This so miserable calamitie receiued by the Christians at Zembri, made that iland, before little or nothing spoken of, to be euer since famous.

About this time to end this vnfortunat yeare withall, the five and twentieth day of Nouember died Andreas Auria (that second Neptune) being ninetie foure yeares old: a man in his time of great fame, and of the greatest princes of that age had in no small reputation, but especially of Charles the fifth, in whose seruice he did much for the benefit of the Christian common weale, being for most part imployed in his greatest warres against the Turkes and Moores. Yet amongst all the notable things done to his immortal glorie, the kindnesse by him shewed vnto his native countrie was greatest; which oppressed by the French, he set at libertie: and when he might haue taken vpon him the sole gouernment thereof (as had diuers others before him) moderating his desires, and respecting the onely good thereof, appeased the great dissention that had of long ruigned therein; and established such a forme of gouernment, confirmed with so good and whol-some lawes and orders (no mans libertie infringed) as that it hath euer since to his eternall praise in great wealth, state, and libertie, thereby flourished. Vnto whose remembrance (for that we haue before of him much spoken in the course of this historie) I thought it not amisse to ioyne the liuely counterfeite of his reuerend aged countenance, by nature framed answerable vnto his noble vertues.

forth his gallies by force of tempest lost twentie five of them; the eighteenth day of Nouember, together with Mendoza admirall of that fleet.

Ferdinand the emperor, hauing with long sute and much entreating obtained peace of So-lyman

A lyman, and being now well stricken in yeares, and carefull both of the state of the churche and of the aduancement of his posteritie, began to deale with the princes Electors for a choice to be made of a king of the Romans; who after his death might without the trouble of a new election succeed him in the empire: commending vnto them his sonne Maximilian, a prince of great hope, then king of BOHEMIA. VV hereupon an assemble of the princes Electors was appeared to bee holden at FRANKFORD, who there meeting at the appointed tyme with general consent the 24 day of Nouember in the year 1562, chose Maximilian the emperor, some king of the Romans, and with all the accustomed solemnities crowned him: who also the year after was at PRAGUE on the eight of September with much solemnitie crowned king of HUN-GARY. Vnto this solempne assemble of the empire at FRANKFORD, Solyman the Turkish em-perour sent Ibrahim Bassa, other wise called Ibrahim son of Tata Polonias borne of whom we haue before spoken: his embassadour with presents and letters to Ferdinand the emperor, to confirm the peace for eighty yeares betwixt them before concluded, who the thirteenth day of Nouember in presence of the emperor, the king of the Romans, and all the princes Electors had audience: where, after much glorious speech in setting forth his masters goodwille, with his loue towards the emperor and his sonne the new chosen king, as willing vnto them all happinesse, he deliuered his letters of credence vnto the emperor, the people whereof made not thought amisse here to set downe, for that therein is notably to be seen the most insolent pride of that barbarous prince, and miserable state of the reuekingdome of HUNGARY, decided as it were at his pleasure betwixt him and the emperor.

king of the most noble kingdome of EGIPTE, lord of IONIA, and of the citie of ATHENS, SENAV, of the sacred temple of God, BABYLON and BASOR, RETHSAN and MADODIN, the seat and throne of the great king NASHIN, RETRAM, and lord of the island of ALGERIE; prince of the king-domes of TARTARIE, MESOPOTAMIA, MEDIA, of the Georgians, MOREA, ANAVOPE, D ASIA, ARMENTA, WALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, and of all HUNGARY, and of many other kingdomes and territories, whereof I am emperor, the most mightie Monarch Sultan Solyman, sonne of the great emperor Sultan Selym, who haue power from God to rule all people with a bridle, and strength to breake open the gates and bars of all cities and strong places: into whose mightie hand are deliuered all the ends of the world, none excepted: I the ruler of the East, from the Island of TEBER vnto the farthest bounds of AFRICA, whom God hath appointed a mightie warrior in the edge of the sword: amongst whose most mightie kingdomes the impregnable citie of CASABAX is reputed for the least, and in whose hereditarie dominions the kingdome or empire of Alexander the Great is accounted as a trifle: with me is the strength of the whole world, and vertue of the firmament: For as much as thou king Ferdinand, which art the mightie lord of Christendome; and the chosen vessell of the mightie Christian faith, created and elected emperor of the Romane people, of BOHEMIA, E VANDALIA, CRABATIA, and many other countries king and lord &c. Not long since sent vnto our court (which is the refuge of all kings, the protection and sanctuarie of all that flie thereunto, and the throne of grace for all princes of these times which repaire vnto it): one Augerius Busbeck, thy faithfull counsellour and embassadour, with letters of confederation, to renew with vs a peace; and re-enter into a further league and bond of amitie: which letters beare date the yeare from the prophet Ie-su (vpon whom and our prophet Mahomet rest the brightnesse and peace of God) 1562; the first day of Iune, requesting of vs, That granting you peace for eighty yeares, we would not with any hostilitie hereafter molest your cities, castles, countries, or subiects, but to suffer them to liue in secure peace and tranquillitie, &c. Vnto which your petition we answered you, That from henceforth for the whole space of eighty yeares shall be betwixt vs on both parts to be continued a new, true, and firme league: of which agreement, peace, and confederation, these shall be the conditions. First, That our beloued shall be bound to send yearly to our court as a pledge of this league thirtie thousand Hungarian duckass, with that remainder which you owe vnto vs for the two yeares last past: for which wee promise vnto you, that we from henceforth during this eighty yeares league, will take no part either by way of hostilitie.

hostilitie or friendship with king Iohns sonne, for as much as belongeth to his hereditarie country, whether they be in the heber part of HUNGARIE, or on the further side of TISSA; all which for all that, by law of armes belongeth to us. And the same king Iohns sonne in time of this eight years league shall be also bound in such sort to performe unto us his obedience, as that from henceforth he shall not be lawfull for him to use any warre or hostilitie against you, neither to trouble your subiects with fire or sword, nor to surpris your cities, castles, or townes, or by violence to take away or part of your people or subiects, their sheepe, their cattell, their goods, money, or revenues. We also our selues shall have no right, nor take occasion to drawe away your people, to burne your countries, or carrie away any captiues; but rather in this eight yeares space religiously keepe peace and concord with you, and vnder these conditions of peace shall also be comprehended, Michael Balasclaus, Nicholas Bathon, with all their goods and territories, and diuers other such like, which shall be subiect vnto you and king Iohns sonne. To be breefe, if happily any of yours or king Iohns sonnes subiects shall haue now before in time of warre thrust one another out of his goods, lands, or possessions, wherof new quarrels or discord may arise; we will and decree, that all such controuersies, quarrels, and claims shall be deferred vntill the definite time of the league be expired. Beside, if by chance any dissention shall hereafter arise betwixt vs about our iurisdiction, which can by no means be composed and ordered; we will that yours shall in the mean time remaine at yours, and ours at ours, all contention or enmitie set apart also many townes situate here and there by Danubius and Tatta shall be suffered to use the same law which they did in former times, so that the soldiers which are yet in garrison in the castle of Tatta shall haue no right to infest or vex those townes situate neere vnto Danubius. Furthermore, if after this peace concluded, any of your noble men or gentlemen shall fortune to haue any of our noblemen by reuolt or other occasion whatsoeuer, captiues, they shall dismisst them and set them at libertie, to retorne vnto their friends freely without hurt or ranfome; that so the concord and peace begun betwixt vs, may be the more firmly kept, and our subiects live in more securitie. All and euery one of these things we graunt and promise to be of vs from henceforth vntill the end of the aforesaid eight yeares, without all fraud or guile religiously obserued and kept; and for that purpose haue caused these our letters of this peace and confederation to be published from our royall pallace: and moreover, haue not only provided, that the copie of the same should together with our edict be proclaimed to all and euery the generals, capitaines, lieutenants of our armies, both by sea and land in all parts of our empire, and to all our mercenarie souldiours, but haue also straightly commanded, that it shall be firmly and sincerely kept. We will also, that this agreement of peace and amitie shall comprehend and concerne our two cheefe Gouernours or Vayvods of WALLACHIA and MOLDAVIA, so that none of your people of HUNGARIE, CRABATIA, SCLAVONIA, or other your countries or islands whatsoeuer, shall in any sort be molested or greued by our subiects. And if it shall fortune that some shall on your part out of their castles, set vpon our subiects, or by force take away their goods, the same men shall in any case be bound to make thereof restitution. Also if any shall flie from vs and carrie away with them the money or goods of their masters whom they serued, or if the like shall be done by any of yours flying to vs; then the same goods on both parts are to be of right demaunded and recovered againe, and the fugitives to the example of others to be corrected and punished: for as much as fugitives goods of right appertain vnto their lords and masters. Furthermore it shall be lawfull for your capitaines and commanders to fortifie or build castles, cities or townes in the borders of HUNGARIE, and to put into the same victuall, armor, or such like, but so that they do none of these things out of their owne limits. And during the time of this league it shall not be lawfull to take or carrie away any of your subiects prisoners either in HUNGARIE or other place of your iurisdiction: which for all that, if it shall by any chance happen, that then such captiues without delay be suffered safely to retorne home againe. Furthermore whatsoeuer Christian shall haue any businesse to do in our magnificent Court or any part of our dominions, as are embassadors, officers, seruants, and such others: vnto all these we not onely graunt and permit, that they may come and go about their businesse, and so againe depart from our court or prouinces; but also haue willed and commanded, them to be well and courteously entreated by our subiects, and furthered with the interpretation of our language. And if it shall fortune any contention or discord to arise betwixt our subiects on either side, about the bounds and limits of lands or other such like causes: such controuersies we will to be decided and determined by discreet and indifferent men on both parts; and the authors of such discord and variance, to be punished as suspected persons and breakers of the league. We also prohibit those skirmishes or combats, which were wont to be sometimes on both sides made vpon the borders. And desire, that the forme of this league and peace, and euery article thereof, may be

A publickly read and set up in sundrie places of your dominions; and commaundement giuen, that they may with due obedience and reuerence be obserued and kept. which we likewise haue now before promised faithfully, and assuredly to performe: and your embassadour whom a few moneths agoe you sent vnto vs, in your name requested the same thing of vs, and hath with earnest prayers moued vs by imperiall oath and these letters of credence, to witnesse, that we did ratifie and confirme the same; as if we our selues should speake to you in presence. Wherefore we haue giuen to him these our letters of pacification to you directed, that your generals, souldiours, and subiects, may be bound also to obserue and keepe all these things: wherefore, so long as nothing contrarie to this league shall be done on your part; so long in like manner, all these articles of peace shall be of me accepted and assured. For witnesse and confirmation whereof, I sweare this oath: By the true and liuing creator of heauen and earth, by the true signes of our great and reuerend prophet, by my imperiall power; and by my true faith; that nothing contrarie or repugning vnto the aforesaid articles, conditions, and promises of the eight years league agreed vpon betwixt vs, shall be attempted or done by any of our Gouernours, Generals, Vayvods, &c. Commanding moreover, all our sworne gouernours of our most mightie empire, in WALLACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, and king Stephen himselfe; and others which haue the gouernment of our empire confining vpon you, that they all and euery of them as well as our selues, shall iustly faithfully, and religiously, accept, reuerence, and keepe these conditions of peace, towards your subiects, cities, castles, townes, and other things appertaining to you; and in the least thing, not to hurt, iniurie, or wrong any your subiects. In brieft, we shall as farre as our part concerneth vs, giue vnto this most mightie and great new made lone and friendship, so great honour, reuerence, and authoritie, that that C which may giuen in the least things be had, shall not on our part be wanting. In token whereof, we haue suffered certaine Christian captiues, whom by your embassadour you requested to haue set at libertie, frankly to retorne vnto you without ranfome; out of which captiuitie they could neuer haue been redeemed, if in regard of this our amitie and friendship we had not granted them libertie: trusting that you will in like sort set at libertie such of ours as you haue captiues. Giuen at our imperiall pallace and seat in the most mightie cite of CONSTANTINOPLE, the first day of September, in the yeare of our great and reuerend prophet 969.

The same embassadour, after he had deliuered these letters, presented vnto the emperour the gifts he had brought from his Great master: which was two great cups of naturall cristall, curiously wrought, and set with stones of great price: a courageous Turke horse, with a saddle and trappings wrought with gold, and set with pretious stones, and garnished with chaines of pure gold: and foure of the fairest camels that were to be got in all CONSTANTINOPLE. In deliuering of which presents, the Bassa made his excuse, that the horse and camels had lost their beautie, being with foure moneths trauell from CONSTANTINOPLE, growne somewhat leane and wearie.

This peace thus concluded betwixt the emperour Ferdinand and Solyman, held firme vntill the death of Ferdinand, who about two yeares after in the yeare 1564 vpon S. James his day died, being sixtie yeares old: wherof hee reigned as emperour not full seauen yeares. In whose place succeeded Maximilian his sonne, before chosen king of the Romans. But immediately after the death of Ferdinand, the capitaines on the frontiers of that part of HUNGARIE which was holden for the emperour on the one side; and the Turkes capitaines with the Vayvod of TRANSILVANIA on the other side, wearie of their ease, began contrarie to the forme of the league to surpris strong holds and towne one in anothers confines, wherof ensued much trouble: The author whereof was Melchior Balas, the emperours lieutenant in that part of HUNGARIE which bordereth vpon TRANSILVANIA, who first surpris certaine townes vpon the frontiers thereabouts: in reuenge wherof, the Vayvod suddenly set vpon SACMAA, a town in the emperours territorie which he tooke; and therein Balas his wife and children. In despite wherof, Balas ransacked and burnt DEBRZIN, a great towne of the Vayvods. But not long after, the Vayvod Solymans vassall, and aided by him with foure thousand Turkes and three thousand Moldauians, did much harme vpon the frontiers of that part of HUNGARIE which belonged to the emperour, and first tooke HADOB; and afterwards besieged VNOAR. In requitall wherof, Maximilian the emperour sent Lazarus Sündt, a valiant captaine, who with an armie of eight thousand, besieged the strong castle of TOKAY, which he tooke the fift of February, in the yeare 1565; and after that, tooke the rich towne of ERDEN. lyman, who had in himself fully purposed to be reuenged of all these injuries (as well appeared by that he did the year following) to stay the emperor from proceeding farther, vntill such time as he were at better leisure to be reuenged (for as then he was making great preparation for MALTA) sent Marcus Lilius a renegat Transiluanian of CIBINIVM, his embassadour to Maximilian, to put him in remembrance of the league made with his father, and to wish him to haue regard how he further proceeded to the breach thereof. Whereupon the emperor, because he would not seeme vnwilling to hearken to peace, commaunded his lieutenants and capitaines no more to invade TRANSILVANIA, or that part of HUNGARIE which the Turkes held. Howbeit that, whilest this embassadour was thus intreating of peace at VIENNA, the Bassa of TEMBESVAR in the borders of TRANSILVANIA, made diuers incursions into the borders of HUNGARIE, and with six thousand souldiours besieged the strong castle of IVLA, and the Turkes in great number came daily into TRANSILVANIA. At which time also, Suendi General of Maximilian his forces vpon the frontiers, by messengers sent for that purpose, wished him not to giue any credit vnto the Turkes embassadour, who meaning nothing but warre, vnder the colour of peace sought nothing else but to take him vpon the sudden vnprovided. Neither ceased these troubles thus, but daily grew from euill to worke: for in Iune the Transiluanians besieged ERDEN, before taken by the imperials, and after two moneths siege had it yielded vnto them. In the meane time, Chernouich the emperours embassadour to Solyman returned from CONSTANTINOPLE, assuring him, that the great Turk for all his faire shewes of peace, meant in deed nothing but wars, for which he was (as he said) making great preparation both by sea and land. Whereupon the emperor began to raise more forces: which thing diuers noble men, both of GERMANIE and other places hearing of, came vnto him with their followers; and amongst others, Romeyus one of the knights of MALTA, and diuers others of his brethren, with sue companies of souldiours well appointed, sent thither by George Hochenheime, graund prior of that Order in GERMANIE, and then confirmed one of the princes of the empire. At the same time also, the Turkes being busie vpon the borders of SYRIA and the places thereabouts, were many times cut off by Charles the archduke; who taking them at an aduantage, slew at one time three thousand of them. Yet for all this, the Turkes embassadour was still at VIENNA intreating for peace, and so cunningly handled the matter, that whereas Eccius Salma, a noble and valiant capitaine, had corrupted the chiefe iudge with certain others of ALBA REGALIS, to haue betrayed the citie vnto him; for performance whereof, they had deliuered their wiues and children as hostages, and he was now vpon his way from RAB, which is but eight miles off, in an assured hope to haue surprised the citie: he was suddenly by letters in post from the emperor called backe againe, for corrupting the hope conceiued of peace: and so was that notable designment vnfortunatly disappointed; of which practise the Turkes hauing knowledge, afterwards most cruelly executed fortie of the conspirators, impaling some of them vpon sharpe stakes, and hanging others vpon yron hooks by the jawes vntill they were dead. Shortly after the Turkes tooke NAOSTAT, which was not long after againe recouered by the emperor.

At the same time one of the Turkes spies was taken at ZIGETH, who but thirteene daies before was sent from CONSTANTINOPLE, of purpose to view the strength and situation of that place: hee being brought before Charles the archduke and examined, said, That Solyman would assuredly the next Spring come in person himselfe into HUNGARIE, to besiege the strong castles of ZIGETH and IVLA. At which time also, countie Serinus tooke certaine other of the Turkes spies, by whom he was certainly aduertised of Solymans comming the next yeare; and amongst others Scaphir Fayda, the Bassa of BUDA his chiefe counsellor. Beside this, the countrey men (contributors both to the imperials and the Turkes) were now straightly commaunded by the Turkes, to pay no more contribution money vnto the imperials; whereupon it was easily gathered, that all that talke of peace, was as Suendi had oftentimes written, nothing else but to delay the time, and to put them in securitie. Beside that, the Turkes made incursions daily into one place or other of the emperours territories, shewing their auiditie here, and lowing by those light skirmishes, as it were, the seed of a greater warre against the next Spring, which the emperor now out of doubt of (being also warned thereof by many letters from his friends) put strong garrisons into his frontier towns, especially into RAB and ZIGETH. But knowing that to be but a poore helpe against so puissant an enemy, he resolved as his father and vncle had done before, to rest vpon the strength of the empire, and against the next yeare to call a general assembly

A assembly of the princes of the empire at AVOVSIA, for the better withstanding of the common enemy. The warres thus beginning againe in HUNGARIE, Solyman at the same time in reuenge of the manifold harmes done vnto his subjects by the knights of MALTA, whose hand he found euier against him in all his dealings with the other Christian princes, made great preparation on both by sea and land: purposing (as seemed by the manner thereof) to haue tased the memoriall of those worthie men from off the earth. Whereunto, beside the naturall hatred which he bare against all Christians in generall, and them about the rest in particular, he was much incited by Cassanes, Barbarossa his sonne King of ALGERES, and Dragut gouernour of TRIPOLIS: by whose perswasions he caused a strong fleet to be rigged vp, commaunding the lieutenants and gouernours of his ports and hauens all alongst the sea coast, to put to their helping hands, and to be readie against the next Spring. And not long after, vnderstanding partly of his owne certaine knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardnesse things were: he calling together a great assembly of his greatest princes and men of warre, deliuered vnto him his mind as followeth.

What thing I haue this fortie yeares alwaies wished, which was to haue so much leisure from other warres, as to plucke out of their nests and vterly to root out these Crossed pirats, which vaunt themselves to be the bulwarke of Christendome: that same, me thinke I haue by the fauour of God and Muhamed his prophet, at this time obtained. For we haue so repressed the attempts of the Persians, that they cannot let vs: and in HUNGARIE, from whence certaine dreadfull motions were reported, we our selues will shortly doe those things which shall enforce our enemies to hide their heads in the heart of GERMANIE, and to sue to vs for peace. You your selues daily heare the pittifull complaints of our subiects and merchants, whom these Maltēses, I say not souldiours, but pirats, if they but looke into those seas, spoile and make prixe of: whose iniuries to reuenge, all lawes both of God and man require. Neither can any thing happen vnto me more pleasing or more honourable, than if I may before I die, accomplish those things, that is, to win MALTA, and to leaue all things in order in HUNGARIE and POLONIA: except perhaps some man thinke it a harder matter for vs to thrust these Crossed companions from the rocks of MALTA, than for our ancestors to haue driuen them from BERVSALLEM, and so quite out of SYRIA, and for our selues to haue forced them out of the strong island of the RHODES. But this some will say, is neuer vnto ITALIE from whence aid may easily be sent, and the place defended by a fleet. Beleeue me, they will neuer adventure to fight with vs at sea, who remember themselves to haue been there so often by vs ouerthrowne: beside that, so little a place cannot containe any great garrison; neither if it could, could it long feed them. Wherefore vnto this expedition, we haue determind with the first of the Spring, to send a most strong fleet: and euen now we haue already commaunded all our sea captaines and aduenturers which acknowledge our commaund, to be there present with their ships. The king of ALGERES will be there, the garrisons of ALEXANDRIA are in readinesse, so is also Dragut with his appointed fleet; as for our owne, it is by mine owne direction rigged up: vnto which fleet I doubt not, but that all the strength of the west will giue place: which thing (worthie captaines) we speake, trusting vpon the helpe of almighty God, and Muhamed his great prophet, with your knowne and approved Valour. Now remaineth onely, that euerie one of you thinke with vs, how this warre may best be managed, and so to referre your desires vnto vs: which that you may the better doe, Loe, I here deliuer vnto you the situation of the whole island, and proiect of all their fortifications, which wee haue receiued of most expert and skilfull men.

Solymans purpose thus made knowne, and the matter well considered, after that they which best knew the strong places and manners of the Maltēses, had declared their opinions what they thought to be most expedient, it was decreed, that they should with all speed set forward: wherefore victuall, and other things necessarie for such an expedition, being with wonderfull celeritie prepared, they expected but wind. Of these things, Io. Valetta a Frenchman, Graund master of MALTA and of the knights of the Order; being both by letters and messengers aduertised (for he had alwaies fit men his intelligencers at CONSTANTINOPLE, who warily noted the purposes and actions of Solyman) was not afraid, but knowing that of God depended the victorie, and that men were to watch, labour, and force: he assembled a counsell of his knights, and in few words spake vnto them in this sort.

Valetta the Grand master aduertised of Solymans purpose.

Valletta his Oration unto his knights.

Solyman the Magnificent,

What Solyman prepareth (most noble and valiant knights) and what a great warre he provideth against us, you with me of late right well understand, wherefore it is needlesse for me to use any long speech with you concerning that matter. The enemy is knowne, his insatiable ambition is knowne, his strength is knowne, and his mortall hate against us and the Christian name, is sufficiently knowne. Wherefore let us all as one first reconcile our selues to God, and then provide all such things as shall be needfull for the warre. In breefe noble knights to reconcile our selues unto God, and to appease his displeasure, two things are of us to be performed: whereof the one consisteth in amendment of life, with a holy conversation: the other in the religious worshipping of him, with a firme and constant trust in his helpe, with prayer, which is called godlinesse. By these meanes our auncestors obtained many victories against the Infidels in the East. Neither is it to be doubted, but if we shall in these things ioyne together, we shall also frustrate all the force and furie of this proud tyrant. But for as much as God usually helpeth them which labour and take paines, and not the negligent and slouthfull, we must of necessitie ioyne unto them those helpes, which both our profession and the course of war requireth: which partly consisteth in our selues, and partly in the other Christian princes. For victuall, armour, money, and other such things as in warres are requisite, we will so provide, that no man shall iustly complaine, that we spare either cost or paines: I will poure out all my store, neither will I for desire of life refuse any danger. As for the Christian princes, I cannot persuade my selfe, that they will lie still in so fit an oportunitie, and in so great a danger, not of our estate onely, but much more of their owne. Verely I will not spare to exhort euery one of them both by letters and by messengers, which in part we haue already done: and I doubt not but wee shall haue aid ynough from the Pope, the Emperour, and the king of Spaine (such is their Christian zeale) and they I hope shall moue the rest. As for you, the princes and very light of this sacred Order, and the rest of our brethren, most valiant knights, I am well assured you will so fight for the most holy Christian religion, for your liues and goods, and for the glory of the Latine name, against a most cruell tyrant, the rooter out of all true religion, of all ciuilitie and good learning, the plague of the world, hated of God and man; as that hee shall feele the sting of the crosse which he so much contemneth, even in the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, yea in his houses of pleasure. For we shall not haue now to doe with him in the Island of the RHODS, far from the helpe of our friends, from ASIA, from EUROPE, from EGYPT, inclosed with our enemies both by sea and land; but in the eyes of ITALIE and SPAIN, in places strongly fortified, from whence the enemy may easily be circumuented: which that it may so fall out, let us not cease to pray unto Almighty God, and to craue his readie helpe.

The knights make preparation for the Turke comming.

When the Graund Master had thus said, all that were present promised with one assent rather to lose their liues, than in any part to faile the common cause, or to come into the power of Solyman. After that, publicke prayer and supplication was made in euery church through the Isle, and three colonels chosen out of all the knights: one an Italian surnamed Imperator, another Borneas a Frenchman, and Quatrus a Spaniard the third, all aduised men and most expert fouldiors, who should with all diligence provide all things necessary for the warre. By whose appointment the suburbs and trees which might any way be hurtfull to the fortified places, were ouerthrowne, the fortifications were thorowly viewed, the garrisons strengthened, and all manner of prouision most plentifully distributed: and letters from the Great Master sent vnto the Great Bishop and other Christian princes, requesting their aid against the common enemy. Messengers were also dismissed into diuers places, to certifie both the knights of the Order and others, of the Turkes preparation.

*Solymans fleet
Constantinople.*

Solymans fleet departing from CONSTANTINOPLE the two and twentieth day of March in the yeare 1565 kept a direct course towards PELOPONNESVS, and so came to METHON: where Musapha Bassa one of the Turkes greatest captaines, a man of 75 yeares, and Generall of the land forces, mustered the armie, wherein were numbred seuen thousand horsemen of them which are of the Turkes called Spahi: out of the lesser ASIA, conducted by the Gouvernour of that countrey, and two lieutenants of CILICIA, five hundred: and of the Island of LESBOS, now called MYTLEN, foure hundred: he had of the Ianizaries foure thousand and five hundred, which they call the Aga, neuer departeth from the citie but when the Sultan goeth himselfe. Besides these, was a certaine kind of men amongst the Turkes, who liue of the reuenues of the church; of them there was in the armie thirteene thousand, who had at CONSTANTINOPLE vowed their fourth Emperour of the Turks.

A their liues for their superstition. Out of THRACIA and PELOPONNESVS were come two colonels and one lieutenant, with twelue hundred horsemen, and three thousand five hundred volun-taries out of diuers countries. There also Piall Bassa, Solymans Admirall, tooke view of the fleet, wherein were found a hundred and thirte gallics, two and twentie ships for barthen, some greater, some lesser; besides one that was cast away nere vnto METHON, wherein was lost six thousand barrels of powder, thirteene thousand great shot, and foure hundred Spahis: besides these, there were ten gallics from the RHODS, commanded by Halyport, a man of seuentie yeares; two gallics of MYTLEN, and about seuentie galliots, and other small pyrate ships. With this strong fleet the Turkes departing from METHON the thirteenth of May, arrived at MALTA the eightene of the same moneth, and put into a haven in the Northeast part of the Isle, which the inhabitants call MARZASIROC: but perceiving themselves not to be there in safety, they removed to another port called MATOR, which is a little further in the North.

*The Turke fleet
Malta.*

The island of MALTA lying betwixt AFRICA and SICILIA, might be doubted whether it were to be accounted in AFRICA or EUROPE, but that the antient Cosmographers, and the Moores language, which the Malteses haue alwayes used, challenge it for AFRICA: it is in length from the Northeast to the Southwest twentie miles; and in the broadest place twelue. Irregardeth AFRICA Southward, oueragainst LEPTIS PARVA; and SICILIA towards the North, but more towards PACHINVM than LILYBVM: and is in circuit about threescore miles. It seemeth to haue taken the name of MALITA of Mel or honey, whereof it yieldeth plenty. The trees there beare fruit twice a yeare, and they haue oftentimes twice harvest, especially of barley and cotten wool; yet is the Isle in some places stonie, grauellie, and bare of wood: neuertheless it beareth figs, apples, almonds, grapes, and other fruit trees; planted by the industrie of man, date trees also, but not fruitfull; it beareth thistles of such bignesse, that the inhabitants vse them for wood: fresh water is there wonderfull scarce, and such wells as they haue are filled with raine in Winter, for in Summer they are either cleane drie, or els the water becometh brackie. The inhabitants are so burnt with the Sunne, that they differ little in colour from the Aethyopians: they are of a wholesome constitution of bodie, spare of diet, industrious, rather painefull than warlike, dying more for age than of sickness: their buildings, except it bee in the citie, which is in the middle of the island; and in the suburbs, are long and low (like vnto the Moores) couered with turfe or reed. It is commonly supposed, that S. Paule was by shipwracke cast vpon this island: but it is with greater reason to be thought, that it was the other MALITA in the Adriaticke betwixt CORCYRA and ILLYRIA, and better agreeeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apostles trouble and shipwracke in the Adriaticke, out of which sea it is not to be gathered of the text, that Paule with the rest were driuen. But againe to our purpose. That side of MALTA which respecteth SICILIA, hath in it many good harbours and commodious hauens, fit for shipping; where beside the port MARZASIROC towards the East, where the Turkes fleet first landed, and the port of S. THOMAS, with another called SCALA, not farre off, it hath two other notable hauens, the one called MATOR, and the other MARZAMOXY, denuded the one from the other by a narrow peece of ground: which with a ridge runneth in length from the South to the North, almost in manner of an island, hauing the haven MATOR on the East, and MARZAMOXY on the West. Vpon the head of this high ridge standeth the castile of S. ELMO, of great strength both by nature and art. As a man entereth into the haven MATOR, vpon the left hand are foure promontories, pointing farre into the haven on that side, almost in manner of islands, making so many bayes: Vpon the first standeth the gallies, whereof also it taketh name: vpon the very point of the second, on a rough and high rocke standeth a most strong castile, called the castile of S. ANGELO, wherunto adjoyneth the towne, separated from the castile onely with a wall and a ditch, and is placed in a hollownesse cut out of the maine rocke, strengthened also with the sea and the industrie of man; and is of some called the Burg, of others the new citie (in this castile resideth the Grand master, and the souldiers in the Burg): vpon the third promontorie standeth another strong castile, which they call also the Burg of S. MICHAEL: the fourth promontorie is not inhabited, from whence the sea runneth alongst the winding banks almost into the midst of the island, vnto a place called A QVA. MARSA. Again, after the port MARZAMOXY, Westward is the harbour S. GIORGIO: and after that another called BENORAT: then followeth the port of S. PAVLE, no lesse than the port MARZASIROC: after which cometh the port called SALINARVM SINVS: but on that side of the island towards AFRICK, is only one port called MILLIARIA: neere vnto the island of MALTA: certaine other little islands, as GAVLOS now GOZO: two other called CVMINTA, and another called PTERR, all subiect to the Malteses.

Thus much I haue thought good to set downe concerning the Turkes fleet, and for the description of those places wherein this great action was performed, the brute whereof then filled the world. Now shall it not be amisse, in like manner to declare vpon what strength, next vnto God, Valletta the Graund master stood against so mightie and puissant an enemy. First there was in the island thirteene hundred mercenaries, some Spaniards, some French, some Florentines, and the rest of NAPLES: there was also a thousand seamen of the knights fleet, and five hundred in the towne of S. Angelo: and of the countrey people which were fled into the strong places, five thousand, men not altogether vnskilfull of the wars: there was also five hundred knights of the Order, besides priests and squires; for of these three sorts of men, are they which are called brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the castles & towne of S. Elmo, S. Angelo, and S. Michael, wherunto they were proportionably diuided: and in the citie it selfe, which is called MELITA, being in the middle of the island, was two hundred souldiours, and as many citizens, with three hundred of the countrey people all horsemen, commanded by Jo. Vagno a valiant captaine. Besides this, euery place was furnished with plentie of victuall, armour, weapons, artillerie, and whatsoever else was needfull for the enduring of a long siege, and a warre that should want many things: and that which passed all the rest, minds armed with inuincible courage against whatsoever should chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquished, victors. All these things being in readinesse, and orderly disposed, as soone as they understood that seauen and twentie of the Turkes gallies had put into the haven MARZASIROCK, and were there landing their men: Gyon, Admirall for the Order, a valiant and courageous knight, marched thither with five hundred harquebusiers, to haue skirmished with them; but as soone as the Turkes saw them comming, they retired againe to their gallies. On the other part where the great fleet lay, two hundred of the Turkes going on shoare, met by chance with Rimerius a Frenchman, and eight knights moe; who hauing his horse killed vnder him, and one of his companions slaine, fell with the rest into the hands of the enemy. Whilest these things were in doing, a certaine Christian mariner fled out from the Turkes to the citie of MELITA, who discovered the enemies purpose, telling them, That the Turkes by the appointment of Mustapha, had determined to haue landed the greatest part of their forces, presently to haue besieged some strong place, had not Piall Bassa the Admirall exclaimed against it, doubting to be left too weake at sea: saying plainly, That he would attempt nothing before the comming of Dragut, who was euery houre expected. For Solyman had expressly commanded, that they should doe nothing without his counsell; so great an opinion had he of his pollicie and valour. But whether this his report was true or otherwise, the Turkes for all that, returning with their fleet to the port MARZASIROCK, landed twentie thousand souldiours, and five field pieces, and so entrenched themselves. This done, Piall Bassa with seauen thousand, went to view the castle of S. Michael; but for feare of the great shot, durst not come neere it. Neuerthelesse, they of the towne sallying out, courageously skirmished with the Turkes; in which conflict, Curselinus surnamed Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, so furiously assailed the enemy, that he tooke from him one ensigne, and slew one of the Sanzacks a great commander, with diuers others. When Piall was come againe into the campe, the Generall began to consult with the other capitaines, whether it were better to lay siege to the castle of S. Elmo, or to the towne of S. Michael: in conclusion it was agreed vpon, that they should with all their forces besiege the castle of S. Elmo. And going vp the hill to view the castle, they were encountered by the garrison souldiours; in which fight some few were lost on both sides. Thus by degrees, things growing hoater and hoater, the Graund master thought it good to certifie Garzas of TOLEDO, viceroy of SICILIE, how things stood, that he might the sooner rig vp his fleet to come to their rescue. Wherefore he commaunded one gallie to put out of the haven by night, and to passe ouer into SICILIE with Saluagius one of the knights sent thither on message. In the meane time, the Turkes cast vp a mount to haue battered the castle of S. Elmo, and beaten the gallies in the haven MAIOR, and so to haue opened a way for their fleet to haue entred: but they were not able long to keepe that mount, for they had scarcely well ended the worke, but it was forthwith by the continuall thundering shot out of the castle, beaten downe againe, which thing greatly abated the Turkes courage.

A rage. About that time, Ochia came to the fleet with six ships, drawne out of them which were left for the defence of ALEXANDRIA, and in them nine hundred souldiours. The Turkes beaten from their first mount, cast vp another on a higher ground, whereon they placed three great pieces of ordinance; wherewith they annoied not only the haven, wherein the fleet of MALTA lay, but the castle of S. Angelo also, the Great masters seat; and with a rowling trench drew neerer and neerer vnto the castle of S. Elmo: which although they had at first in vaine attempted, hindered by them which were in the castle, yet at last with much labour and travell they brought it to perfection (for the Turkes in that kind of worke, still performed by their multitude, are accounted to excell others): wherfore in short time, they played their great ordinance in such sort, as that they might batter both the castles of S. Elmo and S. Michael. There was in the Turkes campe a gentleman of SPAIN, but then a slaue vnto a Turke, who vnderstanding the enemies purpose for the besieging of the castle of S. Elmo, by a Christian fugitive advertised the Great master thereof: whereupon he forthwith sent Cerda and Miranda, with two companies of Spaniards into the castle, who were afterwards a great strength vnto the castle, and hinderance vnto the enemy. At length came Dragut, Gouvernour of BARBARY, long looked for of the Turkes, with thirteene gallies; and in them 1600 souldiours: after whom followed ten gallies from BONA, and in them two companies. In the meane time, Saluagius the worthy knight (before fore into SICILIE) came to MESSANA, and hauing certified the viceroy, of the state of MALTA, was by him commaunded to returne to MALTA in a gallie, conducted by two gallies of the Great masters; which hauing brought him neere vnto the island, returned againe into SICILIE: but he with his gallie (not without most manifest danger) in the third watch of the night brake into the towne thorow the midst of the enemies fleet, with the losse of but one of his followers. Where hauing deliuered vnto the Great master, what he had in charge from the viceroy, he was the same night sent backe againe by the Great master into SICILIE, to certifie the viceroy, That he had need of more aid, requesting him with all speed to send him some supply, whereby he might the better hold out against the force of so great an enemy. Saluagius discouraged neither with the labour nor the danger, presently committed himselfe againe to sea; and in short time arriued in the port of SIRACUSA, where finding the two gallies we before spake of, he sent them to MALTA, as he had in charge: with foure hundred souldiours, amongst whom were diuers of the knights of the Order, and certaine skillfull canoniers: willing them to shun the West part of the island, where as they must needs come into the enemies sight, and to passe by the East end thereof, which was farther about, but safer; and turning Southward, to land in the port MILLIARE, and from thence by the low places of the island to conuay the souldiours by night to the citie MELITA, which was but foure miles off: from whence they might easily passe vnto the castle of S. Michael. This order taken, he went to MESSANA, and there declared to the viceroy the danger of the warre, with the small number of the defendants, requesting of him a thousand footmen, which with those already sent, he thought would suffice to hold out the siege, vntill he with his whole fleet might come to releue them. But whilest these things were slowly provided, which with much difficulties and delay could hardly be brought to passe, the Christian princes as it were sleeping in so great a danger: the Turkes vpon the sudden the third of Iune, assaulted the castle of S. Elmo, in hope with short scaling ladders to get ouer that part of the rampiers which was neere vnto the bulwarke of the castle. But the defendants, in the ditch which before had no flanker to scour the same, had of earth & sagots made a large strong flanker, from whence the castle also helping them, they valiantly resisted the enemy, and filled the ditches with the dead bodies of the Turkes: Who for all that, trusting to their multitude (wherewith rather than with true valour they obtaine so many victories) thrust still on, vntill they had by obstinate force (although long first) gained the flanker: whereby they commanded all that part of the ditch, towards the port MARZAMOXER. In which place they with wonderfull celeritie so fortified themselves, that they could not be hurt by the defendants: wherein they were much holpen by their owne great ordinance, planted on the other side the haven MARZASIROCK, for with it they draue the defendants from the place, beat downe the corner of the rampier, and battered the front of the bulwarke, whose height and greatnesse troubled the enemy, but was not so commodious for the defendants, for that it was made without flankers. But night comming on, five thousand of the nine thousand Turkes which gaue the assault, tarried there: wherfore the Christians constrained to forsake the place, retired themselves into the castle. The

that side of the island towards AFRICK, is only one port called MILLIARIA: neere vnto the island of MALTA lie certaine other little islands, as GAVLOS now GOZO: two other called CVMINIA, and another called PIPER, all subject to the Malteses.

Thus much I haue thought good to set downe concerning the Turkes fleet, and for the description of those places wherein this great action was performed, the brute whereof then filled the world. Now shall it not be amisse, in like manner to declare vpon what strength, next vnto God, Valletta the Graund master stood against so mightie and puissant an enemy. First there was in the island thirteene hundred mercenaries, some Spaniards, some French, some Florentines, and the rest of NAPLES: there was also a thousand seamen of the knights fleet, and five hundred in the towne of S. Angelo: and of the countrey people which were fled into the strong places, five thousand, men not altogether vnskilfull of the wars: there was also five hundred knights of the Order, besides priests and squires; for of these three sorts of men, are they which are called brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the castles & towne of S. Elmo, S. Angelo, and S. Michael, wherunto they were proportionably diuided: and in the citie it selfe, which is called MELITA, being in the middle of the island, was two hundred souldiers, and as many citizens, with three hundred of the countrey people all horsemen, commanded by Jo. Vagno a valiant captaine. Besides this, euerie place was furnished with plentie of victuall, armour, weapons, artilerie, and whatsoeuer else was needfull for the enduring of a long siege, and a warre that should want many things: and that which passed all the rest, minds armed with inuincible courage against whatsoeuer should chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquished, victors. All these things being in readinesse, and orderly disposed, as soone as they understood that seauen and twentie of the Turkes gallies had put into the haven MARZASIROCK, and were there landing their men: Gyon, Admirall for the Order, a valiant and couragious knight, marched thither with five hundred harquebusiers, to haue skirmished with them; but as soone as the Turkes saw them comming, they retired againe to their gallies. On the other part where the great fleet lay, two hundred of the Turkes going on shoare, met by chance with Rimerius a Frenchman, and eight knights more; who hauing his horse killed vnder him, and one of his companions slaine, fell with the rest into the hands of the enemy. Whilest these things were in doing, a certaine Christian marriner fled out from the Turkes to the citie of MELITA, who discovered the enemies purpose, telling them, That the Turkes by the appointment of Mustapha, had determined to haue landed the greatest part of their forces, presently to haue besieged some strong place, had not Piall Bassa the Admirall exclaimed against it, doubting to be left too weak at sea: saying plainly, That he would attempt nothing before the comming of Dragut, who was euerie houre expected. For Solyman had expressly commanded, that they should doe nothing without his counsell; so great an opinion had he of his pollicie and valour. But whether this his report was true or otherwise, the Turkes for all that, returning with their fleet to the port MARZASIROCK, landed twentie thousand souldiers, and five field pieces, and so entrenched themselves. This done, Piall Bassa with seauen thousand, went to view the castle of S. Michael; but for feare of the great shot, durst not come nie it. Neuerthelesse, they of the towne sallying out, couragiously skirmished with the Turkes; in which conflict, Curselinus surnamed Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, so furiously assailed the enemy, that he rooke from him one ensigne, and slew one of the Sanzacks a great commander, with diuers others. When Piall was come againe into the campe, the Generall began to consult with the other capitaines, whether it were better to lay siege to the castle of S. Elmo, or to the towne of *S. Turkes in the meane time couered with the darkenesse of the night, with sackes filled with tow G and earth, filled vp the ditch which was vnder the bulwarke, but neither of any great wideesse or depth: which done, they gaue a fresh assault, wherein aboue eight hundred of them were slaine, part lanizaries, and part Spachi, and besides them many wounded, of whom the most part remained halfe dead in the ditch, where they perished, and could not be relieved. Of the Christians was lost five and fortie: amongst whom were five knights of the order, Guardampes an Auergnois, Masius a colonell of NARBONA, Contilia a Spaniard, Somaia a Florentine, and Neginec a Germane. The same night the Great master thinking, as reason was, that they in the castle of S. ELMO might want helpe, sent two hundred of his knights and as many other souldi- diors into the castle; who if they had beene moe; together with the foure hundred which were before in the castle, might happily haue driuen the Turkes both from the rampiers and the flanker, and also kept the place longer. But for as much as the Great master wanted souldiours, and had therefore sent Saluagus into SICILIA for new supplies, as we haue before said; hee in the meane time courageously expected their coming, refusing no labour or paine: yet bewayling sometime with himselfe the vnfortunatenesse of the Christian princes, by whose negligence so fit an occasion for the ouerthrow of the barbarous enemy was let slip: But aboue all things he marvelled exceedingly that no helpe yet came, especially those two galleys which (as we haue said) were in all hast sent by Saluagus: but they by the masters default kept not the appointed course; for first whereas they should haue shunned the West part of the isle, and haue turned towards the East, they shaped their course Westward to the island of GAVLOS, the master vainly affirming, that he saw certaine of the Turkes galliots lying before port MILARE: which was afterwards well knowne not to haue beene so; for the truth was, that he for feare (whereby notable designs are many times frustrated) durst not goe forward. VV hereby it came to passe, that the Great master was disappointed of so necessarie a supplie: which thing much grieved both the viceroy and others, but especially Saluagus. For he saw it would come to passe, that if the Turkes should take the castle of S. ELMO, the most assured bulwarke and defence of the island of MALTA, the other places must of necessitie be brought into extreame danger, all the way to relieue them being thereby shut vp. And that it might be taken, seemed not to him impossible, the enemy hauing already taken one fort, and laying hard siege almost on euery side of that little pile. The due consideration of these and such like things grieved the minds of skilfull men, especially seeing such slacke preparation in a case requiring such present reliefe. Yet in the K meane time souldiours were taken vp at ROME by the commaundement of Pius Quartus then Bishop, to be sent to MALTA; and by his example to stirre vp other princes to send aid vnto this sacred warre, he gaue a hundred pound of gold to Cambianus legat for the Order, and commaunded gunpowder and other necessities for that warre to be taken out of his castle S. ANGELO, that so he might seeme to be wanting in nothing that was in him to performe. Ouer these souldiours, in number six hundred, he appointed Pompeius Columna Generall, and commaunded Camillus Medices his legat to accompanie him. VVith these went many voluntarie men, of purpose to lay downe their liues for the eternising of their names in so religious a warre, and that with such an ardent desire, as that euery little delay seemed vnto them a yeare. VVherefore coming to NAPLES, they there found Iohn Andreas Auria with eleuen ships, the prince of POPVOLIA with nine, Lanicus with three, and three others, set forth by other priuat gentlemen. In these ships were embarked all those footmen which came from ROME, and so transported to MESSANA, where the kings fleet was providing. But whilest the Christians make slow preparation, considering the greatnesse of the danger, the Turkes not ignorant thereof, resolved to proue the vttermost before the strength of the Christians were readie or drawne together. For the castle of S. ELMO once taken, they assured themselves with more ease to carrie the rest: for that thereby they should first haue the haven MARZA MOXET in their power, where their fleet might in safetie ride so long as they pleased: and the rising ridge betwixt the two hauens was commodious for them both to batter the towne of S. MICHAEL, and to keepe the haven MAIOR, so that none could without their leave passe in or out thereat. VVherefore vpon these M and other such like considerations they began againe to batter the castle of S. ELMO, as if it had been with thunder: which furious batterie they continued for the space of foure dayes together without intermission. The night following they suddenly with great force gaue an assault, and with their scaling ladders had almost gained the top of the wall, when the Christians desirous of nothing

A nothing more than to come to handie blowes, draue them downe againe with such violence that neuer after they durst set ladder to the wall, vntill the very last conflict. VVhilest things were thus hot at the castle of S. ELMO, Dragut his souldiours vpon a brauerie, as if they had been the only men, went to a place called MARTIA SCALA, which is betwixt the gallowes and S. Thomas roade, as if they would haue done more than the rest: VVhich the Christians beholding out of the towne of S. ANGELO, to repress their insolencie, sallied forth vpon them, and so welcommed them, that they were glad after they had receiued a great losse, forthwith to retire to the place from whence they came. Of the Christians was slaine Bonnemius a Frenchman, one of the knights, and seuerall others.

The same time Monferratus was by the Great master sent into the castle of S. Elmo, to commaund there as Gouernour in stead of Brolia: for that he with watching and paines taken in defence thereof, was fallen sicke. The same Brolia had many times before written to the Great master, that the castle was so well fortified and furnished of all things needfull, as that he thought it impossible to be woon by the enemy: and had with cheerfull speech and braue behaviour, encouraged the knights and other the defendants, that they fought against their enemies with more than mens strength, and greater courage than is to be beleued. Neither were the Turkes for that discouraged, although they were with great losse still repulst; but for certaine daies battered the castle with greater furie than before, and immediatly gaue an assault; for they had made a bridge ouer the ditch, of matts and saile yards, of such a breadth, that ten men might go thereon in ranke: and had placed about the ditch, foure thousand harquebusiers, and brought all their C fleet vnto S. Georges shoare, not far from the castle. And when they had by the space of eighteen daies sore shaken it, and torne the wals with thirtene thousand great shot, and were now in hope even presently to win the castle: see, Baragamus a Biscane, one of the knights, and Medranus a Spanish captaine, with certaine other valiant men, ran to the bridge, and to the great admiration of the beholders, opposed themselves against the multitude of the miscreants. The fight hand to hand was on both sides both fierce and terrible: and now one of the Turkes had aduanced a Turkish ensigne vpon the bulwarke, which whilest Medranus laith hand vpon, and the Turke on the other side strugglth to cleare himselfe from him, in striuing together, they fell downe both dead, shot thorow with one bullet by one of the Turkes. At which time the foure hundred which we said were but a litle before sent thither by the Grand master, stood in good steed: for D seeing all brought to so great a danger, some of them (whilest other some fought with the enemy) thrust barrells of gunpowder vnder the bridge, some cast downe wild fire, stones, and whatsoever else came to hand vpon the enemy, and others farther off with their harquebusiers fore galled the Turkes; so in short time the bridge was burnt and blowne vp, which in the fall thereof, ouerwhelmed eight hundred Turkes: the rest (as they might) retired, few whole, but most part wounded. In this conflict the Christians pluckt downe two ensignes, the one Musaphaes, the other Draguts, which the Turkes had set vp vpon the verie battlements of the wals. On the other part toward the Southwest, a band of the Turkes had got to the top of the highest rampier; which as soone as they in the castle of S. Angelo perceiued, thinking to haue beaten them off with a great shot, slew by mischance seauen of the defendants vpon the same rampier, as they E were going too and fro: but to recompence that errour, at the next shot they rent in sunder foure of the Turkes captaines, with twelue other of their most forward souldiours. VVhilest they were here fighting, other Turkes in the meane time had cast vp a trench on that side of the castle toward S. Angelo; out of which they were quickly driuen with fire, stones, and other such like things throwne downe vpon them by the defendants. The Turkes valiantly on euerie side repulst, retired into the campe, when they had in this assault lost two thousand of their best souldiours, and of the Christians slaine almost a hundred, and wounded as many moe. The same day, Valetta the Grand master, perceiuing the port MARZA MOXET not to be verie straightly kept by the Turkes, commaunded a light Brigandine to be carried out of the haven, ouerland to the place called MARTIA SCALA, that from thence he might send into SICILIA: for he (as reason F was) considering in what danger the castle of S. Elmo stood, by letters certified the Viceroy and the bishop of ROME thereof, and of such things as were there done; requesting them of speedie reliefe. The coppie of the letters sent to the Viceroy, I haue here set downe: as for those which were sent to the great bishop, because they were almost of the same purport, I haue purposely omitted.

To Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the fleet, greeting.

The Great masters letters to Garzias Viceroy of Sicilia.

Since the time that I sent Saluagus, I have sent unto you two letters, which I caused to be sent by MELITAINTO GAVLOS; which I pray God be come to your hands. After that, when as neither messengers nor letters came unto us from you, I commaunded a man with instructions to hast to MASSANA, who when he had certain nights attempted to go out, and was at last got out, he was scarcely gone two miles, but he saw the Turks with might and maine making after him; whom to escape, he was glad to run his pinnace on ground: and casting his letters into the sea, to forsake his boat, and by flight to saue himselfe. Now the Turkes hauing remoued their fleet out of the port VULTURNVS, H I considering how much it concerneth to certifie you of those things which are here done, commaunded a Brigandine to be carried to MARTIASCALA; for seeing that the Turkes fleet is gone to another part of the island, I hope my letters will without let in short time come unto you. And the things I would haue you to know, are these: The fifteenth of this moneth, all the enemies fleet (a little before night) passed by this port; the coming on of the night letted; that we could not well perceiue the weaknesse thereof; whilest the gallies almost unarmed, were with much difficultie towed forth: want of water caused them chiefly to depart out of the port VULTURNVS, and peradventure feare of your fleet. For, as I have heard, they haue intelligence, that an hundred and fiftie saile lie at road in the port of MASSANA; for which cause also, they haue not put themselves into the port of S. Paul; but haue placed their fleet about the port MARZAMONET; yet a good part of their gallies lie at the port S. George, so to be neerer unto their land forces: yet is not the neere nesse such, but that if your fleet come upon the sudden, they will with the same feare retire to their fleet, that they would if they were farther off. No man is now to be seene at VULTURNVS, for they haue left their selfe campe at Saint Katherins and Saint Johns, hauing burnt all the countrey villages; and now lie with their fleet as I haue said: and with their armie at the castle S. Elmo, which God hath as yet kept, and as I hope will: which thing is euen for this to be hoped for, which was but yesterday done; when as our most valiant souldiors (by the helpe of God) for the space of foure houres courageously endured a most terrible assault. The Turkes hauing also made a bridge Westward toward the port MARZAMONET, we haue foure times repulsed them to their great losse; yet not without some losse also on our part, amongst whom Medranus a worthie captaine was to my great grieve slaine. With this victorie our men are so encouraged, that I am in hope the castle may be defended: untill your coming, especially the enemies batterie not so furiously now as before maintained: If I were relieved with certaine companies of fresh souldiors, or at least with those our two gallies, I would neuer thinke that this castle could be taken from us: in defence whereof, whilest we euerie houre looke for helpe, we haue spent both our men, and whatsoeuer warlike prouision we had else. We are resolued although it cost vs all our liues, to go thither, relying upon you: who as we hope for your deuotion and noble courage, will not be unmindfull of our health and welfare; but knowing the danger wherinto we must needs fall, if you shall deferre to aid us, will send us out of hand certaine bands of men, especially when they may so easily be sent: for now that the Turkes are departed from the East part of the island, our souldiors may be landed at the BLACK ROCKS. Our liues lie in your hands; on whom (next unto God) resteth all our hope: wherefore we most instantly request you not to forsake us: committing our selues, and all that ours is, to your compassion and protection. Fare you well from MALTA the 17 of Iune.

Four gallies sent to the Great master for the relief of Malta.

These letters receiued, and the distresse of the besieged castle perceiued, the Viceroy was (as of right he ought) greatly moued, and made semblance as if he had been desirous to haue brought forth his whole fleet against the Turkes. But forasmuch as the supply of ships from GENVA and SPAIN was not yet come, and that without them he thought it not good to adventure the fortune of a battell; he forthwith sent Jo. Cardona with foure gallies, whereof two were of MALTA; and with Cardona joyned one Robles campe-master, with a select companie of M Spaniards; with whom went also about eightie knights of MALTA, who staid at MASSANA awaiting some fit occasion to passe ouer: Amongst whom were these chiefe men of the Order, Parior the Great masters nephew, Vicentius Carassa, Boninscana and Maldonatus, both Spaniards, Centius of AQVITANIA, and some others: who although letted by tempest and other occasions,

A cations, they came too late to MALTA, as shall be hereafter declared; yet serued they in great stead; and had they come in time, before the castle S. Elmo was lost, happily it might haue been still kept.

The Turkes making no more account of so great a slaughter of their men, than of so many sheepe, desperately renewed the fight, as men resolued to endure all extremities. And first they most horribly thundred day & night with their great ordinance vpon the castle: afterwards they assaulted the breaches with such a multitude and force, that if true valour and hope of immortalitye had not excluded all feare out of the hearts of the defendants, the terrour of the assault had enforced them either to haue fled or yeelded: Dreadfull was the fight, and had they not been obstinately set downe on both sides, the one to win the castle, the other to defend it, that day had ended the quarrell. Five houres endured that most terrible assault, at length the Turkes repulsed by the valour of the Christians; retired: yet did they not for all that passe the night following in quiet, but with their great ordinance did so beat the defendants, that they had much adoe to keepe the Turkes from scaling the wals; which, that they should not then dare to attempt, was with exceeding endeouour prouided for by the Christians: of whom in this assault was lost two hundred, and of the Turkes an infinit number. And Dragut himselfe, whilest he there performed the dutie both of a Generall, and most valiant souldior, got a blow on the head with a stone, whereof he in two daies after died: his dead bodie was afterwards carried to TRIPOLIS, and there honourably buried.

A most terrible assault.

Dragut slaine.

The commanders of the Turkes armie, still more and more enraged with this valour of the Christians, and the slaughter of their men, gathering all their fleet together, commaunded them to compasse about the castle, of purpose to giue thereunto their last assault, with all their forces both by sea and land; and to send new supplies of fresh souldiors one after another, untill they had taken the castle. And therefore, they with great industrie prepared bridges, ladders, engines, armour, weapons, shot, and whatsoeuer things else was needfull for the assault. VVhich Valetta perceiuing out of his castle S. Angelo, and fearing (as meet was) least they in the castle should not be able longer to endure so great a furie; called together in counsell his knights, two daies before the Turkes gaue their last assault: and told them, That they all as well as he, saw in what danger they which defended the castle S. Elmo were; and that he doubted not, but that euerie one of them (vpon a godly zeale and compassion) was no lesse moued with the slaughter and danger of their fellowes and other their Christian souldiors, than with their owne: VVherefore he requested them, to declare what they thought best to be done for their safetie; yet so, as that they should not hastily determine any thing, that agreed not with the auncient valour and honor of their sacred militarie profession. VVhich motion once made, and their opinions in briebe deliuered, a decree was made, That forasmuch as the castle could not longer be holden, regard should be had for the safeguard of them that were therein: for which purpose it was agreed, that twelve pinnaces should be sent to fetch them away. But before, three knights were chosen, who should in hast the night following go thither, and tell them what was in the counsell agreed vpon, and carefully to consider in what state the castle was: which if the defendants thought was to be abandoned, they should poison the water, & cloy the great ordidance, that it might not afterwards stand the Turkes in stead. The three knights sent thither, was Medina a Spaniard, Rocca a Frenchman, and Constantinus Castriot an Italian; who not without danger of their liues (being oftentimes shot at by the Turkes) got into the castle, and declared vnto them that were there in garrison, how carefull the Great master and the rest were of them. And they on their side, first of all gaue thanks to the Graund master and the rest, for the regard they had of them: and afterwards concerning the castle, said, That if they considered the straightnesse of the place, the small number of the defendants, and multitude of the enemye, they should well perceiue in what danger they were, if the Turkes should often with such obstinacie renew the assault: yet forasmuch as they had euer hitherto felt the helpe of God so present, who had still mercifully defended them against the rage of the enemye, and wanted nothing needfull for the defence of the place; the keeping whereof they had requested of the Grand master as an honour, although they knew right well it could not without most manifest danger of their liues be holden: yet they would for all that, keep it to the last man. For that perhaps the like honourable occasion for them to shew themselves in, should neuer again be offred: wherefore they had (as they said) resolued in that place, to spend their liues for the glorie of God and the Christian religion. The course of this life (they said) said) was but short, but that honour and fame was for euer: and whereas death is to all men prefined, it were to be wished, that the life which is to nature due, should rather seeme to be by vs frankly giuen to God and our countrey, than reserved as natures debt: Which if it should so happen, they would so vse the matter, as that the barbarous enimie should haue neither pleasure nor joy, which should not cost him much blood euen of his best souldiours: This they willed the knights to tell the Great master, and to request him not to bee too carefull of them, but to promise vnto himselfe those things of them which best becomed resolute men; especially of them who had vowed themselves to that sacred warre: This answer of greater resolution than fortune receiued; the three knights, when they had diligently viewed the castle, returned to the Grand master: who calling to counsell his knights, and hauing heard the answer of the besieged, would needs heare also what opinion the three knights themselves were of concerning the keeping of the castle: of whom Castriot was of opinion, That the place was still to be defended, and that if he were there to commaund, he would vnder take to performe it; and there rather to lose his life than to forsake it, after he had once taken vpon him the charge thereof. But Aras, the French knight was farre of another mind, and said plainly, that the place could not possibly be holden against so strong an enimie; and that if Julius Caesar himselfe were aliue; and saw to what straight the place was brought (especially all the rampiers being either beaten downe or fore shaken, & such a power of obstinat enemies lying round about it) he would neuer suffer so many valiant souldiours to be lost, but quit the place, and referre his men to further seruice: for why it was the part of valiant men to performe so much as was of men to be performed; but to strue to do more, was no manhood at all: Wherefore he thought it best to doe that which men vse with members mortified, whose recouerie is desperat; in which case we doubt not to make a separation, so to saue the rest of the bodie with life. The Spanish knight in most part agreeing with Castriot, said, That he thought it not good, that the place should so easily be forsaken; first, for that the ditches and bulwarkes were yet defensible; and then, because he saw so greata consent amongst the defendants, and such a cheerefullnesse to withstand the enimie, which thing (as hee said) prefigured victorie.

These opinions of the knights thorowly in counsell debated, and euery particular well way-ed, it seemed good to the greater part, that they which were in the castle should for certain daies yet hold it out; especially because it was not the manner of the knights of the Order easily to abandon their strong holds, but rather to keepe them to the last, that euen therein the barbarous enimie might perceiue with whom he had to doe, and so see his pride abated. For if they should haue forsaken the place, they might haue bene thought to haue done it for feare: whereby the enemies insolencie might haue bene encreased, and the honourable Order of those sacred knights disgraced.

But the Turkes intentiue to that they had before determined, the three and twentieth day of Iune assembling all their forces both by sea and land round about the castle, in the dead time of the night on euery side set vp scaling ladders, made bridges, wrought mines, and with two and thirtie great pieces of artillerie battered the rest of the wals yet standing, and presently gaue a most terrible assault. The defendants on the other side bear downe some, repulsed others, slew many, euer more carefull how to wound the enimie, than to saue themselves: and where he pressed fastest on, there to shew their greatest valour. Great were the outcries made on both sides, mixt with exhortation, mirth, and mourning; the face of the whole fight was diuers, vncertaine, cruell, and dreadfull: and now it was the third houre of the day, when still the victorie stood doubtfull; and had not the furie of the great ordinance bene so terrible, that it had now beaten downe all the wals vnto the very rocke whereon the castle stood, the defendants might for some longer time haue endured the enemies force. But the very rocke bared both of wals and defendants, and more than foure hundred slaine, a man could scarcely now shew himselfe; but hee was presently stricken in pieces. Monferratus Gouvernour of the castle, and Garas of Evboea, men of equall valour, integritie, and honour, were both slaine with one shot; for a short and transitorie life made partakers of immortalitie together: Yet the rest which stood in defence of the castle, nothing terrified with so great a losse and slaughter of their fellowes, but augmented rather as it were with new courage from aboue, fought with greater force than before, ouerthrew the Turkes ensignes now set vp in the castle, slew the ensigne-bearers, captaines, and colonels; now repeating nothing more, but honourably to lay downe their liues for their religion and the obtaining

ning of immortal fall game. By this time the Sunne was mounted to the middle of heauen, great was the heat, and men exceeding wearie; the murdering shot neuer ceased, and such was the multitude of the enimie, that he still sent in fresh men in stead of them that were wearied or wounded. On the other side, the small number of the Christians, and those weakened with labor, watching, thirst, and wounds, did what men might; yet at length were ouercome by a greater force, and so the castle by the Turkes woen, but with such slaughter of their men, that it was a wonder that so many should be slaine of so few. The defendants were all slaine, euery man in valiant fight.

Here may I not in silence passe over the inhumane and more than barbarous crueltie of the Turkes against the dead bodies of the slaine knights, that thereby may appeare, that crueltie neuer wanteth whereon to shewit selfe mercilesse, yea euen after death. The Turkes after they had taken the castle, finding certaine of the knights yet breathing, and but halfe dead, first cut their hearts out of their breasts, and then their heads from their bodies; after that they hanged them vp by the heeles in their red cloakes with white crosses (which manner of attire they after an antient custome vse in time of war, as they doe blacke in time of peace) in the sight of the castles S. Angelo and S. MICHAELL. And yet Mustapha the Turkes Generall not so contented, commaunded them afterwards to be fast bound together, and so cast into the sea, whose dead bodies were in few daies after by the surge of the sea cast vp in the haueu MAIOR, and knowne by their friends, were by the commandement of the sorrowfull Great master honourably buried. With which the enemies most barbarous crueltie he was so moued, that he commaunded that no Turke should from that time be taken prisoner, but to be presently slaine. And thereupon all that were before taken, were forthwith put to the sword, and their heads cast ouer the wals on that side towards the enimie. From the beginning of the siege to the taking of the castle, of the Christians were slaine a thousand three hundred, amongst whom were a hundred and thirtie of the sacred knights of the Order, all worthe to be registred in the booke of euerlasting fame.

The castle S. ELMO thus lost, Valetta although his mind (as he had good cause) was inwardly attained with exceeding greefe, yet made semblant otherwise, because he would not daunt the minds of his souldiours: telling them, that nothing was happened vnprovided for or vnforcseene.
 This was (as he said) the will of God, and the chance of warre, that sometimes one sometimes another should be overcome: and that cowardise, not such valour as was in them that were gone, gaue occasion to their liuing friends to lament: yet that the enimie was not for that to be feared, who had also receiued such a losse, as he might thereby rather seeme conquered than a victorious conqueror: wher-as the losse of his knights was recompensed with honour and immortalitie, things of themselves sufficient to enflame all noble minds to behaue themselves valiantly. As for himselfe (he said) that trusting not in his owne strength, but in the helpe of Almighty God, he had not yet cast off the hope of victorie ouer the reliques of the discomfited enimie; and that he well hoped, they were all of the same mind, wherein he most earnestly requested them to persist vnto the end. When he had thus said, he being a man armed against all fortunes, withdrew himselfe a little aside: where casting many things in his troubled mind, he determined to send letters to Petrus Mescuita, Gouvernour of the citie of MELITA, to certifie him and the knights of the Order that were at MESSANA, and the Viceroy, of the losse of S. Elmo: the copie whereof, because that in them evidently appeareth the Christian mind of him the Great master, I haue thought good here to set down as followeth:

whilest these knights are setting forward, in the meane time chanced the miserable misfortune of the castle S. Elmo: which although it brought vnto vs that greefe you may easily imagine, wee for-all that, as if it had happened by some secret appointment of God, haue taken it in that part, that he as a most mercifull father purposeth thereby to warne vs, but not utterly to destroy vs. Neither doe I thinke it lawfull to doubt of his mercie and power. Yet for all that, I may neuerthelesse complain, that we are of them forsaken of whom it least becomed. So that in the space of seuen and thirtie daies, wherein our most valiant souldiours endured all the force of the enimie (which truly was done rather by the power of God than of man) we were holpen of our own (which owe so much vnto vs) not so much as with the least helpe, which they might oftentimes haue sent vs. But I list to ascribe it whatsoeuer it is, to God, of whom alone as we haue hitherto receiued so many good things, so rest we in hope hereafter to receiue also. For, for any thing that I can see, we must not now trust to mans helpe: for as much as we could by no letters, no diligence, no prayers, no admonitions, and to bee bresse, by no commaunds more them, who of all others ought most to haue obeyed it. The shortnesse of the time suffereth vs not to write to the Viceroy of these things, it shall be your part to certifie both him and other our friends thereof: who if they had obeyed our command, or aided vs with neuer so small a supple of soldiours, happily we had not lost the castle S. Elmo: in defence whereof we haue spent the best part of our soldiours. Wherefore except the Viceroy make hast to deliuer vs from this siege, I feare that he cannot in time come: but especially if we be here besieged before the coming of those our small helpees which we as in a dreame haue promised vnto our selues, and which we now scarce hope will be in time present. For all that, we doe not distrust of God his loue and prouidence: by whose diuine inspiration the rare courage of the Viceroy being in short time stirred up, will hasten hither to relieue vs. For all our welfare consisteth in celeritie. Our enemies hauing drawne all their fleet into the haven MESSANA, where they are busied in cleansing the castle, and repairing the breaches, that they may afterward the better use them against vs. Wherefore vpon the sight of these our letters send vnto vs the capitaines Catherine, Belcarar, Belmet, and Zoricus, with their companies, that we may use their faithfull and valiant seruice. God of his mercie send vs aid from some place, and keepe you. Fare you well from our castle S. Angelo, the 24 of Iune, 1565.

Mesquita hauing receiued these letters, commaunded a galliot forthwith to be launched, and therein embarked Mafius Codonellus, one of the knights; to whom he deliuered both the letters of the Grand master to him, and others of his owne, almost of the same purport, directed to the knights of the Order which lay at MESSANA, requesting him with all speed possible to passe ouer with them into SICILIA.

Mustapha Bassa sendeth messengers to the Great master.

The answer of the Great master to the Turkish messengers.

Philip Lascaris fleeth from the castle S. Michaels.

In the meane time Mustapha the Turkes Generall sent a messenger to Valetta, and with him an old Spanish captiue, with promise of libertie if he would goe with his messenger to the towne to talke with Valetta concerning the yeelding vp thereof, and to trie if he would by any meanes come to agreement: who coming to the towne, the Turke still waiting at the gate, the Christian was let in and brought to the Great master, to whom he declared what he had in charge from the Bassa. But as soone as Valetta heard of the name of composition and yeelding, he was so filled with indignation, that had he not been a Christian, he would presently haue commaunded him to haue been hanged. Wherefore he gaue him choice either to tarry still in the towne, if he thought so good, or els forthwith to returne and tell his companion, that if he got him not packing quickly, he would send him farther off with a great shot. With this short answer the Turke suddenly returned into the campe. Whereupon Mustapha fell into such a rage, that he openly protested, neuer from that time to forebear any kind of crueltie against the Christians. There was then with Mustapha one Philip of the most noble Græcian familie of Lascaris, who of a boy taken prisoner by the Christians in PATRAS, a citie of ACHAIA, and by them honestly and courteously vsed, was therefore euer after well affected toward the Christians: He priuie to many of Mustaphas designs, by a certaine diuine motion thought he should not a little profit the Christians by revolting vnto them: wherefore he resolved to flie vnto the castle of S. Michaels. Which thing when he had oftentimes attempted, at length the first of Iuly he cast himselfe into the sea (for by land he could no way escape) and swum to the castle, not without danger of his life: for discovered by the Turkes, he was many times shot at both with their arrowes and small shot. He brought to the Great master, reuealed vnto him many of the enemies secrets, and also aduised him what was to be done at the point of S. Michaels, to frustrate the enemies purpose for the assailing of that place; with many other things, which were vnto the defendants no small helpe: and afterwards as often as need was, during the siege, fought valiantly against the Turkes.

Whilest these things were in doing, Codonellus sent as we haue before said into SICILIA, came in safetie to MESSANA, where he found the Christian fleet not yet readie to relieue the distressed Malteses; for the Spanish ships were not yet come, and John Andreas Auria with eight and twentie ships was readie to returne to take in foure thousand footmen, taken vp in ETRYRIA by Capinus Vitellius. Which backwardnesse the knights of the Order considering, and what danger was in delay, after they had well debated the matter amongst themselves, they resolved by the power of God by all meanes possible to helpe their brethren. And for this expedition chose two most fit Generals of their owne fellowes, the Commendors of MESSANA and BAROLI, who forthwith went to Garças the Viceroy, declaring vnto him what things the sacred knights

A knights of their Order had done, not for the king of SPAIN onely, but for the Christian commonweale, and also what great charge they had bene at the yeare before in the Pinionian expedition, wherein they had neither spared ships, victuall, nor munition, neither their owne liues, to profit the king and the Christian commonweale. Besides this, they besought him well to consider, that the losse of MALTA concerned not the sacred knights onely, but all ITALIA, and especially SICILIA, for the neerenesse of so troublesome and puissant an enemy. For these and other like reasons, which the shortnesse of the time sufficed them not to rehearse, they requested of him foure thousand footmen, with whom all the knights of the Order which were there, and many other noble and voluntarie men would make all possible speed to relieue the besieged, which they had before in vaine attempted, with which strength they were in good hope, if not to repulse the enemy, or to recouer that was already lost, yet at least to stop and stay his further proceeding, vntill such time as he hauing rigged vp and brought forth all his fleet, might set vpon the Turkes, and (as was to be hoped) vanquish & disperse them. But whilest the Viceroy hauing heard their request, considereth what answer to make, a messenger came vnto him from SPAIN, but with what command from the king (although men guessed diuerly) could not be knowne. But vpon his coming, the Viceroy gaue the knights this cold answer, That he could not graunt what they requested, for that in so doing he should dishonour his fleet, and not be able afterwards to relieue them as he desired: but if it pleased them to transport the knights with part of the ships souldiours into the island, they might so doe with their owne two galleys they had already, whereunto he would also ioine another of his owne. The knights when they could obtaine no more, accepted of that which was offered.

The cold answer of the Viceroy to the knights.

Whilest these galleys are setting forward, those foure galleys (whereof we haue before spoken) wherein were embarked fourescore knights and six hundred other souldiours, hauing at sea suffered many troubles by the space of twentie daies, could not as yet arrive at MALTA: and because the Viceroy had commaunded, That they should not land, except they first knew whether the castle S. ELMO were still holden by the Christians, they sent out a frigot to land, promising that day and the next to tarry in the sea for her returne. In the meane time a great tempest suddenly arising, it so fell out, that the frigot could not at the appointed time returne; wherefore the galleys which expected her coming, fearing lest she had bene either by tempest lost, or by the enemy intercepted, retired to POZALO, a port vpon the coast of SICILIA neerest to MALTA, there to expect some good newes: where as soone as they had put in, they vnderstood that S. ELMO was yet defended: whereupon they put to sea againe, with purpose to haue arrived at MALTA. But when they were within two leagues of the place, where they thought to haue landed, they saw a fire there, which caused them to mistrust that the place was possessed of the enemy, and that he lay thereabout to intercept them: wherefore they returned againe to POZALO, where now vnderstanding of the French knight, come from MALTA, that that fire was made by his commaundement, as a signe, that they might without feare haue come forward; they with all speed made againe for the same place, and at the length the nine and twentieth day of Iune about midnight landed at the Blacke Rockes on the South side of the island toward AFRIKES, and vncene of any, got in hast to the citie MELITA, where they were joyfully receiued, and there stayed to expect what the Great master should commaund. In the meane time it fortun'd a great foggie mist (which seldome times there chanceth) to arise so thicke, that a man could hardly see for it: at which time a boy of about twelue yeares old looking by chance out of a window in the castle of MELITA, suddenly as one afraid, cried out, That he saw a Turke going from the citie to the castle of S. MICHAEL. Which thing some of the knights hearing, ran presently out that way, and found a Greeke of the citie of MELITA, who brought backe and examined (for that without the Gouvernours passe it was not lawfull for any man to go out of the citie) confessed, That his purpose was to haue aduertised the Turkes of the coming of those souldiours, that they might haue intercepted them as they should haue come from MELITA to the Grand master: for which treason he was as he had well deserved cut in foure peeces. Three dayes after, this new supplee come from SICILIA, in the first watch of the night came all in safetie from MELITA to the Great master, except two or three boyes, who charged with armour and other baggage, were not able to keepe way with the rest. It is not to be told how much the besieged rejoyced at the coming of these their friends, and especially Valetta, who seeing the floure of his knights and other souldiours, as it were by diuine prouidence come vnto him; with

A traitor taken and executed at Melita.

The souldiours now come out of Sicillia, come to the Great master.

with teares trickling downe his cheekes, and his eies cast vp to heauen, said:

I thanke thee (O heavenly Father) which bearest my prayers, and forsakest not this thy little flocke; beset round with most rauening Wolves: These are the works of thine euermlasting goodnesse, mercie and prouidence.

These new come souldiours, requested of the Great master as a reward of their paines, that they might be put in garriſon into the towne S. Michael, a place now most laid vnto by the Turkes: which thing (he commending their forwardnesse) easily granted: yet for all that removed not the old garriſon. These fresh and couragious souldiours, desirous of nothing more than to fight with the enemy, the next day sallied out, and hauing slaine two hundred of the Turkes, and wounded as many more, without losse of a man returned, euerie mans sword imbrued with the blood of his enemy. Which thing Mustapha the Turkes Generall hearing, knew it was they which lately came into the towne; and therupon fell in rage with his captaines, as that they had by their negligence entred. But the suspicion grew most vpon them which were appointed for the keeping of the vttermoſt part of the island: which was the more increased; for that three gallies of A. ORRIS had withdrawne themselves away; so that he neither trusted them nor the renegade Christians, who as occasion serued, fled daily from him. For which cause, he gaue out proclamation, That none of them should lie by night out of the gallies, & that such as did otherwise, should therefore be burnt or impaled vpon stakes: and so changing his warders, appointed Salce with his gallies, whom he thought to be more faithfull for the keeping of the island. And that neither they nor the Christians should be able to attempt any thing, he chained together diuers gallies in the entrance of the haue MARZA MOXR, and caused the rest of the fleet to ride neerer together than before. But because exceeding many were at that time sicke in the Turkes campe, of the flux and other diseases, three places were assigned for them; one for the wounded men neere vnto AQVA MARTIA, guarded with two thousand Turkes; another in the poypes of their ships and gallies for the Turkes voluntaries; and the third amongst the banks, where the enforced Christians were cured. At the same time, Mustapha appointed Ochial Bassa Governor of TRIPOLIS, in stead of Dragut before slaine: who going thither with five gallies, and hauing set all things in order there, returned againe vnto the campe. Which him the Bassa had sent two ships loaded with corne to TRIPOLIS, there to make bread, whereof they began to feele some want in the campe. He also sent Zaloch, one of his Colonels to Solyman, to certifie him of the winning of the castle S. Elmo, and to deliuer vnto him the description of the isle of MALTA, as they found it at their arriual: and farther, to declace vnto him, That he found the Malteses stronger, and better provided, than was at his setting forth supposed: Wherefore if it were his pleasure longer to continue the siege, he should send a new supplie of men, victuall, and other warlike prouision: which if he did, he would then be in hope to take the other strong places of the island also, though not so soone as was at the first supposed: and that in the meane time, whilst he expected answer, he would not faile to doe what he possibly might. And because he would not seeme to haue written an vntruth, he began his batterie in fourteene places, with seauentie great pieces of artillerie, amongst which was three most huge basilisks: for from the Gallowes promontorie to AQVA MARTIA, and from thence to the castle S. Elmo, wherein he had placed three hundred Ianizaries, the Turkes had enclosed all that compassse with sundrie bulwarks, trenches, and mounts, from whence they with their thundering shot, day and night incessantly battered the townes and castles of S. Michael and S. Angelo, ouerthrew the wals, beat downe the bulwarks, and brake downe the houses in such terrible manner, that scarce any could be safe therein: which of all others most troubled the fearfull women and children. But the Turkes in their trenches rested in farre more safetie: yet so, that they durst not stray farre out of the campe, but trusting vpon their multitude; and not that many times without their losse, being cut off by the horsemen of the garriſon of MALTA, who were euer readie at their heeles.

When the losse of the castle S. Elmo was knowne at ROME, the citie was filled with mourning and heauinesse; some were sorie for the dishonour, other some feared least the calamities of the Malteses should redound vnto themselves. There was also amongst others, a certaine envious and foule mouthed kind of men, altogether ignorant and vnacquainted with martiall affaires, who shamed not to lay the blame of the losse of S. Elmo vpon the Grand master: whom both his owne valour, with the worthie testimonie of so many famous and valiant men as were there present with him; as also this historie, gathered out of the true light of things then done, shall

A shall both for the time present, and for all posteritie sufficiently acquite of so false a slander. But he will easily blemish another mans name, that spareth not his owne: neither can ignoſtice rightly iudge of the counsels of the skilfull, or cowardise of valiant deeds.

But to returne againe to our purposes we said before, that three gallies were made readie at MESSANA; in setting forth whereof, they which had the charge vied rich diligence, that the seauenth of Iuly, they departed out of their harbour. In them (besides the knights of the order) was embarked six hundred Spaniards, and three hundred of the great bishops souldiours, conducted by Pompeius Columna; the mariners were part hired, part slaues, to whom libertie was promised if they would lustily doe their endeavour to get into the haue, and to be accounted of as the best of the souldiours were. And because they would relieue the besieged, nor with men onely, but with victuall also, they put into these gallies five hundred bushels of wheate, beside gunpowder, saltpeter, and lead for shot. And although it was thought a most hard matter, by the haue itselfe to enter the island, the Turkes possiding both it and all the places thereabouts, nevertheless, there was in the knights such an earnest desire to relieue their brethren, that they promised both to themselves and others, all things easie and safe: but when they began to approach the island, they sent a scout before to vnderstand by signes from the castle S. Angelo, whether they were to proceed forward or not: who coming so farre that they might discouer the signe, perceived thebay that they should retire. Which thing the Turkes perceiving; also, presently with the smoake of their great ordinance and other things, they so obscured the waye as with a thicke cloud, in such sort, as that those signes were no more to be discerned; but all in vaine, for why, our men had alreadye descried them: so those three gallies returned againe into STRATA. For Valletta that good prince, thought it not meet to bring so many of the sacred knights, so many noble gentlemen and valiant souldiours, into a most manifest danger: for he saw certaine of the Turkes gallies to lie by night in the mouth of the haue MARZA MOXR, at a place called the Little lands, to impeach the going in or out of the haue MAIOR. About the same time, they which lay in garriſon in the citie of MALTA, hearing of the notable fallie made by the souldiours lately come; and taking heart thereupon, at such time as the Turkes were fetching in a certaine boote of cattell, the horsemen pursued them; and hauing slaine diuers of them, recovered the prey: and yet not so contented, chased them euen to their campe. But the other Turkes seeing their felowes flying in such hast towards them, raised an alarm, ran to the Generals tent, and for that time ceased their batterie.
